I hope even in this dark hour we may lift our eyes and look beyond the clouds of war and see the faint glimmer of the dawn of peace and tranquility when the shooting stops. Godspeed the hour. We must be ready for the duties of that hour. The fight will not be won when the armies quit in the field. It will not be won until we have banished war and murder from the hearts of men. That cannot be done by treaties and conventions. Only can it be done by a regenerated spirit. There are at least two great forces in the world that can take up this fight when the armies quit, namely, the Christian Church and the great fraternities which reach out and touch the lives of men in every walk and strata of life. They all preach brotherhood and peace. That is what the world needs today.

A few evenings ago I addressed one of these groups of fine Americans. I attach a newspaper account of my remarks:

[From the Danville (Va.) Register of April 29, 1944]

WOODRUM CALLS ON ALL TO MAKE PEACE LAST; DEPLORES PRE-WAR TRENDS AT MASON'S MEETING

"War is a horrible thing. I wish you might have a seat next to mine in the Nation's Capitol and read some of the letters, and hear the pathetic calls of mothers and fathers, sisters and wives of some of those who are directly affected by this thing. It cannot be said that everybody in America is ignorant of the fact that there is a war. Some of us are terribly conscious of it," said CLIFTON A. WOODRUM of Roanoke, Representative of Congress from the Sixth District of Virginia, in an address last night in Masonic Temple to Masons of Danville and the neighboring communities.

"The fields of the earth and the rivers of the world," said Mr. Woodrum, "are runing red with the blood of men and women. How long will it be until men will learn the futility of war? Must it all happen again? When will we learn that war is the only game at which everybody loses and nobody gains?

"God grant the day may dawn quickly when this old war-weary world will lay aside its implements of war, when men will turn again and begin to learn once more the arts of peace and good will. There must never be another war.

"You and I as American citizens have been guilty of letting this war come. God forgive us if we sit idly by and let it happen again.

"During my 25 years in Congress I have seen how quickly we forget. I, for one, watched with a heavy heart when, with the best intentions we towed into the Atlantic and sunk a great Navy, on which we had already spent $350,000,000, in what we thought was a great gesture of peace. What a laugh that gave Tojo and Hitler. Hardly was the ink dry on the treaty when they started building again.

"We will come out of this war with the biggest and best Navy, the best trained Air Corps, and the best land Army the world has ever known, and I hope we will see to it that no other nation is again permitted to build up a great, aggressive military force to menace the world. If we do not, your grandchildren and mine will be fighting another war before very long.

"It is a grand thing to look forward to an era of peace, when nations shall march shoulder to shoulder in a great brotherhood of man. That day will come when we can put selfishness and greed out of the hearts of men and nations, but as long as there are those with a spirit of greed and aggression, we must be ready to defend our rights.

"The biggest battle of this war," said Mr. Woodrum, "the battle that will mean more than any battle now being fought, will be the battle around the peace table.

"At that battle I want the representatives of the other nations of the world to look at Uncle Sam, with his hands outstretched to help the world, but I want them also to look over his shoulder and see America, a strong Nation, with ideals and principles of justice and peace, and with the strength to make the other nations respect those principles.

"But if they see a picture of a nation that has lost those ideals, they will have no respect for us.

"I happen to be chairman of a committee appointed to deal with post-war problems. That body met today before I left Washington. We are trying now to consider as far as we can the problems that will have to be faced when the war is over. The final answer, of course, cannot be written until the last gun of the war has been fired, but we can begin to study these problems now.

"The more I have studied the history of America, the more I have become convinced that the guiding hand of God has led this Nation of ours. So has it been in this war. Nothing but the guiding hand of God protected us.

"Some of our leaders saw this thing coming, but almost in the very shadow of Pearl Harbor some of our so-called leaders were shouting from the housetops, over the radio, and in every way they could command attention, that no nation would ever dare attack America. It makes interesting reading now to scan the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of those days, when some of us were called warmongers.

"We couldn't do much about it until Pearl Harbor, but after that some of those gentlemen who were the loudest in denouncing us were out in front waving flags. I shudder to think of what would have happened if Japan had pushed on in her conquest. They could have landed almost anywhere they wanted to, but for some reason they held back and gave us time to prepare.

"When historians of the future write the future of America's war development following Pearl Harbor, it will be one of the greatest pieces of history ever written.

"If there is ever to be a lasting peace," continued Mr. WOODRUM, "it must be based on the principles of the Christian church and the Masonic fraternity, and other great fraternal organizations who preach and seek to emulate the Christian principles of brotherhood and tolerance."

Mr. WOODRUM spoke under auspices of the Scottish Rite bodies of Danville; however, the meeting was open to all Master Masons, with invitations extended to members of all neighboring lodges.

Speaking on Masonry, Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow, he sketched briefly the influence of the fraternity on the early history of America.

"Masonry," said he, "is the most universal of all organizations. Its footsteps may be traced to the most remote regions of the world. Its teachings have been found in the most out-of-the-way places of the earth.

"I have in my hand the membership card of Brother Carter in the First Masonic Club of Bougainville. Evidently Brother Carter has traveled extensively, for we also have his membership card in the Square and Compass Club of Guadalcanal. Out there in the southwest Pacific, the members of our fraternity are meeting with each other where they are fighting the Japs." (The cards had been handed to him since he reached Danville yesterday afternoon.)

"That," said Mr. WOODRUM, "is typical of the history of Masonry. Wherever men may gather throughout the world they find a common meeting place under the square and compass. The history of this fraternity has been built indelibly into the very foundation and framework of our Nation and our Government. Down through the centuries its paths have been bordered by roses of love and kept green by the tears of widows and orphans who have been blessed by its ministrations. Down through the years the Masonic fraternity has spread sunshine and joy and consolation, and the world has been a better place because Masonry has passed that way."

Mr. WOODRUM was introduced by Lt. Gov. William M. Tuck, of Halifax. Mr. Tuck was introduced by State Senator Maitland H. Bustard. Senator Robert C. Vaden, of Gretna, and a number of other well-known out-of-town Masons were guests of the occasion.

Dewey Avoids Giving Pledges to Politicians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. LEFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following article by Mr. Bert Andrews appearing in the New York Tribune of April 30.

Governor Dewey stands way out in front as the Republican candidate for President. Still there are those who feel he has been silent on present and post-war international problems. Mr. Andrews, in an editorial printed in the New York Herald Tribune on Sunday, April 23, brought to the attention of the public many excerpts taken from several of the Governor's speeches proving conclusively that this is not true. One of the outstanding remarks of the Governor's is that he feels a durable peace will only be attained by the willing sacrifice of the people the world over, because they understand the conditions of peace and want them. He also believes in Congress because it is close to the people, and that is something today when so many attacks are made on this body of Representatives. I feel that the following editorial by Mr. Bert Andrews is timely in that it refutes the attacks one hears on Governor Dewey's personal qualifications and also gives one a clean-cut argument favoring his silence. I'm sure we would all favor a President without the usual so-called strings tied to his election.

DEWEY AVOIDS GIVING PLEDGES TO POLITICIANS—ONE REASON FOR NOT DECLARING CANDIDACY IS FEAR OF "STRINGS"—MANY FORMER CRITICS FIND HIM "CHANGED"—SAY HIS NEW POPULARITY RESULTED DIRECTLY FROM "CHANGE OF OCCUPATION"

(By Bert Andrews)

WASHINGTON, April 29.—Gov. Thomas E. Dewey's views on foreign policy, as reflected in his numerous public addresses, messages, and statements, were described in detail in this space last week. Today three other matters relating to the silent man of Albany will be discussed under the following headings:

Does the New York Governor have more than one reason for sticking to his statement that he is not a candidate for the Republican nomination for President?

What about the double-barreled question that has often been heard in political circles: Would Governor Dewey be able to get along with Congress and does he have a definite theory of running the executive branch of government?

What is the answer to two more personal questions: Is there a "new" Tom Dewey? If so, what wrought the change?

WOULD HONOR A DRAFT

As to the first puzzler, one reply already has been heard. This is that Mr. Dewey believes that he cannot in honesty recede from his gubernatorial campaign statement that he would serve out his 4-year term, but that this pledge would be nullified if the national convention drafted him, in that it would be tantamount to treason to both party and country to refuse a bona fide draft to the Nation's highest office.

But in the opinion of men who know the Governor well, there are more reasons than that for his taciturnity. The chief one is this: If he became an avowed candidate, he immediately would be subjected to all the pulling and hauling that besets any admitted candidate.

This would not mean that a candidate would have to go so far as to promise cabinet posts or other appointive jobs in exchange for support. It would mean that he would have to take political support where he could find it and that some of the supporters, mistakenly but sincerely, would think that their helpfulness entitled them to a few strings on the candidate in the event of his election. And, according to men who know Governor Dewey, it is only natural that he, like any other potential Presidential candidate, would like to go into the campaign and into office as stringless as possible.

SEEKS HIGH TYPE AS AIDS

This ties in with the second question, as to Mr. Dewey's ability to get along with Congress and his theory of administrative duties.

For an answer, Mr. Dewey's intimates point to what he has done in Albany and what he did as district attorney. They say he would seek the cooperation and suggestions of Congress, just as he has sought the cooperation and suggestions of legislative leaders in New York's capital, but at the same time would hold to his view that as the elected head of the executive branch it would be up to him to outline the broad governmental policies. As for appointments, the precedents he has set in Albany and New York seem to make it clear, the intimates say, that he would search the country for the highest type of men for appointive offices, and would do all that any President could do to keep political hacks out of positions of eminence.

DISLIKED IN 1940, LIKED NOW

What of the more personal questions—those about the "new" Tom Dewey?

To begin with, it is merely factual reporting to state that up to and through the 1940 national convention there were many newspapermen and politicians who disliked the New Yorker because they believed he was often bumptious and sometimes downright supercilious in his dealings with people.

Lest this seem an exaggeration, it can be pointed out that Raymond P. Brandt, of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, had this to say recently in writing of the 1944 Dewey as contrasted with the 1940 Dewey who showed up at the Philadelphia convention.

"At Philadelphia, Dewey irritated and at times infuriated many prominent and obscure delegates by his arrogant cockiness and self-satisfaction. The old observation about him that 'you have to know Dewey well to dislike him' was disproved; many disliked him after 5 minutes' conversation. At 38 years old he was 'the young man in a hurry,' the 'boy scout,' the 'political upstart.'"

It is also merely factual reporting to state that since 1940, and particularly in the last 2 years, there has been a pronounced tendency among many of the former critics, newspapermen, or politicians to regard the Governor as a changed man. This reporter has heard many Washington and Albany correspondents say that the Governor is more affable, courteous, and friendly; that, in fact, he gets along with press and politicians as well as any Governor did.

So much talk of that nature has been heard, indeed, that this reporter developed a personal curiosity to learn what led to the improvement.

Did it result from some conscious soul searching on the part of the Governor; from a self-examination which convinced him that so many critics couldn't be wrong, and that, therefore, it was up to him to change his tactics?

Or did it result from outside pressure, from close advisers who bluntly told him, "Look, Tom, if you're going to get anywhere in politics, you'd better get in and learn the facts of life about not going around winning enemies and alienating people"?

Men who know the Governor best don't bat an eye when the foregoing questions are put to them. They acknowledge that Dewey's tact left something to be desired in 1940. But they insist that neither of the suggested explanations is the correct one. They offer a third one, and it has some logic behind it.

These men declare that the change resulted directly from "a change in occupations."

As district attorney of New York County, they explain, Mr. Dewey broke with precedent. Earlier prosecutors had often called newspapermen in, on the night before a trial session, to give them a hint of what he'd do the next day. Mr. Dewey took the view that he would be betraying his trust if he tipped his hand and refused to do as other prosecutors had done. In the process he irritated and infuriated many newspapermen, as well as some politicians who had been used to getting inside dope from the D. A.'s office. They spread the word to other newspapermen and politicians, until the "we-don't-like-Dewey" theme was taken up by many men who'd never even laid eyes on him.

Then came the change in occupations, with Mr. Dewey stepping into another phase of political life. With the stepping, say the men who know him best, he was able to drop his prosecutor's guard; was able to deal with questioners without sparring, and was able to smooth over injured feelings.

That, in a nutshell, seems to be the favored explanation. Whatever the reason, the fact is that many who disliked him now feel more kindly to him and are convinced that he has matured and mellowed.

Former Delegate King Now Port Director at Base in Marshalls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH RIDER FARRINGTON
DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Honolulu Star-Bulletin of April 13, 1944:

FORMER DELEGATE KING NOW PORT DIRECTOR AT BASE IN MARSHALLS

(By Mac R. Johnson)

AN ADVANCED AMERICAN BASE, SOMEWHERE IN THE MARSHALLS, April 10.—Commander Sam King, former Delegate to Congress from the Territory of Hawaii, is port director at an advanced American base in the Marshalls.

Every ship that enters the harbor and every boat that plies between them and shore is Commander King's responsibility. Sam, other officers said, is doing a splendid job.

Commander King is a graduate of the Navy School, as older officers call the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis. He resigned his commission to enter private business, and later served four terms as the Territory of Hawaii's voteless Delegate to Congress.

I talked to Commander King for an hour after accidentally meeting him while trying to find transportation to a ship. He talked of his work in Washington, the newspapermen he knew, of his friends in the Hawaiian islands. But he's in the Navy now and couldn't talk politics.

However, in summing up his years in the House of Representatives, Commander King said, "One attains a nonpartisan perspective when one is without a vote."

He didn't seek reelection a year ago, deciding instead to return to the Navy and apply his academy training in such ways as the Pacific Fleet found he could be most helpful.

Sam has a wood-and-screen office that keeps out much of the ever present dust at this base. But traffic through his door is brisk and the flies get in. The commander has fashioned a fly swatter from a piece of screen and wood to eliminate those which successfully infiltrate.

"While the dead Japs were being buried, the flies were terrible," King said. "They're not so bad now," he added, taking a crack at the only fly I saw in the office.

It was hot and Commander King repeatedly mopped his face and neck with a handkerchief. Yeomen, coxswains and messengers constantly entered to see the commander. His pleasant way of talking to the enlisted men, solving their problems and giving orders, was refreshing. Not all naval officers have this virtue.

The men weren't taking advantage. Everyone addressed him as "Mr. King," or "Sir."

Later, I asked several dungaree-clad men how they like working for Commander King. "He's all right," said one. Another said, "He's okay." Both answers were complimentary. Sweating sailors seldom use ecstatic superlatives.

Speaking of the Marshalls invasion, Commander King said, "It was the first amphibious operation I have ever seen." He said he was given permission to go on a combat vessel (minesweeper) which went within 150 yards of an enemy-held beach prior to the landing of American troops.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted by the building-supply dealers, concrete-block manufacturers, sand and gravel producers, and ready-mix concrete operators, at a regular meeting of these associations:

Whereas it has come to our attention that the Price Administrator, Chester Bowles, has asked Congress to continue price control substantially without change under the O. P. A., which expires on June 30, 1944; and

Whereas the undersigned manufacturers, dealers, and processors are in favor of the continuance of price control, subject to modifications to permit correction of injustices and inequalities; and

Whereas the complexity of regulations and the indifferent and arbitrary policy adopted in many cases in connection with the adjustment of inequalities by representatives of the O. P. A. in cases where such inequalities and adjustments do not affect the war effort has created a hardship on certain industries without any prospect for relief from them under the present law; and

Whereas this policy is not in accordance with equitable principles and is contrary to the American way of fair play and has created a situation which will, unless curtailed, unnecessarily destroy firms long established in business: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we apprise our representatives in Congress of this situation and appeal to them to take action when the renewal or continuance of price control comes up for consideration to insist that some provision be included in the bill to either establish a tribunal or provide for court review to give petitioners an opportunity to be heard and present evidence before representatives of O. P. A. deny an application to correct maladjustments; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each Senator and Congressman representing the State of Minnesota.

Citizenship

OF

HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, recently the Navy Department announced the death in this war of Ensign Anthony Mannix Moriarty, son of Judge and Mrs. Joseph J. Moriarty, of Shakopee, Minn.

Ensign Moriarty was one of the boys whom I had observed grow from boyhood into young manhood, and who left college to respond to his country's call and to win pilot's wings.

My attention has been called to the following remarks of Judge Moriarty in his court which contain a most touching expression and reference to his son and an inspired expression of the principles of American citizenship. I consider it an honor and a privilege to extend the following remarks of Judge Moriarty in the RECORD:

REMARKS OF THE HONORABLE JOSEPH J. MORIARTY, JUDGE OF THE DISTRICT COURT, AT THE NATURALIZATION PROCEEDINGS HELD AT THE COURTHOUSE IN THE VILLAGE OF LE CENTER, LE SEUR COUNTY, MINN., ON THE 24TH DAY OF APRIL 1944

It is the duty of the judge in a proceedings of this kind under our rules to make some statement to the new citizen, but my heart is too heavy this morning to say much.

The flag was never so precious as now. There is a soul this morning somewhere in the Heavens who died for that flag, and he was dear to me, and if he were here he would not want me to mention his name because he was a modest fellow. His spirit is still alive and that spirit was not a spirit of the shy or the retreating or the cowardly, that was a spirit dedicated to fight for what was right. He saw his way clearly, he never flinched, and now he is with God.

If he was here this morning he would tell you just one thing, and that is how necessary it is for us to understand some of the basic principles of the Government and the country for which he died. He would tell you, because he was a student already of the law, that man moves in a democracy under three great influences, in three great spheres of action. In the one there is government by the positive written law of the country; the other, there is government by the principles of justice; and in the other, there is government by the law of Almighty God. Now, some of you may think that that is just the fond hope of some theologian and that statement really belongs to religion and not to the judiciary, but that is where we are mistaken. The very basic law of this country rests squarely on the will of Almighty God. We have certain provisions in our Constitution, we have certain statutes, but that is not the law in its entirety. It is only a small portion of the law which regulates the affairs of men in a democracy.

Side by side with that is another great sphere of jurisprudence, it is called equity, and that branch of government is based entirely upon the justice of God, the law of nature, the principles of right and justice. That is what the judges say of it, Story and Kent and the great American judges.

Then there is another sphere, mind you, and in order to define that sphere for you I am going to define it in the very language of one of our greatest of American judges. He says, "All of the precepts of morality are not jural in their nature; that is, they do not relate to mankind considered as organized into society or as into a state, but separately to individuals, prescribing their duties toward each other and toward God. These moral precepts or precepts of morality create obligations which rest separately upon persons which the human law and the state does not and cannot recognize or enforce. They are left for enforcement to the divine sanction as it acts in and upon the conscience of each individual." Now, then, that judge had this in mind, he had one word that is used in the Declaration of Independence in mind when he made that statement, and when he made that statement he voiced the basic law of America and the underlying principles of a democracy. What word was it? That little word "unalienable" rights. Rights which the individual cannot surrender; rights which the state cannot take away; rights which the state cannot regulate. Oh, that is a great sphere of human action where that influence controls. Has it a court? Yes, it is the court of conscience. Has it a judge? Yes, God is the judge of that court. Right there, my friends, is the great outstanding characteristic of a democracy, the existence of this free field of human action and the protection of it by all the rest of the law of the nation.

My friends, I told you a moment ago that if it were not for all of the religions a democracy could not prevail; and why, because it is in this sphere of human action where conscience is the court and God is the judge, where the State stands apart, that religion has its influence. Here is where all the individual initiative arises from. It is in this sphere where a man's noblest ambitions and greatest ideals take rise. It is that sphere that controls this country. It is in that sphere we find our true freedom. There is no freedom under the positive written law of a State, and that is why the original founders of the United States of America said, we will create a free field here and in that the rights are inalienable, never shall the State interfere there.

Do you know my good new citizen, the distinction between a democracy and a totalitarian form of government where a dictator and one man rule prevails? Well, I will tell you, it is very simple and tell it to your children. In a totalitarian form of government, a one-man ruled government, everything is wrong except what he says is right. Do you see where that free field of human action that I am talking about is wiped out, equity is wiped out, nothing but the positive letter of the law, the human law. Now, in a democracy, our United States of America, oh, the difference. Everything is right except what the Government by positive law says is wrong. Here is the great distinction.

You know I pray to God that before my death I could see the young Americans decide to say whether or not they were or were not true Christians, but everywhere throughout the land they are answering as did the Christians of old. Just one answer for those fellows—we are ever ready to die for the right. We shall never submit to wrong. That is the spirit of the boys of today. That is the spirit of the old Christians of the ages, and that is our spirit here at home.

So, my good American, you have many people, I know, that are related to you and friends of yours in Germany and they wish they could be with you this morning, but not yet. The day will come when we will enter into that very nation, not with hate, oh, no, but with Christian love, and the light of Christ will shine there and peace will prevail and God will have His way and justice will have its day in the whole world.

I congratulate you, and I want you to take that flag home and keep it forever.

An International Court and Four Sheriffs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 2 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "An International Court and Four Sheriffs," by Richard S. Childs.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN INTERNATIONAL COURT AND FOUR SHERIFFS

A SET-UP AMERICANS CAN ACCEPT

(By Richard S. Childs)

The people of the United States want an end to all wars, and plans for that will be listened to eagerly—and warily. They will not, however, in our time, consent to taking a minority position in an international legislature of a supergovernment and be bound in advance by the votes of its alien majority. Neither will the United Kingdom. Nor the Soviet Union. The various blueprints for world government all are made unrealizable by that inescapable fact.

An international police, involving as it does an international political set-up to finance and control it, is under the same disability.

We drop back then to the classic program of our scholars in such affairs—namely, to revive the League of Nations, supplemented by regional set-ups such as the suggested Council of Europe. The United States will, I hope, consent this time to take its permanent seat in the League Council.

Still remains the fact, however, that the League did not prevent aggression. Reference of nonjusticiable disputes involving aggression to the Council of the League did not confront an undoubted aggressor with any uncertainty of instant overwhelming concerted armed intervention to protect the victim. Japan in Manchuria, Italy in Ethiopia, Germany in Austria flouted the Council and left its members to "advise" as to what, if anything, its members should do, resulting only in the Lytton inquiry in Manchuria, feeble sanctions against Italy, and so forth. A cynical world, including the United States, jeered at the League and seems likely to despair again when statesmen propose reassembling it.

Unless something further can be done about aggression.

For this high purpose, victory brings a new opportunity. At the end of the war we shall see four nations (including China) mightily armed; three Axis nations and their Balkan satellites thoroughly disarmed for a long, long time, and a scatteration of little nations like Switzerland, Sweden, Spain, Argentina, whose arms are relatively trivial.

Even after demobilizations of their victorious armies, the ready-made alliance of the four nations can easily retain an aggregation of 95 percent of the land, sea, and air power of the world. An extraordinary situation unmatched since Rome.

So the Moscow statement went beyond the League, sounding a new note to which American public opinion, happily, is making little objection thus far—the new note of determination that the outlawing of war shall be implemented by the vast concerted postwar forces of the four nations and of all other nations that accept their invitation to join up in an elaborated understanding toward that end. This project has not yet been drafted but it needs provision of mechanism and procedure if only for the purpose of putting all nations on notice as to its scope and method.

The present vague position seems to be: "We four nations will go after an aggressor any time we get together and agree that we have spotted one." Our people may well fear that under that loose arrangement we may find ourselves invited from time to time to help to rake chestnuts out of the fire to satisfy some obscure national ambition of Russia or the British Empire. We and the other nations will delay to check the circumstances warily each time. In some cases we may be unsure that the others will proceed along with us with equal resolution.

Who is to say just when aggression has developed? If it is to be the Council of the League as heretofore, I doubt if the United States, for one, will bind itself to respond unquestioningly and every time with arms to support a decision made by the Council identifying the offending nations. The four nations will certainly not agree to let a majority of the Council determine for them whether and when their forces shall move to war against an alleged agressor; they will require as they did before, that such a vote in the Council shall be unanimous or shall include the separate assent of each of the four nations (which presumably will hold permanent seats). For the Council is a political body, our people are skeptical of its motives, its members are not impartial judges of objective facts but official national mouthpieces of their respective ministries, foreign policies, national ambitions, and alliances. So if no better provisions are to be made for making certain that the concerted power of the four dominant nations will really move toward the control of a Council-identified aggressor, we are back to the ghastly hazard again that after aggression appears, each of the four nations, regardless of the Moscow Pact, will pause to consider each time whether this really is a case of aggression of which they should take notice, whether if so, they shall move this time, and in general whether they and their people are sufficiently inflamed about it to go to war alongside equally hesitant and dubious peace-loving allies. The stern determination voiced at Moscow may soften in decades of peace. If the Kaiser and Hitler had felt sure of the odds that finally piled up against them, they would never have started; aggressors 20 years hence may dare again in the absence of utter certainty of encountering an overwhelming combination of enemies.

How can aggressors be identified in such impartial fashion that democracies and the American people in particular will agree to accept the finding and to proceed to war without indulging in a fatal delay to mull and split over the merits of each case? How can the would-be aggressor be blocked by a certainty that his aggression will bring this democracy and others into swift and early military action as indicated at Moscow?

I propose this:

Let the four nations, and all others that can be led to join up, agree that they will:

1. Adopt a broad definition of aggression which will so amplify the meaning of that highly uncertain word as to make it possible to take questions of aggression out of the nonjusticiable into the justiciable class of international disputes.

2. Refer to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague all complaints against themselves wherein aggression is alleged, and abide by the verdicts and penalties in respect to the aggression factor of the dispute—other factors may be nonjusticiable and referable elsewhere or left unsolved.

3. Require all other governments, whether signatories to this agreement or not, to renounce the use of force likewise, and take their cases to court (or elsewhere) and abide by the verdicts.

4. Maintain armed forces of the four nations at sufficient strength according to their respective judgments, to be jointly overwhelmingly paramount in the post-war world.

5. Dedicate their armed power solely to the support of the Court and renounce the use of their arms for any other purpose.

To reach the Court in such cases, aggression under the agreed-upon definition must be alleged in the complaint and found existent by the Court. Failure by any defendant nation to answer the complaint, or failure to abide by the decision and penalties (including any interim injunctions to refrain from or reverse aggressive acts), will be ascertained and published by the Court. Forthwith the four nations and all other signatories are under agreement to move armed forces against the aggressor to compel obedience to the Court—acting as sheriffs and posse comitatus.

Here we do have just a bit of supergovernment, any nations not signatory get the same treatment as those that have agreed that such measures may be used against them in such circumstances. Justification for that, aside from its necessity, lies in the fact that the signatories will represent over 80 percent of the world's population.

Here, too, we have the blank check which the American people must be asked to sign—an agreement to go with arms to the support of the Court in such circumstances along with the other sheriffs. But the issue will not be the allegations in a far-away dispute but the clearer and nobler one—"We must support the Court, we agreed to, the orderly way of settling international disputes must be upheld—a nation must not be allowed to take the law into its own hands!" And if the other three great nations keep faith and move likewise as promised, in concert with us, in overwhelming power, there will be no fighting. The prompt appearance in the offender's foreign office of all the ambassadors asking for their safe conducts, would be enough!

The American people, I contend, would subscribe to that much and live up to it.

But suppose we are sued. Suppose we pursue another Villa into Mexico, rushing troops across the Rio Grande? The Mexican officials, responsive to local resentment, cable to the Court alleging aggression. We would have to respond and expound the theory of our act—"not really aggression at all"—and abide by the finding, recalling our troops if the court so decreed. And we would. I see no trouble in inducing the American people to promise that we would, if other nations are taking the same risks of an adverse decision in such matters.

The American people have already applauded the Moscow Pact with its promise that we, with the others, will employ force hereafter against those that break the peace. They will still more readily accept that obligation if it be based on a familiar type of procedure designed to provide cool, orderly, and impartial justice. This plan will pledge them to take weapons from the wall and go forth with the other sheriffs (not alone) against any nation that flouts the Court—they will stand for that. They will do it for the Court more willingly and unquestioningly than for the League Council; the Court is a court; the Council is a composite of intense political cross-currents. The Court is in good standing here, the Council is in mixed repute.

Of course the situation becomes precarious if a Court decision leaves three of the four nations to enforce a decision on the fourth. China, the United States of America, and the United Kingdom, however, are geographically so separated that disputes between them seem unlikely to reach a stage where any one of them would flout the court and take to arms. The Soviet Union's self-interest seems ready to turn toward the vast opportunities of her internal development and industrial modernization, hampered now by weight of great armaments. German aggression which she once had reason to fear, will be no longer a risk at the end of this war. Accordingly the Soviet Union could well afford sincerely to try this plan. (Otherwise, I admit, this plan, or any other, is a four-legged table with one leg off.)

The provision thus of "An international court and four sheriffs" does not obviate the need for having a League of Nations again to facilitate legislation as before, mediation and procedures for peaceful change. This does not transfer from the League Council to the Court any powers except the power to determine when there has been aggression under an agreed-upon definition. Other phases of disputes re boundaries, economic grievances, treatment of minorities, colonies, mandates, if not justiciable, stay in the League Council and if not solved there, the aggrieved nation, big or little, is left without redress as now subject only to a further effective denial of the opportunity to resort to war as an instrument of national policy.

If the League is not reconstituted, or if the United States does not join, this plan can still be effectuated.

SUMMARY

It seems to me important that the four nations do not attempt after the war to use their triumphant power in the discretion of their shifting ministries to regulate the world; the rest of the world would hotly resent such power-based assumptions of either wisdom or authority.

To dissipate the power of this great alliance, to permit resumption of the old scramble, mitigated only by the incomplete powers of the League, seems equally perilous.

To hold dominant power, but pledge it exclusively to the service of organized justice, to keep the weapons and promise to use them only against any nation which the Court reports to be guilty of aggression, that would constitute in the sight of the world a noble and reassuring renunciation of the selfish opportunities of victorious power, and channel the power to the point where it would be least used and most useful.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include the following poem entitled "Frank Knox" written by Horace C. Carlisle, Washington poet:

FRANK KNOX

Since God who created us is no respector of persons when comes the last call,
He pays heed to no "conscientious objector,"
But gives the death sentence to all—
The weak and the strong and the sick and the healthy
Enjoy no alternative choice—
The wise and the foolish, the poor and the wealthy,
All stop at the sound of His voice.

Our noteworthy Navy's renowned Secretary,
Bemoaned by the peace-loving world,
In this darkened day was a bright luminary
Wherever waved, proudly unfurled,
The Stars and the Stripes in their grandeur and glory,
Significant of the great Cause
Of Freedom, enshrined both in song and in story,
Safeguarding democracy's laws.

Frank Knox has passed on, but his mem'ry
we'll cherish
As long as the ages shall last——
His wholesome influence on life cannot perish,
But will ever live in the past,
Directing, from out of the silence, our actions,
On down through the challenging years,
Imploring us, in all transocean transactions,
To follow our wise pioneers.

The Construction of the Alaska Highway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, my warm friend, Capt. Richard L. Neuberger, recently appeared in my home city of Tacoma, Wash., where he made a notable address replete with fascinating material concerning the very romantic engineering undertaking, the Alaska Highway.

Captain Neuberger, the author of this address, is a notable magazine writer, author of best-selling books, and a journalist of note. He has been a member of the Oregon State Legislature and was a staff writer for many years on that great newspaper, the Portland Oregonian.

The speech is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, members of the Tacoma Chamber of Commerce, and friends, I can see that I will have to be very careful what I say today. My service in the far North lasted only 19 months. That is a long time, particularly when 3 of those months were during the coldest subarctic winter since 1913, yet I see in this audience a number of old-timers of Alaska and the Yukon. Mr. Ward Estey hiked over the Chilkoot Pass and so did your sheriff, Mr. Lee Croft, and I understand that Mr. Barrett, at the table in front, actually cooked for Jack London when Jack was snowed in at Stewart in 1898. So if I make any mistakes or wander from the truth, you can be sure that I will be called to account by some very well-informed individuals.

I first met Brig. Gen. James A. O'Connor—who is known throughout the Corps of Engineers as "Patsy" O'Connor—at Log Cabin in September of 1942. Ward Estey and Lee Croft will know where Log Cabin is. Log Cabin is a little way station near the bleak summit of White Pass. There the red-coated constables of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police checked in the gold seekers as they trudged wearily across the mountains in search of riches half a century ago.

"Who are you?" asked the general.

"I'm your public relations officer, sir," I replied.

"Are you the fellow General Sturdevant wrote me about?"

"Yes, sir."

(At this point, let me add parenthetically that Brig. Gen. Clarence L. Sturdevant, who is assistant chief of Army engineers, is well known in the Puget Sound region, for he was district engineer at Seattle for a number of eventful years.)

Almost since that time, I have served as General O'Connor's aide-de-camp. It has been a historic experience. His job has been that of developing transportation and communication to Alaska. Under his direction have been many projects of great significance—the 1,600-mile Alaska Military Highway, the Haines Military Road, the telephone line from Edmonton to Whitehorse, the pipe line from Norman Wells, the military operation of the White Pass & Yukon Railroad, the construction of key airfields leading to Alaska and the north Pacific theater of war.

All these undertakings are of immeasurable importance to you here in Tacoma, for the Puget Sound area is the sea entrance to Alaska and the Yukon. And let me say here that Tacoma shall always hold a warm and affectionate place in my heart, because Tacoma is my mother's birthplace. I also am proud to know such eminent public officials from Tacoma as Hon. HOMER T. BONE, this State's senior United States Senator, and Hon. JOHN MAIN COFFEE, who represents this city in the House of Representatives of the American Congress, and Hon. Harry P. Cain, your mayor who is now a major in the American Army Military Government Section.

Much of the pioneering in Alaska has been the work of the United States Army. Frederick Schwatka, the man who surveyed almost all of southeastern Alaska, was a first lieutenant. The late Col. Charles Erskine Scott Wood, who at the time of his death a few weeks ago was the oldest living graduate of West Point, was the first white man ever to boat down the Yukon River to the Bering Sea. The late Gen. Billy Mitchell, pioneer advocate of air power, had charge of stringing the first telephone lines in the Sitka region. And everyone knows that it was Mitchell who said, "He who holds Alaska holds the world."

The undertaking assigned to General O'Connor followed in this pioneer tradition. He had been detailed to conquer the last great wilderness on the North American continent, a wilderness of vast distances and high mountains and far-flung forests.

Let me tell you something about a few of the experiences which attended that task.

When the route for the 1,592-mile Alaska International Highway was first selected, veteran Army men had looked at the map with some misgivings. The job would mean stationing American soldiers in the coldest patches of North America. Year after year Alaska's lowest temperatures are always recorded at Tanana Crossing, and the highway goes straight through it. Canada's Yukon Territory has frozen and maimed more men than any other Arctic region, and the highway twists across the Yukon for 551 wilderness miles.

In such a land it was inevitable that trucks would freeze, bulldozers would be immobilized by ice, and manifolds and differentials and carburetors would fail to function. But what about the soldiers? This was the Army's dominant concern. Could recruits from Florida and Mississippi and southern California come unscathed through a Yukon winter?

During the last great influx into the Yukon, that of the Klondike gold rush in 1898, men had died along the trail every day during December, January, and February. Frost-bitten lungs and frozen limbs had sent scores of others back to Seattle and Edmonton crippled wrecks. The trek to Whitehorse and Dawson was studded with pain.

The present Yukon migration rivals the one of '98. Approximately 20,000 soldiers have worked on the Alaska Highway and such associated projects as telephone lines, barracks, and landing strips. Construction on the road commenced in April of 1942. Today soldiers are driving trucks its full length, from Dawson Creek on the British Columbia plains to Fairbanks in the heart of Alaska.

In that time, with 20,000 men—many of whom had never felt even freezing temperatures before—worked out in the open in the coldest part of North America, there has been only one death from exposure.

In addition, Col. Walter F. von Zelinski, surgeon of the Army's Northwest Service Command, has said, "We have treated 140 men who were incapacitated by the cold. Of those 140 cases, all except 4 recovered completely, with no ill effects. The 4 required amputations of 2 or less toes. No amputations of hands or feet were necessary.

"In my opinion," Colonel von Zelinski has added, "this constitutes an all-time record for protection of the human body in the coldest imaginable temperatures. The record becomes all the more remarkable when one considers that three regiments of Negro soldiers composed almost wholly of men who never had been out of the deep South, played an important role in the construction of the Alaska Highway."

Colonel von Zelinski attributes this showing to three major factors: "First, the cold-weather discipline instilled in the troops, in the form of repeated instructions for behavior and living in extreme cold. Second, the studies made by the Army for safeguarding our personnel in temperatures touching 70 degrees below zero. And third the excellent Arctic clothing and unsurpassed sleeping equipment which have resulted from those studies."

The Quartermaster Corps of the Army was ready for the great road-building adventure in the far North long before that adventure began. On the 20,300-foot summit of Mount McKinley, loftiest spot on the continent, Bradford Washburn conducted special clothing experiments for the quartermaster general. Washburn is one of the best known mountain climbers in North America. He also is director of the New England Museum of Natural History.

"I believe that Mount McKinley is the coldest point in the world which men can reach," Washburn told Maj. Gen. Edmund B. Gregory, Quartermaster General of the United States Army.

It was on McKinley's frigid crest that Washburn discovered that blankets and quilts, no matter how numerous, are a frail reed against the extreme cold, and that a sleeping bag is essential. There he found that eider down is warmer than any other material as a filling for the bag. He also found that a smaller sack fitting within the outer bag provided considerably more protection than a single bag of double thickness. And he insisted that the bag be made light enough for a man to carry with ease. "We don't want soldiers getting separated from their equipment," he warned.

Along the full length of the Alaska Highway's 1,592 miles—at truck relay station, airport, and signal unit—the G. I. sleeping bag is the most popular as well as the most vital article of equipment. I have eaten in a tent so cold that canned corn froze in my mess kit and I dared not take off my gloves, yet that night I slept as snug as in a steam-heated hotel room. The G. I. sleeping bag bridged the temperature gap. When he came to the opening of the Alaska Highway, Maj. Gen. George R. Pearkes, wearer of the Victoria Cross and commander of Canada's Pacific Army Command told General O'Connor that the American Army's sleeping bag was the best piece of Arctic equipment that he ever had seen.

This was the voice of authority, for as a young man in 1913 Pearkes had been a Royal Mounted constable at Dalton Post on the Alaskan border. And when the Canadian general left Whitehorse he had in the pocket of his battle dress all the specifications of our G. I. sleeping bags for his own army to study.

The tendency of our soldiers at the start of their Arctic service was to wear too many clothes. This sounds paradoxical, but one of the facts definitely established by Bradford Washburn and his associates in the cold-weather tests was that perspiration and overheating are the gravest perils to a man on the northern trail. It is practically second nature for a soldier, especially if he has come straight from an orange-blossom climate, to wrap everything around himself except the kitchen linoleum when he feels the temperature falling to 60 below.

This is where Colonel von Zelinski's "cold-weather discipline" enters the situation. Our soldiers along the Alaska Highway have been schooled against dressing too heavily. All of them have been warned that men freeze to death when their inner clothing, becoming saturated with moisture from perspiration, conducts the heat from the body and then freezes hard. Another maxim hammered home is that several layers of light clothing are infinitely warmer than a single layer of equal weight. And no soldier is allowed to wear tight shoes or breeches that pinch at the knee. "Tight shoes mean frozen feet" is virtually an aphorism all the way from Dawson Creek to Fairbanks.

For what reason was all this pioneering and exploration undertaken?

The answer is simple—for the sake of anchoring, implementing and securing the air route to the North Pacific. From Edmonton to Fairbanks runs the route of the Alaskan Wing of the United States Army Air Forces. The Alaska Highway and communications system serve the air fields along this wilderness thoroughfare. On the highway have been transported the girders, cement, and other equipment which have transformed rough clearings in the evergreens into expansive airports with solid runways and permanent buildings.

You people of the Northwest will be proud and interested to know that a man whose home is in Portland, Oreg., commands the Alaskan Wing. He is Brig. Gen. Dale V. Gaffney, one of the pioneers of cold-weather flying. General Gaffney shares with a few American and Russian flyers the distinction of being one of the world's leading authorities on subzero aviation. He developed and planned the famous cold weather testing station at Ladd Field near Fairbanks. Under his command the Alaskan Wing functioned in frightfully bitter temperatures, often touching 70 degrees below zero. Even in these grim conditions, the men of the wing carried on rescue work, serviced planes on naked, blizzard-gripped runways and kept flying across the woods and mountains. General Gaffney, a pilot himself, served in the air corps in the First World War and was born near Methune, Mass.

The American people may be proud of the way in which their sons—whether in the Air Corps, Engineer Corps, quartermaster regiments or any other unit—have endured the bleak and harsh weather of the Arctic. Too much credit cannot be given the Medical Corps for this outstanding record.

Our station hospital at Whitehorse first was set up in tents. Then it was moved into an old tin-sided gymnasium. Major Mendel Silverman and his staff performed many successful operations in the most primitive conditions. Maj. William Joyce and Capt. Eugene Moscovitz risked their lives to fly through a fierce blizzard to a sergeant many miles north of Whitehorse who was stricken with acute appendicitis. Major Silverman organized a complete health program with the most limited sort of facilities.

This splendid care and treatment has extended all the way from the dispensaries along the road and at small air fields to the big general hospitals in the United States, where men are shipped for more extensive convalescence and observation. For a time in the winter of 1942–43 I was a patient at Barnes General Hospital not far from here, in Vancouver, Wash. The care, medicines, attention, and general treatment which I received there would compare, in my layman's opinion, with any hospital in the Nation. I found the doctors and staff executives conscientious and sincere, and vitally interested in the progress of each patient, whether he was officer or enlisted man.

Coming back to the United States, after more than a year and a half of service in the Far North, I see many luxuries and frivolities. Some people are disposed to patronize black markets, fake applications for "B" and "C" gasoline cards, and otherwise use this grim and tragic war as a means of furthering their own selfish desires. This was not so in the sub-Arctic. Men there put up with trying conditions and limited facilities, and although there was the usual Army "griping," the work went forward despite any and all difficulties. I have seen Negro soldiers standing in icy water to their armpits to build a timber bridge. I have watched white troops starting bulldozers and trucks with numbed hands at 60 degrees below zero.

For the first 3 months of its existence the Northwest Service Command operated from a single old temporary C. C. C. building. We had offices in the front of the structure, and we lived in a long hall at the back. Col. Kenneth B. Bush, our chief of staff, and a veteran of six major engagements in the last World War, handled a myriad of details from an office about the size of a steamer trunk. At midnight he still would be hunched over his desk, organizing and planning, and early in the morning he would be back on the job, ready for another 16 hours of work. Soldier railroaders on the White Pass & Yukon Railroad were lucky to sleep 5 hours out of 24 when snowslides plugged the line. I wish the civilians who lag on the war effort could have seen Colonel Bush in that little plywood office or those soldiers shoveling snow in the Yukon fastnesses.

General O'Connor displayed a spirit of leadership which was magnificent. He got from his men a loyalty and fidelity that were in a class by themselves.

Capt. William Hammond, of the Twenty-ninth Engineer Battalion, mushed 560 miles across the Mackenzie Mountains from Whitehorse to Fort Norman, but first he asked the Royal Mounties how they would keep alive on such a trek. Throughout his equipment and around the sleds, on their advice, he scattered big blocks of sulfur. If his hands froze too stiff to grip a match, he could always use wrists and palms to ignite the blocks. He also carried a pail of oil-soaked rags. Perhaps survival might depend upon getting a fire started quickly. If you break through a hidden spring on the trail, it requires only a few minutes for wet legs to freeze. And around his neck on a blue lanyard he hung his G. I. mitten of wolfskin. Once laid down, the mittens might never be picked up again by fingers rapidly stiffening at 70 degrees below. The lanyard was assurance that the mittens would always be available. It was 70 degrees below, and winds scoured the Mackenzie passes, but Hammond completed his mission and returned by dog sled, too, a total journey of more than 1,100 miles across unexplored terrain.

Hammond's mission was a volunteer one. General O'Connor wanted the job done and Hammond did it. When he arrived at Fort Norman, worn out and exhausted, he knocked on the door of the commanding officer's cabin and said, "General O'Connor sent me." He seemed like an apparition. Had he crossed those forbidding mountains in the dead of the Arctic winter? How had he done it? And the phrase "General O'Connor sent me" has now acquired Message to Garcia implications in the land where the aurora borealis flickers.

Of the 1,600 miles of the Alaska Highway, approximately 1,240 are on the soil of our sister nation and ally, the Dominion of Canada. From the people and officials of Canada we received the most outstanding courtesy. General O'Connor, Colonel Bush, and I visited Ottawa in February of 1943 and had the pleasure of being the guests of the Prime Minister and members of his Cabinet. We found all the citizens of Canada—regardless of political belief—eager to cooperate in the work of the American Army. At Edmonton we received the most outstanding cooperation from Maj. Gen. W. W. Foster, a distinguished Canadian officer, who has served as special liaison officer between the Canadian Government and the American construction projects.

We also had the pleasure of many favorable contacts with that illustrious Canadian soldier, Maj. Gen. George R. Pearkes, commanding Canada's Pacific Army Command. General Pearkes is one of the most decorated of the Dominion's fighting men. And we recall with satisfaction our association with such other noteworthy Canadians as Maj. Gen. John Peter Mackenzie, Maj. Gen. H. H. Ganong, Hon. John Hart, premier of British Columbia; Hon. Ernest C. Manning, premier of Alberta, and Dr. Charles Camsell, commissioner of the Northwest Territories and one of the noted authorities on the Far North.

I think General O'Connor summed up this friendly situation between our two lands when he asked last year, "Where else would one nation be allowed to construct a highway for 1,200 miles on its neighbor's soil and be given such outstanding cooperation?"

To a very great degree, the Alaska Highway and other undertakings in the sub-Arctic have demonstrated the capacity and resourcefulness of the average American soldier. When some of our sob-sisters and weepers decry the passing of American spirit, I think of the boys who hacked a road through a wilderness as trackless as that crossed by the covered-wagon trains which went to Oregon in 1850. I think of Negro soldiers, from the deep South, who drove trucks at 45 degrees below zero. I think of the white troops who pioneered the transportation system down the Mackenzie River to Fort Norman. I think of Captain Hammond driving his dog team across the Pelly Mountains. I think of Major Joyce and Captain Moscovitz flying through a blizzard in the darkness to aid a stricken sergeant. I think of Major Silverman operating with numbed fingers in a tent. I think of Colonel Bush handling a thousand administrative details from his tiny plywood office. I think of Capt. Roland Small, a Jewish engineer from New York City, who lost his life helping to blaze the highway through the foothills of the lofty St. Elias Range. I think of General O'Connor sleeping in a tent in the Yukon wilderness, sharing potluck and cold quarters with his men.

If the pioneering spirit is dead in America it is dead only among those who, from their ivory towers and night-club bivouacs, send others to do their job. The average American soldier is as much a pioneer as those soldiers of a century ago who followed Fremont and Kearney and Bonneville on the explorations undertaken by the War Department of the American West.

There is a stanza by Houseman that I like:

"These in the days that Heaven was falling,
The hour that Earth's defenders fled,
Stood to their ancient calling,
Took their wages and are dead."

Most of the American soldiers who conquered the Yukon and Alaska fastnesses are still very much alive, but in an hour of crisis they stood to an ancient calling and helped save this continent. They blazed a land and aerial route to Alaska when the enemy threatened our North Pacific bastions. And their place in the history of the North Country is immortal.

"By Executive Order"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK FELLOWS
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. FELLOWS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Bangor Daily News of Saturday-Sunday, April 29–30, 1944:

"BY EXECUTIVE ORDER"

Specifically, the Montgomery Ward case boils down to this:

The collective-bargaining law directs that the employing company must arrange its labor policies by negotiation and contract with whatever union has a membership which includes the majority of its employees; and that the majority shall be ascertained by means of balloting among the employees—that is, by an election held under the auspices of the presumably neutral National Labor Relations Board.

In the Montgomery Ward organization, the management had such a contract with a C. I. O. union. This contract expired. How about its renewal?

The union parties to the contract maintained that they still represented the majority of the employees. The management said it was not convinced. Everybody agreed that there should be an election—at first. But everybody knew that the National Labor Relations Board requires considerable time to prepare for an election. The union asked a temporary contract, to cover the interim. The management replied that, under the law, it would not make a temporary contract, because it doubts whether the union represents the majority of employees.

Then the C. I. O. union members strike. And then the President of the United States sends soldiers to the scene—and ousts the management by sheer force.

For the seizure itself, there are comparatively recent precedents aplenty, yet no perfect precedent. Existing precedents generally antedate passage of the Smith-Connally law.

The President argues that he is acting on behalf of the War Labor Board and in conjunction with it. David Lawrence has given, in these columns, an adequate answer. The Smith-Connally law provides that the War Labor Board, an emergency makeshift, must adhere to the terms of the permanent National Labor Relations law. Under the terms of that law, Montgomery Ward seem clearly correct in their decision to make all contract-renewal await an election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board.

So much for the specific case. The inferential results of the President's course, the possibilities inherent in it, may be even worse:

It is said that Mr. Roosevelt is merely exercising his Presidential wartime powers. No President of the United States has any such powers except those given him by the Constitution or the Congress—and you will search the Constitution and the statute books in vain to discover justification for the deeds of Federal force in Chicago.

It is said that Montgomery Ward are liable to such treatment because they "distribute products indirectly to the war effort." What, in total war is not indirectly essential to the war efforts? The word "indirectly" is practically all inclusive. It covers 99 out of every 100 industries, businesses, trades. It is dictatorial dynamite.

In short, defenders of the administration's action in regard to Montgomery Ward are inferentially extending to infinity their theory that government by Executive orders may legally supersede government by constitutional legislation.

The application of such a theory would, quite simply, put an end to government by the people.

The Manpower Situation in the Cheese Industry

OF
HON. HARRY SAUTHOFF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, one of Wisconsin's greatest industries is the making of cheese. Our cheese makers have struggled under many adverse conditions to aid our country and her allies in this war emergency. Again and again, in spite of lack of materials and manpower, our cheese industry has increased production at the request of our Government. Now, however, the situation has become acute.

I take the liberty of calling the attention of the House and those in authority to the letter of Professor Clark, whose knowledge of this subject is outstanding. Professor Clark is honest, sincere, hard-working and absolutely reliable and his letter should be heeded.

UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN,
COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE,
Madison, April 26, 1944.

Congressman HARRY SAUTHOFF,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SAUTHOFF: Yours in regard to the cheese makers' situation came yesterday. It seems to me that the present policy of Selective Service in drafting all men under 26 (except in certain specified categories) is contrary to the intention of Congress in enacting the original Selective Service act. You know better than I about this, of course.

When passed, I think it was felt that National Selective Service headquarters would be fully apprised of the needs of men for military service and would distribute the quotas among States for draftees. The local boards would then provide the knowledge and judgment on which to select the men who could best be spared from their current occupations. No other source of such knowledge and judgment on individuals was, or is, available. Various means were provided in the appeal boards and the State Selective Service headquarters for review and checking actions of local boards. Recently in Public Law 229, State extension services were authorized to furnish information regarding farm registrants to local boards.

Recent directives from General Hershey have eliminated entirely the place of local boards and even State headquarters in determining the relative essentiality of men under 26. No agency exists which can consider deferment of men between 18 and 26 except possibly the War Manpower Commission. The latter is incapable of discharging this function. It has neither the information nor the personnel to do it.

General Hershey's recent orders have in one stroke taken away from the local boards all the opportunity to exercise judgment and authority which Congress intended them to have. The Congress is the only hope of the people for the restoration of these powers.

No question of the personal interests of the men under 26 is involved, as I see it. The problem involved is that of retaining in their present occupation young men who are irreplaceable and essential. There is no substitute for the judgment of the local boards on these cases. The cheese makers are an example of such cases.

Sincerely yours,

W. W. CLARK,
Associate Director.

Governor Green of Illinois Addresses Electric Cooperatives

OF
HON. EVAN HOWELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein a speech by the Honorable Dwight H. Green, Governor of Illinois, on the occasion of the second annual convention of the member co-ops of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association at Chicago, Ill., on March 20, 1944.

Governor Green's speech follows:

On behalf of the people of the State of Illinois, I am happy to extend to the members of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association the warm and hospitable welcome which our State traditionally gives to her visitors. Your meeting this year is of the utmost importance because, like all Americans in every line of endeavor, you are faced with the task of preparing to meet the problems of the post-war era.

All of us are agreed that every branch of our economic system must be fully prepared to convert to a normal, peacetime basis as rapidly as possible if we are to avert the disaster of unemployment and the confusion and disillusionment which have followed in the wake of every war in history.

Jobs for veterans will naturally be our first concern, our most solemn obligation. But before we can provide productive, self-supporting jobs for our returning fighters, we must first take steps to set our entire economic system in order, because only strong, prosperous agriculture, industry, and labor can offer the permanent employment and security that is our ultimate goal.

As we turn our attention to the problem of post-war reconstruction, as we seek methods and means to guide our agriculture, industry, and labor over the shoals of reconversion to peacetime production, we must be certain that we dwell with equal emphasis on each, because it has been demonstrated over and over again that if one should fail, if one of the great branches of our economic system is allowed to fall into ruin, then all will fail.

In the field of post-war planning it seems to me that too little attention has been placed upon the needs and problems of agriculture. As Governor of Illinois, one of the richest, most productive agricultural regions in the world, I have had unlimited opportunity to observe our farmers at work on the home front in this war, and I know that when the conflict ends they are going to be faced with serious and menacing problems which must be solved if our plans for post-war prosperity are to be crowned with success.

You are all vitally concerned wtih these problems of agriculture. Indeed, many of you are experienced farmers engaged even now in tilling your soil to produce another record-breaking crop of foodstuffs to further the Nation's war effort. And your national association and its member cooperatives are closely connected with the progress of agriculture all over the Nation. When the war ends and we begin to return to normal conditions you will have an even greater share in the development of our agricultural production.

Here in Illinois, prior to 1936, our farmers had not had the advantage of electric service to any great extent largely because it had not been made available.

It is true that some progressive farmers had installed their own individual power plants, while others had been able to obtain service from commercial power lines. But since the organization of electric cooperatives began to spread and the commercial power companies speeded up their activities to meet this cooperative competition, the use of electricity on farms and in rural communities has increased four or five fold.

Latest reports show that more than 135,000 farm families, or approximately 65 percent of the total in Illinois, are benefiting by electric service.

Of this number approximately 49,000 farms are being served by cooperatives, while more than 86,000 receive service from public-utility companies.

The expansion of these services naturally has been at a standstill since Pearl Harbor because war industry has had vital need for the materials and supplies you use. But when peace comes the demand for your services will be greater than ever. There will be new and improved machinery for the farms, and there will be wonderful labor-saving and comfort-producing equipment for the rural homes which will call for more and more electric power.

Your problems in meeting this demand will be many. You will be forced to compete with other peacetime industries in securing the needed materials.

You will be faced with technical difficulties growing out of the extension of your lines and the greatly increased power loads they will be called on to carry.

In Illinois we believe that, without doubt, rural electrification will be one of the greatest of post-war projects. Our State Board of Rural Electrification is cooperating closely with the Illinois post-war planning commission which already is formulating definite and practicable plans for resumption of peacetime activities in agriculture, industry, and labor.

The State board of rural electrification has prepared maps and reports showing all details of rural electrification transmission and distribution lines in Illinois.

Cooperatives, public utilities, and municipal plants have been supplied with this data which would serve as a valuable guide for post-war expansion plans.

While we are in the midst of all this post-war planning we must not overlook the immediate problems of the war veterans returning from the armed services. Already thousands have come back to civil life, many of them burdened with disabilities, to overcome which it is our sacred duty to give every possible assistance. They must be fitted to fill jobs in the war industries now, as well as the jobs which our post-war planning will develop in peacetime.

In Illinois the Governor's Committee on Veteran Rehabilitation and Employment has been in operation for almost 2 years now and its program has been endorsed by the American Legion and other experts in veterans' care and has been recommended as a pattern for other States.

As war Governor of Illinois and as a veteran of the First World War, I have devoted a great deal of time and personal attention to the veterans' problems. It is my firmest conviction that our first and most solemn obligation is to the men and women who have risked death on the battlefronts of the world in defense of our country's freedom. I know that anyone who recalls the deplorable conditions at the end of the last war—when veterans returned to find no jobs, no plan or program to solve their problems—will be firmly resolved that it shall not happen again. We will not forget their suffering and sacrifices and we will express our undying gratitude with every reward which it is within our power to give—and what reward could be greater than an opportunity to enjoy the independence and security of a self-supporting job?

Our heroic sons and daughters are marching on toward victory on all the battlefronts of the world. God grant that victory may come soon, speeding the time when they will return to their homes in the cities and on the farms of America—and those who return to the farms will find working conditions improved and standards of living higher because of the benefits you contribute to the American way of living.

Opium Threat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter published in the Washington Post of April 28, 1944:

OPIUM THREAT

Were an epidemic of smallpox or yellow fever to threaten our troops overseas, or at home, there would be an immediate attempt to stamp it out. We ask why Congress has not taken on the passage of a measure that would check the spread of an infection infinitely more insidious—we mean the danger of opium contamination that is facing our troops in Asia.

Some time ago a resolution was introduced by Representative JUDD of Minnesota requesting the President to urge the opium-producing countries of Asia to restrict their cultivation of the poppy to the world's legitimate medicinal need. It was not too soon. We have known for many months of the havoc wrought by the Japanese in China by the use of opium, which they have termed an instrument of war, with which they have demoralized and destroyed the resistance of the Chinese. In a recent short-wave radio from China it was stated that in Manchuria and Jehol, Japan has forced the planting of 46,260 acres of poppies producing an annual crop of 2,800 pounds of opium. Under their encouragement 13,000,000 Chinese in the northern provinces are addicted to opium smoking. They have also established large drug factories in Mukden, Harbin, and other cities for the manufacture of morphine and heroin. In Harbin during the last half year, 1,568 corpses of drug addicts were found in the streets. In other cities they have forced the manufacture of hundreds of thousands of narcotic pills to be sold under military pressure in provinces occupied by Japan, and attemps are being made to smuggle the pills across the Yellow River in order to spread the poison into Free China.

In Iran, where thousands of our American troops are guarding the lend-lease goods being sent to Russia, the production of opium would more than meet the needs of the world's medicinal market. In that country there is little if any control over the production or distribution of this dangerous drug. Our soldiers and seamen are constantly being approached by opium peddlers, and the port of Basra on the Persian Gulf has become a seat of infection where the drug can be obtained at a minimum price and with little difficulty smuggled into the United States and sold at an immense profit.

Congress should take immediate action on the resolution which has been under consideration.

ACTION NOW.

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the Indianapolis Times of Saturday, April 29, shows that the President is not fooling anyone by the special privileges which he has been and is extending to some labor politicians.

That editorial is as follows:

BUT WHERE ARE THE TROOPS?

In Chicago an employer whose operations the Government considers essential to the war effort refuses to sign a contract with a union of his employees and the union, in retaliation, takes steps that interfere with those operations. Quite promptly the President of the United States orders the Army to seize the business, and soldiers drag its elderly chairman kicking and squirming out of his office as the Government takes over.

In Indianapolis an employer whose operations the Government considers essential to the war effort refuses to sign a contract with a union of his employees and the union, in retaliation, takes steps that interfere with those operations. Do the troops march in here, too?

Well—not exactly. You see this Indianapolis employer is Daniel J. Tobin, general president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers, a great and good friend of the New Deal and high in its councils. The Chicago employer is Sewell Avery, head of Montgomery Ward & Co.

Except for the outcome, there isn't much difference between the two labor disputes. In each a labor union sought to negotiate a contract with an employer. Both employers refused to negotiate. Both unions appealed to the War Labor Board for support of their legal rights, and both took similar actions that halted distribution of their employers' products.

The War Labor Board ignored the appeal of Mr. Tobin's employees. It ordered Mr. Avery to sign a contract—"or else." Mr. Avery defied that order, and the Presidential order that followed. Soldiers with bayonets seized his business by force and the Federal Government operates it today.

Mr. Tobin first ordered all the union employees fired—an action specifically prohibited by the Wagner law—then backed down and rescinded their discharge under heavy criticism. Up to today he still had refused to negotiate a contract.

And up to today there had been no stern orders from Washington, no sound of marching feet in East Michigan Street—and not a bayonet in sight around the offices of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffers, Warehousemen, and Helpers.

An Air Academy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. M. FERNANDEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the April 27 issue of the Las Vegas Daily Optic, published in Las Vegas, N. Mex.:

AN AIR ACADEMY

Representative FERNANDEZ yesterday introduced a bill in the House for the location in New Mexico of a memorial to American defenders of Bataan. His bill provides that such memorial shall be an Army aviation academy similar in rating and importance to the Army, Navy, and Marine academies of historic fame.

Here is something for the people of New Mexico to support without intercommunity or sectional division and from which political considerations should be eliminated. By harmonious action which would leave the selection of location to the military authorities, when and if the bill passes, New Mexicans can help contribute something tangible to honoring the memory of those hundreds of its young citizens who died in battle or in the tortures of Japanese prison camps in the Philippines.

In each section of the State, not excluding our part of the mountainous northern area, there is an aviation training base in operation under Army or Navy supervision. Some of these are even larger than would be required in serving a "West Point of the Air" training program. Conversion of any of those bases for continued use after the war would be not only economical but wise.

It is known that complete and detailed surveys have been made by the Army Air Forces command for the establishment of just such a course of training. The projected plan has been fitted to a number of airbases in Texas, Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona. It has been found not only feasible but highly potential in preparing commanding officers for our future air forces.

Representative FERNANDEZ' proposal can be enacted to the lasting benefit of New Mexico if it does not arouse envious bidding from other States. It will be the Congressman's task to present evidence that New Mexico is best suited to the actual operation of such an academy as well as most entitled to consideration as the site for such a memorial to the heroic soldiers of Bataan.

Launching of the U. S. S. "Chehalis"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED NORMAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. NORMAN. Mr. Speaker, the city, river, and valley of Chehalis, Lewis County, Wash., have all been honored recently by the Navy Department by the selection of the name Chehalis for a large Navy tanker launched at Savage, Minn., on April 15.

By special orders the Navy Department arranged for Seaman Frank E. Junkin, son of Mr. and Mrs. T. K. Junkin, of Chehalis, to represent his home city and Lewis County at the launching. Seaman Junkin made the speech in behalf of his home folks just before the great vessel moved down the ways.

The people of Chehalis and Lewis County have responded fully in all the past loan drives. They are fully deserving of the recognition the Navy Department has accorded them.

Following is news story from the Chehalis Advocate on the launching:

U. S. S. "CHEHALIS" IS LAUNCHED IN MINNESOTA—FRANK JUNKIN REPRESENTS CHEHALIS AT CEREMONY

The U. S. S. Chehalis is in the water of the Minnesota River, having slid down the ways during a colorful launching ceremony Saturday at Savage, Minn.

A crowd of 5,000 defied the windy and snowy weather to see the naval auxiliary tanker launched, and to hear a short but impressive speech by Seaman (2d cl.) Frank Junkin, who represented Chehalis.

In a letter received by Arthur S. Cory, chairman of arrangement for the special Chehalis-Kiwanis committee. Cargill MacMillan, vice president of Cargill, Inc., builders of the ship, stated that the launching "went off very successfully, and Frank Junkin handled himself very well and was a distinct credit to your city. He spoke a few words and did it very well, indeed. Unfortunately, the weather was abominal. There was quite a wind and it was snowing."

Mr. MacMillan added that Frank has the remains of the bottle used for sponsoring and containing a sample of Chehalis River water. Frank intends to send it back to Chehalis.

Considerable publicity came to Chehalis in Minnesota through the launching. The Minneapolis newspapers carried pictures and stories of the launching, with emphasis on the bottle of Chehalis River water. In addition, Congressman FRED NORMAN plans to have remarks on the event published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Chehalis was christened by Mrs. J. H. MacMillan, wife of the chairman of the board of the Cargill Co.

Frank Junkin has two brothers, also in the service. Jim is a lieutenant in the Marine Corps and is serving in the Pacific. Bill has already served for some time in the South Pacific, and is now taking training at the University of Washington which will lead to a commission in the Navy.

The event marked the beginning of an intensive drive in Chehalis to raise a million dollars in war bonds to equip the ship. The drive will continue through the Fifth War Loan.

A Record of Service

OF

HON. JAMES P. RICHARDS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House to direct attention to the unusual record of a constituent of mine as a member of the South Carolina Legislature. Only a few days ago Representative W. R. Bradford, of Fort Mill, S. C., completed his twentieth session in the house of representatives. No other man, I am informed, in the long history of York County, a history which runs concurrent with the life of the Nation, has been similarly honored.

During his legislative service Representative Bradford has continuously been a member of the ways and means committee and has served as chairman of that group. He also has been on numerous other important committees and commissions—one, a joint good roads committee, of which he was chairman, laid the foundations for the fine highway system of South Carolina.

At present, one of Mr. Bradford's assignments is the joint committee on Indian affairs, which has been interested in arranging the details of a plan under which Federal assistance has been accorded the Catawba Indians, who live in York County.

These Indians compose the only Indian group in South Carolina still retaining their tribal identity. They reside on a State reservation. When I came to Congress, I introduced bills which would make the Catawbas wards of the Federal Government. At first, I ran up against a stone wall of opposition. The Office of Indian Affairs and the Indian Affairs Committee of the House refused to report the bill favorably on the ground that the members of this tribe, like a few other small tribes in the United States, had never been wards of the Federal Government and that there was no basis for Federal responsibility. I then decided to pursue another course. I had numerous conferences with Mr. Collier and his assistant, Mr. Zimmerman, of the Office of Indian Affairs, with a view to getting Federal aid for the tribe. I also went over the history of the Catawbas with Secretary of Interior Ickes. He showed great sympathy and interest and instructed Mr. Collier to go the limit under exitsing law in an effort to remedy the conditions of the Catawbas. A plan was then worked out whereby it was proposed that the State of South Carolina and the Federal Government enter into an agreement to rehabilitate these Indians. The State responded; and, as a result, the Federal and State Governments have agreed to a plan and signed the contract wherein and whereby it is hoped that the Catawbas will receive the consideration and help to which they are entitled.

The Catawbas now number about 300 and have a score or more of volunteers—all the able-bodied young men—in the armed services. South Carolina is doing its part to establish the Catawbas in better homes on more than 3,000 acres of fertile land which has been added to their old reservation.

In addition to his long service in the House of Representatives, Mr. Bradford has for many years been an active and influential newspaper editor. I wish for him many more years of activity and achievement in the public service and the newspaper field.

The Montgomery Ward Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the editorial comment of the Cincinnati Enquirer on the seizure of Montgomery Ward & Co. by the military forces of the United States is both interesting and timely:

IT ISN'T AMERICAN

The highly irregular affair at Chicago yesterday, in which the chairman of Montgomery Ward & Co. was forcibly ejected from the premises of his own company, is not only to be decried as an incident. It is to be feared as a precedent.

It may be that the company head, Sewell L. Avery, had been intransigent in his attitude on the long-standing labor dispute; for the moment the details of the union controversy are unimportant. What is important, we believe, is the fact that the power and authority of the Federal Government has been used to seize a private business and to forcibly interfere with its management by the officials chosen by the owners of the business.

We have had instances where such forceful means were used to insure the continuation of essential public services, and felt them not out of place under the circumstances. If a strike or other similar form of work stoppage develops in a public utility, or a plant producing implements needed immediately in the war effort, the right and propriety of Government intervention is not very questionable.

Montgomery Ward, however, is purely and simply a business, albeit a big one which plays an important role in civilian supply. When the Government goes to the length of taking it over and sending soldiers in to carry out bodily the head of the concern, no one associated with any form of private business in the United States can feel unaffected by the precedent.

Whatever the merits of the union controversy at Montgomery Ward, the seizure of the company properties and the manhandling of Mr. Avery are inexcusable. It borders upon the fantastic that there is no other, much more orderly process of law or government by which the controversy might have been resolved.

The news and pictures describing the incident at Chicago yesterday did not look to us like an event in America. They had the strong taint of the sort of stuff that Europe became infamous for during the last decade. We should have other ways to handle things in America.

H. O. L. C. Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. RICHARDS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert an article published in the Columbia (S. C.) Record giving a brief history of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. The article is by the Honorable James A. Hoyt, who held a responsible position with the H. O. L. C. and who is one of the best-informed men in America today:

HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION DEFENDED

Several weeks ago there appeared in the editorial columns of the Columbia Record an article which was extremely critical of the operations of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. The article concluded with this expression, "Never again."

May I dissent from the editorial conclusion? I do so, because the article was evidently based on biased information, and because the implications of the article reflect more or less seriously on several South Carolinians, some of whom are not now living, and cannot speak for themselves.

Permit me, briefly, to give a little history of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which was organized under one of the first acts passed by the Democratic Congress in 1933, under the first Roosevelt administration. The purpose was twofold: First, to stop foreclosures on urban real estate, and second, to give relief to the banks and building and loan associations which were frozen with real-estate loans.

Both of these objectives were accomplished, and accomplished speedily and effectively and intelligently.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation was placed under the management of the board of directors of the Federal Home Loan Bank System, who became the directors of the new corporation. When the H. O. L. C. Act went into effect, upon its signature by the President, June 15, 1933, the directors were: William F. Stevenson of Cheraw, S. C., chairman; and T. D. Webb, of Nashville, Tenn., Democrats, and Carroll B. Merriam, of Topeka, Kans., Republican.

The secretary of the bank board, A. E. Hutchison, of Rock Hill, S. C., for many years reading clerk of the South Carolina House of Representatives and secretary to Mr. Stevenson when in Congress, was made general manager of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. He selected as his two assistants his close personal friends of many years' standing, William P. Goodman, then city manager of Rock Hill, and James A. Hoyt, then temporarily residing in Columbia.

The general counsel of the bank board was Horace Russell, of Atlanta, who became general counsel for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. He had drawn the act, largely. His advice and counsel to the board proved to be admirable. He was, and is, one of the ablest lawyers in the country and one of the best posted on real estate law and conditions.

An office was hurriedly set up in each State, and a State manager appointed. For South Carolina, Mr. Stevenson personally selected his former law partner, Mr. D. S. Matheson, of Cheraw, as manager for South Carolina. His assistant was Bruce W. Ravenel, of Columbia.

South Carolina has never produced a finer citizen than D. S. Matheson. Like his friend, Mr. Stevenson, he has passed on, and it is largely respect for the memory of these two which has caused this article to be written, by one who knew and admired them both.

In South Carolina, under Mr. Matheson and his assistants, in the 3 years of active operation, ending in June 1936, there were made 5,683 loans, aggregating $14,478,610.

It is not likely that any of the recipients of these loans in South Carolina would agree with the editorial exclamation—"Never again."

Of these 5,683 South Carolina loans, 1,894 have been paid in full and approximately 440 of the borrowers still on the books are now making monthly payments in excess of the amount required under their contracts.

As of September 30, 1943, the latest figures available from the books of the Corporation, the total amount of outstanding loans of the Corporation in South Carolina, together with the value of the properties acquired, has been reduced, through collections and the sale of its properties to a balance of $5,274,889, about equivalent to 63.4 percent.

Of the 5,683 loans, about 11 percent, to be exact, 644, were forcelosed. Of these properties taken over, the Corporation states that all but 5 have been sold.

It must be remembered that under the stringent provisions of the act, only "distressed" mortgages could be taken over—that is, loans that were being foreclosed or about to be foreclosed.

When the Home Owners Loan Corporation was set up, in June 1933 with a capital of $200,000,000 and authority to issue $2,000,000,000 in bonds, subsequently increased, it was the largest real estate loan operation in the history of the world, and it still is. To project such an undertaking, to foresee its extent and its accounting and mechanical necessities, was a very big job, and the job had to be done under extremely high pressure. It should be judged not under the coinditions of war prosperity in 1944 but in the light of the conditions then existing, marking the depth of the deepest depression this country has ever known. God grant it may never know another.

The Board appointed the general counsel, Mr. Russell, and the assistant general manager in charge of the Finance and Accounting Division, as a committee to draw up a plan of operation. That plan, prepared after days of hard work and nights of study, was substantially adopted. It was forcasted that the Corporation would make about 1,000,000 loans, averaging about $3,000.

The figures of the Corporation will show that the total number of loans made by the Corporation in its Nation-wide operations, and including the loans made in Hawaii, Alaska, and Puerto Rico, amounted to $3,485,348,743 in value and to 1,017,821 in number.

The forecast was not far wrong.

It is officially stated to me, March 30, 1944, that as of September 30, 1943, the "dollar value of the active accounts outstanding, together with the value of the Corporation's acquired properties, amounted to $1,535,772,767, or a liquidation of $1,949,575,981, equivalent to 55.9 percent."

In this connection it should be said that the loans were originally made for 15 years, and that later the Board was given authority by Congress to extend the loans to 25 years in certain justifiable cases.

Shortly after the organization of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation the Board was changed. Mr. Merriam, an experienced mortgage banker and a director of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. and of the Santa Fe Railroad, was transferred in 1933 to the Board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (where in 1935 I joined him as his assistant). Mr. Hawkins, from the west coast, was made a director. He was then in ill health and died not very long after his appointment. The other two directors were Walter H. Newton, Republican, who had been secretary to President Hoover, and who proved one of the best men on the Board, and John Fahey, of Massachusetts, who in the fall of 1933 became Chairman in place of Mr. Stevenson, who remained a member of the Board until ill health compelled his retirement.

LIQUIDATION NOW

The present discussion in the Congress and in the press of the affairs of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation springs largely from the agitation by Senator Byrd and others for the immediate liquidation of the corporation, which is opposed by the management now in charge.

This is a proposal which should be passed on without prejudice on the one hand and without personal interest on the other.

Jimmy Byrnes has more than once said that the nearest thing we know to immortality on this earth is a Government agency. All of them, perhaps naturally, fight for their lives.

In the case of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, whatever may be the motives of those agitating for liquidation (and the writer does not assign or judge motives) it seems that good business judgment would indicate that in the time of prosperity, when concerns such as large insurance companies and banking institutions and building and loan associations have surplus funds and are looking for good, sound real-estate loans—it would seem that this is the time for the Government to get out of the real-estate-loan business.

These institutions, which, after all, are the largest buyers of Government bonds, are certainly not undeserving of consideration. The Government, through the H. O. L. C., in 1933, relieved these institutions of their bad loans, but that is no argument against permitting them to buy the loans now in the hands of the Government, which the Government took as an emergency measure and not as a permanent investment. It was never intended that the Government would remain forever in that business.

It is no argument against liquidation to assert that these borrowers should not be turned over to the mercy of private lenders. The terms of the mortgages are plainly stated therein, and a purchaser would be bound thereby, just as would the purchaser of any other obligation.

That the poor loans might not be sold is evident, but it is better to maintain a small organization to collect these than a great organization to collect these, along with the good loans.

That losses in liquidation now would be very much, if any, larger than losses if the Government should hold the loans until all have matured is not demonstrable, nor is it a persuasive argument in any sense, for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was not set up to make a profit, and it was expected from the first that it would have substantial losses. It was strictly a remedial emergency measure.

Now is the time for the Government to liquidate what was a splendid demonstration of a government's ability and willingness to assist its worth-while home owners in a desperate situation, the purpose having been fully and effectively accomplished.

Ship Repairs Aid in Atlantic Fight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, in connection with certain charges contained in the Annual Report of the Comptroller General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, wherein Comptroller General Warren charged the War Shipping Administration with use of a cost-plus-a-percentage-of-cost form of contract, which has been discussed by Admiral Land in his letter of April 13, 1944, elsewhere extended in this day's Appendix of the RECORD to which reference is here made, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the Appendix of the RECORD today an article from the New York Times of April 16, 1944, further discussing the same subject under the caption "Ship repairs aid in Atlantic fight."

SHIP REPAIRS AID IN ATLANTIC FIGHT—LAND BACKS IGNORING VIEWS OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL ON CONTRACTS

WASHINGTON, April 15.—Rear Admiral E. S. Land, War Shipping Administrator and Maritime Commission Chairman, said today the battle of the Atlantic might have been seriously prolonged, or even lost for the time being if we had endeavored to follow the views of the Comptroller General on ship-repair contracts.

In a letter to Representative BLAND, chairman of the Merchant Marine Committee, he defended his agencies' policies against criticisms expressed by Comptroller General Lindsay Warren in his annual report.

Among other complaints, Mr. Warren charged the W. S. A. with use of a cost-plus-a-percentage-of-cost form of contract in violation of the law, and with allowing excessive overall or composite hourly billing rates for ship repairs, due in part to the inclusion of direct charges also in overhead.

"These two charges," Admiral Land wrote, "presumably relate to an interpretation placed by the Comptroller General upon the type of contract used by both the Navy Department and the Maritime Commission in connection with ship repairs. The general counsel of the Commission at the time the form of ship-repair contract referred to was adopted was of the opinion that they did not constitute a cost-plus-a-percentage-of-cost contract and is still of the opinion.

"Both the Navy Department and the Maritime Commission, even before we became directly involved in the war, and when it became apparent that there would be a large volume of emergency ship repairs, entered into negotiations with the ship-repair industry with a view to effecting contractual arrangements which would preclude the high rate of profit which had previously obtained generally in the ship-repair industry and which under peace conditions was perhaps necessary for the survival of the repair companies because of the sporadic character of their work.

"While the Navy Department and the Maritime Commission found it impractical to bring about a drastic change in the method of billing for time and material which had been in general vogue for many years in the ship-repair industry, they were able, prior to the attack on Pearl Harbor, to bring about an understanding to the effect that the profit would be limited to 10 percent and that the rates charged would from time to time be subject to such revision as would bring about that result."

Mr. Speaker, in the same connection I ask unanimous consent to extend certain excerpts from House Report No. 846, Seventy-eighth Congress, first session, on H. R. 3477, continuing the Commodity Credit Corporation as an agency of the United States. The excerpts referred to relate particularly to commercial and governmental audits and are as follows:

Section 2 extends the life of the Commodity Credit Corporation as an agency of the Government to June 30, 1945, or such earlier date as may be fixed by the President by Executive order. Section 2 further provides for an audit of the capital fund operations of the Commodity Credit Corporation by the General Accounting Office. It is provided that this audit shall be made in accordance with principles applicable to commercial corporate transactions. Since the establishment of the Corporation in 1933, its capital-fund operations have been subjected to a commercial type of audit by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as an incident to the financial relationship between the two corporations. In addition, many of the capital-fund operations which are carried out through the facilities of the Federal Reserve banks have also, because of the interest of the banks in these operations, been subjected to a commercial type of audit by these banks. Moreover, pursuant to the act of March 8, 1938 (52 Stat. 107, as amended), the Treasury Department makes an annual appraisal of the assets and liabilities and a determination of the net worth of the Corporation and reports the same annually to Congress. The administrative expenses of the Corporation are audited by the General Accounting Office in accordance with the regular governmental type of audit as required by the appropriation act making funds of the Corporation available for these expenses. This audit of administrative expenses by the General Accounting Office is not disturbed by the bill, but the audit of the capital-fund transactions provided by this bill could replace the commercial type audit made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

As an incorporated agency of the United States the Commodity Credit Corporation follows business methods and procedures in the performance of its functions rather than the customary pattern of Government department or bureau operations. Flexibility in operation, an essential attribute of the corporate form of organization, is indispensable to the accomplishment of the functions and objectives for which Congress has directed that the Commodity Credit Corporation be employed. The War Food Administration and the Comptroller General of the United States agree that the regular governmental type of audit is not adaptable to the capital fund operations of the Commodity Credit Corporation.

In general, the purpose of the governmental type of audit is to determine the validity of expenditures under appropriations made by the Congress, in the light of restrictions and limitations placed by the Congress generally upon the expenditure of appropriated moneys. It is a part of a system designed to enforce the personal accountability of governmental officers authorizing or expending those funds upon the basis of documents and records usually submitted to the General Accounting Office and retained in its custody. In contrast, the commercial type of audit is separate and apart from the accounting system and internal financial control of the Corporation and is designed to determine the true financial condition of the Corporation as of a given date and the results of its financial operations during the period covered by the audit, as well as establishing whether the funds of the Corporation have been regularly expended in accordance with proper authorization. These determinations are made by detailed examination of the operating and financial records of the Corporation at the places where they are being used in the conduct of corporate business.

The Commodity Credit Corporation's fiscal responsibility is vested in the Corporation and not in the individual fiscal agents. In other words, the fiscal agents are responsible to the Corporation, which in turn is liable to the Federal Government for the Government's investment in the Corporation. The examination of the individual accounts of particular fiscal agents with a view to external control and settlement would not facilitate a determination of the financial standing or progress of the Corporation as a whole. Such an examination would, as a matter of fact, seriously interfere with the Corporation's internal financial management and impair the flexibility which is the very basis of the Corporation's existence.

The fundamental difference between the two types of audit, and the inadequacy of the governmental type of audit as applied to capital-fund operations of the Corporation, may be more clearly seen from a comparison of the procedures involved.

The governmental type of audit generally involves the following seven steps:

1. The fixing of the amount for which the disbursing officer is accountable under his bonded responsibility by reason of the advance of funds under particular appropriations upon accountable warrants and by reason of collections received by him;

2. The submission by the designated disbursing officer to the General Accounting Office for audit and settlement of an account supported by certified vouchers and by other original papers evidencing specific payments which he has made from the particular funds charged to him;

3. The examination by the General Accounting Office of these vouchers and other original supporting papers to determine whether the payments covered thereby were properly authorized and whether the expenditures represent valid obligations of the Government under the specific appropriation sought to be charged;

4. The settlement by the General Accounting Office of the disbursing officer's account and the determination of his liability to the United States;

5. The determination of the liability to the United States of the officer certifying for payment the items included in the disbursing officer's account;

6. The preparation and issuance of certificates of settlement incorporating all unexplained or unadjusted differences developed in the examinations of the accounts; and

7. The institution of collection proceedings if the accountable officer fails to pay over any balances found due from him in the settlement.

The commercial type of audit ordinarily made of large business corporations usually involves the following seven steps:

1. The establishment of the authorities of the various officers and employees by reference to the original articles of incorporation, bylaws, minutes of the board of directors, and other official authorizations taken in the name of the Corporation;

2. The verification, through appropriate checks, of the original general and subsidiary ledgers by comparison of original collection and disbursement documents with such ledgers and, in connection with this, the determination that all actions reviewed are properly authorized;

3. The verification from the original accounting records and supporting documents of the accuracy of all items appearing on the balance sheet, including verification of all cash on hand and in banks, and when needed, positive establishment of the existence of assets by physical inventory methods or through inquiries addressed to debtors and the determination of actual liabilities through inquiries addressed to creditors;

4. The review and establishment of the accuracy of any operating statements to determine that they clearly indicate the financial progress of the Corporation during the period covered by the audit, including proper reflection of any profits made or losses suffered;

5. Determination, in light of the action by the board of directors and any changes in the policies of the Corporation, that proper records are established and necessary safeguards developed correctly to reflect the financial operations of the Corporation and to protect the Corporation from financial loss which can be prevented by proper and adequate records and procedures;

6. The preparation of a report covering the audit, including certified financial statements and comments deemed appropriate by the auditor, such as recommendations for changes in the accounting procedure and records, errors still uncorrected at the completion of the audit, analysis of facts brought out in the financial statements, and the submission of such a report to the officials ordering the audit; and

7. The institution of corrective action by the corporate management.

Railroad Misstatements Regarding Future of Air Transport in New England

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the New Haven Railroad has been printing large full-page advertisements appealing to the people of New England to support it in its air-line operations. One of these advertisements appeared in the Washington Post for Tuesday, March 28.

The advertisement makes a statement concerning the present Civil Aeronautics Act, and its application to the matter of surface carriers acquiring an interest in air lines, which is absolutely incorrect. The advertisement states:

This is the coordinated transportation system southern New England needs. It can best be realized through a union of interests between our railroad and an established air line * * * by permitting our railroad to participate in such a combination through a minority financial interest in the air line. But not until the present ban against surface carriers engaging in aviation is lifted, can this program be put into effect.

Neither under section 408 (b) of the Civil Aeronautics Act nor under any decisions made by the Civil Aeronautics Board is there any ban, bar, or limitation whatsoever preventing a surface carrier from acquiring a true minority financial interest in an air line. Such action can be taken without securing the approval of any Government agency whatsoever.

The Civil Aeronautics Act applies only when a railroad seeks to acquire an interest in an air line which would give the railroad control of the air line. A true minority financial interest, not amounting to control, is in no way affected by the act.

If the New Haven Railroad is genuine and honest in its desires, it should cease misinforming the people of New England and of the country.

Oil for 1,000 Years

OF

HON. LEON H. GAVIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Oil City (Pa.) Derrick of April 29, 1944:

OIL FOR 1,000 YEARS

The Derrick is indebted to Franklyn Waltman, director of public relations, Sun Oil Co., for one very satisfying piece of information. He says that at the rate of depletion in 1943 we have known oil reserves sufficient to last us for 1,000 years.

This statement was made before the Foreign Policy Association in New York City April 15. Mr. Waltman started by saying he was without authority to speak for the petroleum industry. However, we can assume he spoke with the authority of the members of the Pew family who own the Sun Oil Co., and have made it one of the most successful in the world.

This family is the quintessence of conservatism. We have the assurance that Mr. Waltman knew what he was talking about. We know of nothing which will kill the Arabian pipe-line project quicker than this.

This pipe line is planned by Secretary Ickes, head of the Petroleum Reserves Corporation, a Government agency. He estimates its cost between $130,000,000 and $165,000,000. Mr. Waltman says the American petroleum industry unqualifiedly opposed the plan. "The premise upon which it is projected is that our domestic oil resources are nearing exhaustion—that after the war we shall be a mendicant for oil at foreign council tables—that we cannot 'oil' another war," said Mr. Waltman, who then continues:

"This premise is without foundation. The petroleum industry repudiates it and all of its implications. It is a piece of subterfuge offered in an attempt to justify a project which cannot withstand scrutiny upon its own merits. Exactly the same things were said in the latter stages and immediately after World War No. 1. Time proved them to be false. Ever since America became a nation on wheels somebody or other in authority has been predicting that within a few years our oil resources would be exhausted.

"The truth is that during this war the American petroleum industry has taken more crude oil out of the ground than in any similar period and it has a greater volume of known reserves underground than have ever been previously recorded.

"In 1943, when the production of crude oil in the United States reached an unprecedented high of 1,503,000,000 barrels—more than four times the amount that was produced in the last year of World War No. 1—our discoveries of oil equalled 99 percent of our production. These discoveries came within 18,000,000 barrels of meeting the unprecedented war demand, and to make up that difference we had to draw upon our previous accumulated reserve of over 20,000,000,000 barrels. How much do you think we reduced that reserve? We reduced it less than one-tenth of 1 percent. At that rate of depletion of reserve we have known reserves sufficient to last us for 1,000 years.

"Yet you are being told by persons high in authority that we only have enough oil in this country at the current rate of production for 14 years more. This conclusion is reached by dividing the current rate of production of one and one-half billion barrels into the existing reserve of over twenty billion barrels. In other words, they would have you believe that never again would we discover a single barrel of oil.

"To state the proposition thusly is to demonstrate its absurdity. As a matter of fact, millions of barrels of oil discoveries are being made every week. Instead of being our total resource, this 20,000,000,000-barrel reserve is but a fraction of our total reserve—it is our underground stock pile. What other industry has a 14-year stock pile available? Once the war is won and we get back to the free play of prices in a competitive enterprise system, there will be no more ground to worry about future oil supplies than there was after World War No. 1—and events have shown that those worries were absolutely baseless."

We are quoting this part of Mr. Waltman's address fully because we think it is the most remarkable statement about our oil reserves we have ever read. But if this were not enough, he says the pipe line would not make accessible any oil not already accessible. Oil in the Persian Gulf is already on the sea coast and can be shipped by tank steamer anywhere in the world; it will not result in the acquisition of any new oil or oil reserves for the United States or its citizens. It will in no way contribute to the prosecution of our war in Europe or in the Pacific.

Construction of the pipe line at this time would divert critical material and manpower, said Mr. Waltman, and its projection without consulting Britain or Russia has been disruptive of United Nations unity. As a preparatory step for a third world war this pipe line could create dangers and risks out of all proportion to the possible benefit.

The optional reserve of 1,000,000,000 barrels in a field controlled by American nationals is meaningless because in time of war all the oil produced by American companies or citizens anywhere in the world is available to our Government "if it can control the necessary routes to the desired destinations."

The proposed agreement, Mr. Waltman stated, will put our Government in the transportation business as owner of a pipe line traversing three foreign countries with the obligation of promoting and protecting the interests of those countries without reference to their future policies or existing spheres of influence. This means the maintenance of a permanent army in Arabia.

We would be promoting the development and marketing of oil from the Persian Gulf in competition with our own supplies and those of Latin America. Further it could easily pave the way to war. Finally, he says, private enterprise can best supply the capital required, the necessary managerial and technical skills and the operating knowledge for the development of foreign resources without involving the United States in international political dangers.

In conclusion, says Mr. Waltman, the American petroleum industry is now raising its voice in opposition to this proposal because it does not wish to have upon its head the blood of that war when it comes. "All the oil in Arabia is not worth the life of a single American boy needlessly sacrificed on a foreign battlefield."

There is the answer to Mr. Ickes' project.

Thirty-four Michigan Men Graduate From Federal Bureau of Investigation National Police Academy

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the third front has been opened on American home soil.

I refer to the broad program to curb juvenile delinquency being launched by Hon. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, in connection with the training course of the National Police Academy which he also heads.

Every Member of Congress is aware, I believe, of the splendid work that has been done by the National Police Academy. This great school has not only placed the same general training afforded G-men at the disposal of police officers, sheriffs, and other law-enforcing people, but it has melted away a barrier which once unfortunately separated the Federal police agents from State and local agents.

Much credit is due Mr. Hoover for bringing about harmony and unity of purpose in the agencies of the Nation which must deal with the vicious un-American element which haunts the shadows, preying upon our citizens.

And now another very forward step has been taken by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in placing special stress on the problem of juvenile delinquency which is indeed becoming a grave one.

Statements made by many of the noted lecturers who addressed the closing sessions of the academy a few days ago are worthy of review inasmuch as juvenile delinquency has become one of the major home front problems of the war.

That the solution of the problem does not rest in the theories of stratosphere thinkers has been made very clear by Director Hoover. He said:

> If the present surge of adolescent crime is to be stemmed it must be done through the wise and kindly administration of the home, and society in general which understands the needs of the child, his idealism, ambitions, and hopes.

Continuing he said:

> With our soldiers and sailors fighting on the world's battle fronts we of the F. B. I. have a bigger responsibility than ever before, because by keeping the home front secure and intact we are keeping faith with our men at war.
> We have become convinced that crime prevention is more important than crime apprehension. The 17- and 18-year-old child is no longer a juvenile. He is shrewder and has more knowledge than his father had at his age.
> It rests with the nation's fathers to direct the energies of 14- and 15-year-olds to wholesome pursuits.
> Police chiefs and those taking courses in the academy are urged to go forth, armed with the knowledge that the present emergency makes it imperative that they work with the established agencies in directing exuberant youth along the channels which make for good citizenship.

That not all juvenile delinquency can be placed in the laps of fathers and mothers was emphatically pointed out by Dr. Arthur L. Beeley, professor of sociology at the University of Utah, who addressed the academy.

While not entirely absolving parents, Dr. Beeley told the academy that:

> A mother's contribution is a drop in the bucket compared with the average movie. It would take a super-superparent to counteract the influence of the movies.

The church, the school, and other influences outside the home were emphasized as needing to participate in the correctional role in delinquency, and he urged upon the police officers their responsibility in awakening communities to their responsibilities in this great delinquency problem.

I cite these things as evidence of the very forward steps being taken down at the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its National Police Academy to cope with current and future problems.

To date 855 men have graduated from the National Police Academy. It was organized in 1935 to make advanced training in crime detection available to the entire law-enforcement field, has been instrumental in raising the standards of law enforcement generally. The graduates, who are carefully selected representatives of municipal, county, and State law-enforcement organizations, have returned to their own communities and established training schools, thereby making the instruction received available to approximately 100,000 local law-enforcement officers.

During the past year particular emphasis was placed upon national-security matters in the courses of instruction afforded the officers attending the National Police Academy. The graduates of the academy, many of them chiefs of police or occupying other high-ranking positions in the law-enforcement field, continued to be of great assistance to the F. B. I. in shouldering its responsibilities.

We in Michigan are proud of the fact that 34 of our State, county, and city law-enforcement officers have been privileged to attend and be graduated from the National Police Academy. Their training has greatly strengthened police work in our State, where we have a State highway police force, under the direction of Commissioner Oscar G. Olander, that is second to none.

Purchase of Paper by Government Should Be Centralized in Government Printing Office

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYLE H. BOREN

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following portion of a report of the A. N. P. A. committee on Federal laws at annual convention in New York City:

In the opinion of your committee a very important bill is now pending before the Congress calling for centralization of the purchase of paper for printing and binding and blank-book work in the Government Printing Office. Introduction of this bill, H. R. 3559, by Representative BOREN (Oklahoma) followed testimony presented before the Boren subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce by Public Printer Giegengack to the effect that although he had been trying to find out for years how much paper is used by the Government of the United States and all of its agencies he has never been able to do so. Mr. Giegengack testified that all Government printing was not channeled through the Government Printing Office.

The bill is before the House Committee on Printing and in March Representative JARMAN (Alabama) advised that the committee had taken no action. The bill has been sent to the Government departments concerned for their recommendations. Under the present set-up there is a lack of complete check on the amount of purchases by Government agencies as well as the amounts of paper on hand. In this time of paper shortages it seems to your committee most important that this bill should be acted on without delay and that steps should be put into effect immediately to get some sort of check on how much paper is used annually by all Government departments.

Emergency Flood Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAX SCHWABE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. SCHWABE. Mr. Speaker, the past few days press accounts as well as letters and telegrams from constituents living in the Midwest have called to our attention the unprecedented floods which have been raging in the lower Missouri and Mississippi Valley and their tributaries.

Ordinarily we make $1,000,000 per year available for emergency flood-control work. Last year, because of the unusual severity of the floods, we appropriated an additional $10,000,000, which was approved July 12. This sum, we are advised by the Army engineers, just about went around, and only about $40,000—a negligible sum in this great emergency—remains.

The immediate thing for us to bear in mind just now is that farmers must, because of the nature of their work, plan ahead, and with so many levees broken during the past few days and in view of an anticipated June rise, thousands of farmers will permit thousands of square miles of fertile river bottom land to lie idle unless funds are provided forthwith to rebuild the levees broken in the present floods. To wait until July will be too late to be of help for this year's crop. I am therefore introducing today a bill providing for $2,000,000 to be made immediately available as an emergency fund to be expended for the repair, restoration, and strengthening of the levees, and I trust the Congress will see fit to act without delay, not alone to help the farmers but in the interest of food production and the decisive part it has in our all-out war effort.

A bill to provide an immediate fund for emergency flood-control work made necessary by the 1944 floods

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $2,000,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to be made immediately available upon the passage of this act, as an emergency fund to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers for the repair, restoration, and strengthening of levees and other flood-control works which have been threatened or destroyed by the 1944 floods.

Workers and Women in Inter-American Relations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, May 1 is Labor Day in the other American republics, and hence is a good day on which to take stock of inter-American relations in the field of labor and social welfare.

This year May 1 finds a momentous conference sitting in Philadelphia—the twenty-sixth session of the International Labor Office. Both workers and women are taking a leading part, and some 70 out of 350 delegates and advisers are from Latin America. The lessons and results of the I. L. O. conference will have value for the winning of the peace through the attainment of full employment and high standards of living for all mankind if the workers' delegates and women present have their way. There should be many more women at such international gatherings, and the number of labor delegates should be at least doubled. Workers and women in my city of Tacoma, in the Evergreen State of Washington, and throughout the Nation and hemisphere have a vital stake in this great conference.

THE INTERNATIONAL LABOR CONFERENCE

It is fitting that one of our most distinguished women, Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins, should head the large and able United States delegation to the I. L. O. conference, and that Hon. ELBERT D. THOMAS of Utah, chairman of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, and Hon. MARGARET CHASE SMITH, the capable Congresswoman from Maine, should also be representing our country. Among the many other United States advisers helping to guide the conference are Robert J. Watt—like Philip Murray, of the C. I. O., a Scottish-born United States labor statesman—and his fellow A. F. of L. leaders, William Green, George Meany, Matthew Woll, and Marion Hedges. In addition, a notable adviser is the Most Reverend Francis J. Haas, well known in this Capital as a militant friend of Negro workers before his appointment to be Catholic bishop of Grand Rapids. An outstanding United States business adviser is Charles W. Taussig, authority on the sugar economy of the Caribbean area.

Among the issues first taken up by Latin American delegates to the I. L. O. conference were cartels and international monopolies which block progress and back reactionary forces in Latin America, creation of joint labor-employer-Government control over foreign firms, equality for small nations, wage discriminations on racial and national grounds such as the United States practices against Panamanians in the Canal Zone, and the seating of the Argentine labor delegate. Lombardo Toledano, the outstanding Latin American figure present, Mexican leader of the powerful Confederation of Latin American Workers, led the fight against Argentina's labor delegate on the grounds that Argentina is a Fascist dictatorship and a Nazi beachhead in the Americas which menaces our safety. Most Argentine workers are strongly pro-Allied and democratic, but their unions have been either destroyed or taken over by military tyrants who admire Franco and Hitler. Lombardo Toledano pointed out that Argentine labor leaders who escaped jail and harsh concentration camps came to the labor conference he called recently in Montevideo and approved the step he took to bar Argentine participation at least in the workers' group at the I. L. O. conference.

Lombardo Toledano, speaking for the over 4,000,000 Latin-American workers of his federation, claimed a victory over Argentine fascism in the 14-to-3 vote of the workers' delegates against the Argentine delegate. Lombardo Toledano will lead the Latin-American labor delegation which will soon leave for the world labor conference in London, called by the British Trades Union Congress, where additional heavy blows will be struck against fascism and for democratic labor progress. Philip Murray and the leadership of the C. I. O. are taking a keen interest in the London conference, the I. L. O. conference being of chief interest to the A. F. of L.

Vice President HENRY WALLACE, next to President Roosevelt our best-known and best-liked public man among Latin Americans, has paid the I. L. O. conference the compliment of publicizing its efforts to tackle the world's foremost post-war problem—jobs; first, for the returning soldiers; second, for the displaced war workers.

HEMISPHERE ROLE OF WOMEN

Over a dozen women are active participants in the current I. L. O. conference, and many women have been sent as observers or reporters by publications, the O. W. I., the United States Department of Labor, and by the newly created Labor Relations Divisions of the Department of State and Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs. I am glad to see this and to recall what our remarkable First Lady wrote in April regarding women at international gatherings:

Women value the conservation of human life more highly than reaching out for more power through force or trade. Women try to find ways to cooperate.

Mrs. Roosevelt added that there is much more social legislation where women have votes and a voice.

My plea is not for women at a peace conference only. It is for women in every meeting which deals with post-war problems.

I agree that women deserve a bigger role in pan-Americanism.

Mrs. Roosevelt has charted a new course for constructive feminine social and pro-labor action. She has rendered immense service selflessly, despite narrow and often politically motivated criticism, and has contributed to United States and international well being. Government and union officials can profit from Mrs. Roosevelt's example and rely more on women in discussions which shape inter-American relations. With characteristic energy, thoughtfulness, and social insight, Eleanor Roosevelt in March of 1944 promoted hemisphere understanding and relieved the tedium of life at isolated bases for scores of thousands of lonely American servicemen by visiting the bases scattered through the Caribbean and across northern South America. She traveled from northeastern Brazil, that great crossroads of vital air and naval traffic, to the far islands off Ecuador to greet and encourage the war role of North and South American workers and men in uniform. Mrs. Roosevelt told Latin-American journalists of her interest in what their armed forces and workers are contributing to the victory, and made a tremendous hit with our good neighbors. Newspapers in every Brazilian city, for example, front-paged stories and photographs of Mrs. Roosevelt's activities among cheering soldiers, sailors, and laborers. The strongly unionized river boat and dock workers of Barranquilla, Colombia, recognized Mrs. Roosevelt when she was driving through their city and gathered to applaud her as the world's leading woman envoy of good will.

Just before the I. L. O. met, the active and important Inter-American Commission of Women met at the Pan American Union under Senorita Minerva Bernardino and Miss Mary Cannon, a widely traveled official of the Women's Bureau of our Labor Department. This Commission was established by women of several American nations attending the Pan American Conference at Havana in 1928, and is steadily growing in usefulness by looking after the interests of women in the Americas. Mrs. Roosevelt gave this year's delegates a tea at the White House.

Women at the I. L. O. sessions have a particular contribution to make to the study of the extension of social security to humanity, the raising everywhere of living standards to promote prosperity, comprehensive medical and maternity care, child welfare, and the improvement of diet, housing, and facilities for culture, education, and recreation. Women will have an equal chance to contribute to the World Labor Conference in London. Women in Latin America as here are doing excellent work in war industries and the armed forces, in agriculture, the Red Cross, and their clubs and organizations for promoting hemisphere understanding and cooperation for winning both the war and peace.

NELSON ROCKEFELLER, COORDINATOR OF INTER-AMERICAN AFFAIRS

Nelson Rockefeller, whose work as Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs is now so well known throughout the Americas, spoke last month on the future of Pan-American relations before the National Council of Women and the Inter-American Commission of Women in New York, praising continental cooperation as highly promising for the future. It is here to stay, and is in the hands of the people.

In March, Nelson Rockefeller toured the valuable Central American projects of the C. I. A. A. and was enthusiastically greeted everywhere, especially in Nicaragua. There the Nicaraguan labor movement made him an honorary member, declaring that Rockefeller had won them by his genial, democratic sympathy for their problems, and that he was the first United States notable ever to make the effort personally to meet Nicaraguan workers. On May 1 Nicaragua will hold its first national labor congress, to which it has invited delegates from the A. F. L. and the other American republics.

Glowing praise has been given to Rockefeller's Inter-American Training Administration for bringing several hundred young Latin Americans to the United States to enter our factories and work with their hands, learning industrial methods and respect for labor and precision. Another sign of progress and managerial statesmanship was given on March 29 when the Creole Petroleum Co., which, I believe, Mr. Rockefeller was associated with during his stay in Venezuela before the war, agreed with the Venezuelan Ministry of Labor to soften the terrible effects of inflation and sharply increased wartime living costs by voluntarily raising the pay of its workers to make up to them the difference between past and present prices of staples. In addition, Standard Oil engineers have plans for new refineries and operations in the great oil republic and announced a moral obligation to give preference to Venezuela and its workers in future.

I have been acquainted with Nelson Rockefeller for over 3 years and am convinced of the sincerity of his concern with problems of inflation, living standards, health and sanitation, better diet and working conditions for Latin-American labor as a sound investment in United States and hemisphere prosperity.

A WHO'S WHO IN LABOR AND SOCIAL WELFARE IN LATIN AMERICA

Nevertheless, the serious crisis which threatens inter-American relations as a result of fascistic revolutions in Argentina, Bolivia, and Paraguay, and perhaps in other South American nations at any time as economic and labor conditions cause political unrest, caused me recently to suggest to Mr. Rockefeller the urgent need to increase United States Government activities in the field of labor and social welfare in Latin America.

It is true that since my demand before Congress on March 25, 1941, that labor be included in pan-Americanism, much has been done—but not enough to cope with the current crisis.

To check and offset the forces of fascism and unrest spreading in South America in particular, I called to Mr. Rockefeller's attention the desirability of cultivating contacts with labor, women's groups, and democratic and reform forces in Latin America. Despite the creation of small units to handle inter-American labor relations in the Pan American Union, the Office of Inter-American Affairs and the State Department, leading progressives and publications of the hemisphere have been criticizing the paucity of labor and social welfare ties in this period of social and economic dislocation and tension and would welcome the preparation and publication of a who's who in labor and social welfare in Latin America.

I pointed out to Mr. Rockefeller that the C. I. A. A. might care to undertake such a project as an invaluable reference for officials of our Government, of Latin America, of the A. F. L., C. I. O., and I. L. O.

MEXICAN LABOR LEADERS RESENT UNITED STATES POLICIES

Marshall Field's hard-hitting newspaper PM on March 12, 1944, sharply criticized our Government for failure to heed the views and problems of Latin-American labor and liberalism. Victor Bernstein of PM spent 2 weeks interviewing resentful Mexican laborities and progressives who complained at United States diplomacy and policies which virtually ignore prodemocratic elements while cooperating with tories, profiteers, and reactionaries. We ignore labor—the one group which is strongly for allied victory. United States officials do not know what Latin-American labor leaders are thinking. Allen Haden says the answer is a militantly democratic and prolabor foreign policy.

UNITED STATES LABOR LEADERS WANT STRONGER HEMISPHERE TIES

A number of United States labor leaders who have visited Latin-American unions, cooperativese, industrial centers, and social-welfare institutions have told me in reply to my recent inquires as to their views that they strongly approve of the compilation and publication of a Who's Who of Latin-America labor and social welfare. One leader, who toured six American republics last year in addition to praising the idea of a Who's Who which would stimulate the interchange of ideas and information in the hemisphere regarding labor and social welfare, suggested that labor attachés at our embassies in Latin America be more democratically chosen. He complained that the State Department apparently wants only United States college graduates for the few such positions which they seem willing to create. Instead, labor attachés should be chosen chiefly from among staff members of unions, from among men or women who have worked up from labor's ranks and know intimately labor problems. Latin-American labor looks to us for encouragement and guidance, declares David McDonald, official of the United Steelworkers of America, C. I. O.

The views of Mr. McDonald and his colleagues of the C. I. O. Committee on Latin-American Affairs, which is headed by the able and active Mr. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers in New York City, are forcefully set forth in the excellent C. I. O. pamphlet entitled "North and South of the Border." United States labor delegates to conferences and on tours in Latin America all return struck by the terrible poverty, disastrous inflation, costly prime necessities beyond workers' reach, pitifully inadequate school and recreation facilities, and the need not for United States charity but for our intelligent and fraternal aid and cooperation to raise living standards.

Catholic workers will be glad to know that one of the C. I. O. leaders just mentioned is Martin Kyne, of the United Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Workers, an outstanding liberal Catholic labor figure whose description of the appalling poverty, misery, illiteracy, and exploitation of Bolivian tin miners and other workers on the bleak, frigid Andean plateaus appeared in that fine Catholic magazine The Commonweal shortly after Mr. Kyne's return from touring Bolivian industrial centers with the joint United States-Bolivian mission under Judge Magruder. Martin Kyne early this year attended the significant meeting called in Montevideo by Lombardo Toledano and the Confederation of Latin-American Workers to plan widespread opposition to the intrigues of Argentine clerical-fascism and Spain's vicious Falangist gospel of antiallied disunity, which I have repeatedly attacked before this body, demanding that we break relations with Franco.

At this point I would like to remind my hearers of what I said in the House of Representatives on March 25, 1941: "The A. F. of L. and C. I. O. should jointly strengthen Latin-American labor by insisting on labor attachés in our embassies. Labor relations and labor solidarity are the very basis and bulwark of democracy. In the long run, it will be more important to help Latin America solve social problems than to arm her. There should be an interchange of social workers as well as of labor leaders. There is need for an inter-American institute for social and labor research with adequate funds to study significant social and economic aspects of labor's place in hemisphere affairs." Then I warned against certain reactionary officials in our Government by declaring that "our cooperation with democratic forces in Latin America may be prevented by inside sabotage."

Hence, it is a pleasure for me to see that progress, even though too little, has been made in 3 years toward achieving some of the objectives which I called for early in 1941. The Pan American Union, handicapped by slim funds which should be doubled or trebled by the American republics, has established a splendid little division of labor and social information under Dr. Ernesto Galarza. The International Labor Conference is now studying the creation of powerful means for preventing post-war unemployment and reactionary cartels. A good start is being made, but it is only a start toward economic democracy.

TRIBUTE TO AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

I congratulate the American Federation of Labor for launching a Spanish-language news letter called Noticiario Obrero Norteamericano. The A. F. of L. is helping to cement inter-American labor cordiality and understanding during a period of tension and crisis. Labor is the first bulwark of democracy, and the first object of attack of dictators everywhere.

I am sure that a published who's who in Latin-American labor would prove of immense use to the A. F. of L. in distributing its news letter in the other American republics, and that Robert J. Watt, Boris Shiskin, George Meany, and other A. F. of L. executives would agree that such a project would produce great good will among South American workers. Such a volume might prove a big stimulant to the interchange of ideas and information for strengthening our relations and the good-neighbor policy, now seriously strained because of Argentina's crushing of labor and democracy not only in Argentina but in Paraguay, in part in Bolivia, and tomorrow perhaps elsewhere in South America.

The American Federation of Labor is taking an outstanding part in the deliberations of the International Labor Conference in Philadelphia, where A. F. of L. international representative, Robert Watt, is serving as United States workers' delegate. This is the seventh I. L. O. meeting in which Mr. Watt has ably presented the viewpoint of the A. F. of L. He is, like Martin Kyne of the C. I. O., deeply touched by the plight of Bolivian and other Latin-American workers who so fervently want freedom to organize and better their wretched standard of living, and to give their children education, adequate food, clothing, and housing.

The A. F. of L. joined the C. I. O. recently in making a generous gift to the widows and children of the Bolivian miners killed brutally by order of the overthrown dictatorship of General Penaranda and the selfish tin cartel, whose bloated head lives in luxury in New York as the richest man in all Latin America. I trust that it will be possible to force him to pay his share of taxes to Bolivia, Britain, and the United States for world reconstruction, returning some of his ill-gotten millions to the workers who produced this wealth.

The Montgomery Ward Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement released to the newspapers yesterday, Monday, May 1, by my colleague, the Honorable HAMILTON FISH, of New York, regarding the Montgomery Ward case:

There have been rumors in the press that efforts would be made by Chairman SABATH of the Rules Committee and other Democratic leaders to prevent consideration of the Dewey resolution to investigate the seizure of Montgomery Ward & Co. I do not give any credence to such idle gossip. The House will pass the Dewey resolution by a vote of 4 to 1. The Rules Committee is the servant, not the master, of the House. The vote on the Dewey resolution should, in all fairness, follow the simplification tax bill next Friday.

The House and the American people are entitled to know under what statute and by what legal authority or constitutional power the seizure of a nonwar industry was made. It smacks of totalitarianism, dictatorship, and Gestapo and un-American methods. In its essence it is lynch laws and terrorism that resembles the high handed, autocratic political tactics of Hitler and Mussolini on their advent to power. If the Congress has unknowingly given any such power to the President it should be revoked immediately.

Secretary of the Navy Frank Knox

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHESTER E. MERROW

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Frank Knox, Secretary of the Navy, the United States has sustained a great loss. Under his able leadership this country has constructed the most powerful Navy in the world.

During his term of service, Secretary Knox made an invaluable contribution to the war effort by putting our Navy on the offensive in every theater of warfare. He was a fearless, courageous leader. Always serving his country to the utmost of his strength, he departed in the heat of battle.

Secretary Knox had the satisfaction of knowing that the cause for which we fight and for which he gave his own life will be won. His place in the history of the Second World War is assured. He is now a member of that great host of illustrious dead who have made possible our freedom. The entire Nation grieves at his passing.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Manchester Union, Manchester, N. H., April 29, 1944, eulogizing the late Frank Knox:

FRANK KNOX, AMERICAN

"I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith."

New Hampshire first knew Frank Knox as a young man. He was less than 40 then, but New Hampshire was quickly impressed with his ability, his fearlessness, his honesty, and the maturity of his judgment. Although he had come to the State from another part of the country, his birthplace was Boston, and it always has seemed, in evaluating his career, that his viewpoint and his conduct were an intermingling of that which is strong and fine in two peoples—those who left home scenes to pioneer and those who, because of home responsibilities, stayed in New England not only to carry on but to provide for sectional industrial and social progress.

Frank Knox's parents went West, but they always maintained a place in their hearts for New England; not only that, but it came to pass that their son was to return here to play a definite role in returning New England to greater usefulness. A concrete example of this interest was in his high regard for the New England Council, of which he was a founder.

To know Frank Knox even casually was to be impressed with his vigor, keenness, and patriotism. In the earliest days of his career as publisher, it was necessary for him to devote long hours to the task of hewing out a new line of approach to local, State, and national affairs, problems, and situations. He had gained attention and respect in Michigan, in partnership with his beloved friend, John Muehling.

Quickly—almost instantaneously, in fact—the New Hampshire public also came to know Frank Knox. It did not always agree with him, but New Hampshire never had cause to question his integrity. And more than that, whenever there were points of issue, New Hampshire and New Hampshire people had deep-seated respect and admiration for his "no" when it was more politic to say "yes."

It was only natural that he should soon become a national figure in journalism, that he should later be called to assume guidance over a great chain of newspapers, and that he himself was to become publisher of a metropolitan journal, whose own history of usefulness is a tradition in American journalism.

It follows, as well, that he was to gain countrywide admiration, that he should be sought for the highest of national elective offices, and that he should accept, with all his native vigor and fearlessness, the challenges he felt must be met.

That they were well met, and scrupulously, is proved without the slightest trace of doubt. For Frank Knox, Republican, was to become Secretary of the Navy in the Cabinet of Franklin D. Roosevelt. It is not difficult to understand why he was chosen, or why he accepted, in those difficult and dangerous days before Pearl Harbor. He knew and this Government knew, if the public did not, of the grave dangers ahead.

This Government needed, for the upbuilding of national strength and honor, a man who was unafraid, who was resourceful, who possessed initiative and the other qualities of leadership, who was himself a pillar of honor and strength, and who loved his country. With Frank Knox, politics always had ended at water's edge.

Stupendous was his task. Equally stupendous was the extent of his success. It must be that this devotion of his is directly responsible for his untimely death. He gave the Nation his all.

So many-faceted is Frank Knox's life and works that the emphasizing of some must not be allowed to obscure the others. One case in point is his active service in the Spanish-American War and World War No. 1, in the first as one of Theodore Roosevelt's Rough Riders, in the second in the A. E. F. as a major of artillery.

Frank Knox entered that conflict as a private. Ever impatient with delay and red tape, he wanted to get in and did. As early as August 1917, he had been commissioned a captain. By December he had been made a major.

Upon his return to civilian life, he maintained his Army connection in the Reserve, in which he was soon to become colonel. More than that, as was characteristic, he practiced what he preached. Strength of body, he knew, is as important to the national welfare as strength of mind. For himself as for others, he believed that "a system of national military training of all young American men would pay swift dividends in a healthier, more unified, more democratic Nation, better endowed in mind and body to utilize the rich heritage of American citizenship; and a Nation more quickly and more efficiently able to defend itself, should we ever again be attacked.

Those are his words. His own life is proof that he meant them.

But neither must the multiple facets of his life be allowed to obscure attention here, in words which must be inadequate, to what Frank Knox meant to us who were privileged to know him somewhat intimately. Just as one was impressed with his vigor, so was one impressed with his "humanness," and kindliness. Success, national prestige, never changed him. He delighted to return to his home and to his office. In the first, he relaxed as much as is possible for a member of the Cabinet to relax. In the office and downtown he chatted with friends and the men and women of the Union-Leader "family." Frank Knox did not forget names and faces; and he had the happy faculty of taking up threads of friendship and association where they had been broken off perhaps long ago. It was a delight and an education to be with him—and we mean just that. He was thoughtful of others, and when they were in distress he went to great pains to see that they were helped and comforted. Someone said not long ago, "Frank Knox's head has never grown too big for his hat, and never will," a homely observation that nevertheless succeeds in helping to measure his worth as man, citizen, good and kindest of friends, and high government official. He himself once wrote:

"Let us aim to be genuine, to seek simplicity and be unassuming, unostentatious; to keep our hearts tender and pure and our minds on the higher levels. To be genuine means to be true and simple. Pretentions never served their intent. An old proverb says, 'No man who loves applause more than the truth will add much to the world's progress.'"

Frank Knox was a great Secretary and a great patriot. Love of country he translated into living, vibrant terms—terms that called for self-sacrifice and that, finally, cost him his life. Through him the greatest Navy of all time has been built up; through him the greatest Navy of all time is crushing Axis might and ruthlessness.

No man has been more devoted to his country, none has played a more essential part in demonstrating that devotion. Frank Knox fought the good fight. He kept the faith.

Eulogy on the Occasion of the Funeral of His Eminence William Cardinal O'Connell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following eulogy by the Most Reverend Richard J. Cushing, D. D., on the occasion of the funeral of His Eminence, William Cardinal O'Connell:

BISHOP CUSHING'S EULOGY

"Behold a great priest, who in his days pleased God, and was found just; and in the time of wrath was made a reconciliation."

These inspired words are taken from the Book of Ecclesiasticus of the Old Testament, chapter xlv: 16, 17.

Behold a great priest. He, whose mortal remains lie here before the altar of this cathedral, whose soul has gone forth attended by our prayers and the prayers of millions all over the world, could ask for his extraordinary endowments and surpassing achievements no more satisfying recognition. That was his ambition, that was his triumph, to be a great priest.

Sixty years ago, when the sublime dignity of the priesthood was conferred upon him, he harnessed the leaping energies of a keen mind and powerful personality for the race to his goal—to full accomplishment of his vocation. Never a moment did he loosen the rein or slacken the pace till the day came when he could say with St. Paul: "I have finished the course."

The 11 years of his parish service saw him crowding his scant hours of leisure with earnest study. As rector of the North American College in Rome, he pursued perfection in new fields, administration, diplomacy, a wider experience of men and affairs. The famous embassy to Japan he executed with the same unbending concentration, learning at every step and in the end achieving a brilliant success.

After years of distinguished work in Rome, amid the deep currents of international relations, in contact with the high and the humble of many lands while ever close to the heart of Christendom, he returned to America, to preside first over the diocese of Portland and then over his native archdiocese of Boston. Here he found a complete contrast—a society economic in its structure and its standards, a people scarcely at all concerned with world politics, provincial in outlook, a religious frontier where the concept of Christendom was unknown and diverse groups held their particular beliefs, each hidden behind its own stockade of exclusiveness.

He had known this frontier of old. He could measure the gains of his own garrison. Aware of the approaching crises that would tax its strength, he felt that the time had come to organize it on a larger and permanent basis, and to reveal the fact of world-wide Christianity, the dignity of the spouse of Christ. The undertaking was vast and beset with difficulties; the manner of its doing had to be chosen; the man who saw the vision had to win others to it in his own way. Not always understood, even by his own, but always steady of purpose and strong of execution, he has been justified by the severe tests of eventful years.

His enlightened foresight and vigorous leadership made this archdiocese one of the foremost sees in Christendom. To him, to the clergy, to the religious, and people he had organized, Pope Pius X accorded the highest of honors by raising him to the exalted position of Prince of the Church. As an administrator, the new cardinal had few equals. When he delegated authority, he placed absolute confidence in the men of his choice. Under his direction as a spiritual leader, under his guidance and inspiration as a molder and ruler of men, priests rose to every opportunity and shared with him in the extraordinary growth of his archdiocese.

To single out special phases of that growth would be an impossible task. Fortunately he, himself, when he reached the biblical age of three score and ten, listed what he considered his three greatest accomplishments: the founding of more than a hundred new parishes, the reorganization of the diocesan seminary, and the establishment of the diocese on a strong financial basis—surely, three worthy and lasting memorials. The 100 and more new parishes have dotted this great center of Catholicity with as many churches where dwells the King of Kings, awaiting with bountiful gifts the homage of those who love Him. The development of the diocesan seminary assures a continuance of the highest ideals of the priesthood and the solid financial structure of the archdiocese survived without the slighest shock the greatest depression in the Nation's history. We may truthfully say: "If you seek his monuments, look around."

FRUITS OF HIS LABORS TESTIFY FOR HIM

Look around. The fruits of his labors multiply to our gaze. In the churches he planned, how many will find the abiding solace of religion? At the altars he raised, how many will gain grace and eternal salvation? In the schools he sanctioned, how many will imbibe the true philosophy of life? In the hospitals, homes, and charitable institutions he fostered, how many will attain health and refuge and blessed peace? And from the devoted priests of God whom he trained or ordained, as well as from the hundreds he helped to ordination in distant mission lands, how many souls will receive the heavenly mysteries and life everlasting?

"Behold a great priest, who in his days pleased God."

The cause of God was his consuming passion, and he defended that cause with life-long devotion and singleness of purpose, with a rare freedom from human respect, and we dare add, with the fighting spirit of a crusader. He attacked evils and wrongs, not persons; he hated the sin, but always helped the sinner. And his charity to those who erred knew no bounds. To one to whom nature had given a rock-like resoluteness and a certain stubborn inflexibility of character, and who was by temperament strong, vehement, commanding, that is no small tribute. This great zeal for the cause of God and for the preaching of His gospel was not merely diocesan nor even national. It reached out into every land, so that today in every corner of the vast mission fields of the world his name is blessed. Missionaries are keeping his memory sacred before the crude altars of jungle chapels and in the stately sanctuaries of oriental cathedrals. "Remember," he frequently admonished me, "this is God's work, and keep it in God's hands."

God's work is the salvation and sanctification of souls everywhere, the work of universal charity. Universal charity is, therefore, the key to the life of William Cardinal O'Connell. It was the concept he had formed of the priest as universal in charity and absolutely detached in judgment, that kept him deliberately and consistently outside of all secular concerns, outside of every partisan movement, every controversy, even ecclesiastical, save only when the spiritual welfare of the community seemed to call for a pronouncement. He did much—more than the world could know—to remove the sources of injustice, to replace with a spirit of mutual understanding and friendlines the old and unwholesome divisions among the people of New England. What our first bishop, John de Cheverus, had endured with the courage and wise forbearance of a pioneer, this great successor of his, taking up the crozier nearly a century later, attacked with no less courage but with the power and skill of a diplomat. The sturdy character, the ideals and accomplishments of the Puritan and Pilgrim fathers, he admired. Their resentment and hostility toward other races and religions, he understood. Giving honor to the leaders on both sides who, before his day had succeeded in narrowing the gulf, he resolved to leave nothing undone in order that in his lifetime the gulf might be completely closed.

SURMOUNTED OBSTACLES BY FAITH AND PATIENCE

By faith and patience and good will, by dint of example and counsel, he strove to destroy the ignorance which breeds prejudice, the misconceptions which perpetuate dissension. The odds against him were enormous, obscure, increased by the active operation of forces which a generation earlier had been only speculations and theories. Perhaps the task he set was too long for even his long lifetime and giant strength. But what one man could do he has done, so that now we live our lives and fulfill our destinies on an equal footing with our fellow citizens of all faiths in an atmosphere of mutual respect and tolerance.

"Behold a great priest, who in his days pleased God and was found just; and in the time of wrath was made a reconciliation."

It is not surprising that civil as well as ecclestiastical authorities recognized the power and influence of this eminent prelate. Widely traveled, deeply versed in the history, the customs, and the governments of many nations, he was ever filled with a profound love of his native land and her institutions.

The highest officials of state and nation recognized in him not only a true patriot but also a leader in the defense of the principles upon which our Nation has risen to greatness. He was an eloquent teacher of civic virtue, of justice and honesty, and respect for authority. He taught his people to know their civic duties and practice them and to know their civic rights and demand them.

In every crisis of our country he hastened to place his services at the command of the Government. In the truest sense, he inspired patriotism, for the hope of the country no less than the hope of the church lies in the democracy that he envisioned and urged; men of principle, men of honor, men of faith and men of God.

To his words of advice, of admonition and of warning, all men turned attentive ears, because no one ever doubted his understanding, his sympathy or his judgment.

For the glory of God, and by the grace of God, William Henry O'Connell became a prince of the church and a pillar of his country. But those who lived close to him knew him otherwise. They knew him as a student, a lover of art, a musician, a poet, a friend. To a degree unsuspected by many, he was a man of heart, of deep and strong emotions. His books are on library shelves for all to read, his hymns are in the schools and homes of the diocese he loved, but the organ tones of his beautiful voice must speak and sing in memory. The kindliness of his counsel and the charm of his companionship must be cherished by the few that have known him well.

Any man exalted above his fellowmen, most of all in ecclesiastical life, can have few intimates. In an extraordinary degree, Carinal O'Connell succeeded in combining a genuine love of his priests and people with a detachment which kept him from the softening consolation of their friendships; but he paid the price for this magnificent service to God and country with a lonely life and a no less lonely death.

COMPLETE DEDICATION OF HIS LIFE TO PRIESTHOOD

All the friendship, the flaming love of his soul was given to God, and his private life was an unceasing integration of his every endowment and every attainment into the perfection of his priesthood. Oh how exacting, how all-absorbing, how supreme is that spiritual life to which the priest, any priest, commits himself. Sanctus—Sanctus—Sanctus. Holy—Holy—Holy—that is the priesthood of Christ. His Eminence expressed it at the close of his autobiography in words that echo the utterance of St. Augustine, and across the centuries identify our present-day priesthood with his:

"The life of the spirit, unquenchable, can never be completely content until the soul has found repose in the possession of God."

There speaks even now the wisdom of our late cardinal archbishop. He knew with the certainty gained from a lifetime of experience with the souls of men that the true priest can never in this life find rest. This lesson he leaves us as a legacy. We have no right to bury it and forget it. All the rest of the wealth he has left us—charitable institutions, Christian education, financial security, churches, religious communities, lay societies, mutual trust, peace, and a love for the Holy See and the sovereign pontiff, these depend for their welfare and progress upon that one priceless legacy, the secret of his method—his spirit never rested.

Well did he change his family motto—"Victor in arduis," triumphant over difficulties, to the humble and even more energetic, "Vigor in arduis," strength amid difficulties. For victory won means fresh combats ahead, but strength is the source and the sword of every new accomplishment.

CARDINAL POSSESSED EXTRAORDINARY STRENGTH

He possessed extraordinary strength. Even physically he towered among men. That was nature's gift to him. Intelligence shone on his wide brow. Large, deep-set, scrutinizing eyes bore witness to his penetrating mind. Intellectually he also excelled. His powerful pen constantly flashed out in defense of Christian faith and morality. That was the result of his own efforts in enriching his mind and training his intellectual powers. Spiritually he was irresistible. That was the grace of God for which he prayed and which he employed to the best advantage. From the very record of his years he was unique. Eighty-five years a Christian, 60 years a priest, 42 years a bishop, 33 years a cardinal. Here, indeed, was an illustrious man, a great priest who in his days pleased God.

Not every priest can be physically powerful, not every priest can be an intellectual giant, not every priest is called to a long life of high ecclesiastical honors, but the grace of God is for all of us and the vocation to the priesthood means the unresting activity of the soul. We are forever grateful to our venerable and beloved cardinal archbishop for this priestly bequest—"The life of the spirit, unquenchable, can never be completely content until the soul has found repose in the possession of God."

Today the life of his spirit, unquenchable, is at last content. His soul has found repose in the possession of God. He has attained his ultimate goal. He has won the only crown he ever really prized and sought, the crown of God's glory. His death, never to be forgotten by his loved ones, was an inspiring testimony of faith. He passed from this life blessing his priests and people and kissing a crucifix that he had cherished from his student days in Rome. The prayers of his flock were generously answered: God gave to our good shepherd a beautiful Christian death.

Here before the altar of the God he loved and to whom he consecrated his long life and great talents, in the cathedral church of the archdiocese he raised to such preeminence, lie his mortal remains. But to his diocese, his country, his church, he is not dead, he still lives.

In the words of the poet:

"Were a star quenched on high
For years would its light
Still streaming downward from the sky
Fall on our mortal sight.

"So when a great man dies
For years beyond our ken
The light he leaves behind him lies
Upon the paths of men."

So the lifework of our beloved Shepherd is not yet done. In a broader sense it is only beginning. He was, above all else, the apostle, who taught the word and law of God to his fellowmen, that the noble and the eternal in our nature might be nourished, that the ties that bind us to God might be strengthened.

Such a teacher never dies. In lesson and example, in service and remembrance, he is as truly with us today as he was before he passed beyond the ivory gates of sleep. The light of his long life is only a brief candle in comparison with the enduring light of the inspiration he has bequeathed to us. Tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow we shall be enriched and ennobled by the abiding influence of his myriad of lasting works.

Vital in his loyal love of God was his devotion to the Blessed Mother of God. His birthday was December the eighth, the Feast Day of Her Immaculate Conception, and deep devotion to her marked his entire life. Deep devotion also to his own beloved mother, who, like so many a saintly mother, by her love and sacrifices, enabled her son to become a priest of God. At her feet, as long as she lived, he laid his scholastic trophies and priestly honors as an act of love and gratitude for her inspiration and help.

There was another beloved mother who claimed his lifelong unbroken devotion, Our Holy Mother Church. To her, in deepest love and reverence during his priesthood of 60 years, he gave his all in arduous labors that her holy influence and her divine message might be brought to all mankind.

William Cardinal O'Connell is no more. "Behold a great high priest, who in his days pleased God, and was found just, and in the time of wrath he was made a reconciliation." In a spirit of Christian resignation, to the will of Almighty God, bear away his body, lay it reverently in its final resting place on the grounds of our diocesan seminary where every future priest of the archdiocese of Boston, and where, at every annual retreat we, the priests whom he has left behind, may breathe a golden Ave Maria in honor of our Immaculate Mother, the Queen of the Clergy, that our departed shepherd may be joined in eternal fellowship with the Apostles of Holy Mother Church forever and ever.

Then and only then can his great soul rest, for "the life of the spirit, unquenchable, can never be completely content until the soul has found repose in the possession of God." This is the legacy bequeathed to us by a great priest, His Eminence, William Cardinal O'Connell, "who in his days pleased God, and was found just; and in the time of wrath was made a reconciliation."

May he rest in eternal peace. Amen.

The Necessity for Closer Latin-American Relationship

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an essay written by one of my constituents, Miss Joan Morin, of Newark, Ohio, who was one of the winners of the essay contest sponsored by the American Legion of Ohio.

This contest was entered into by approximately 300,000 of our State. I congratulate Miss Morin on her achievement and respectfully urge the membership of the House to read her splendid essay.

THE NECESSITY FOR CLOSER LATIN-AMERICAN RELATIONSHIP

(By Joan Morin)

An infinite binding tie between the Americas. Yes; that is the goal toward which we are striving. But in order to form and maintain that relationship, we must understand the necessity for it. The foundation for this inter-American policy is the fact that the countries of the American hemisphere possess certain common interests and problems not generally shared by the people of the Old World. These problems should be the basis of a common understanding and of common political and commercial transactions among these United Americas. We must seize the opportunity to build upon this foundation.

North and South America are a balance and a support to each other, a great reservoir of strength and natural wealth. Therefore we must work together and cooperate with each other more than we have ever done in the past, for "United we stand, divided we fall."

We should begin now to cement the friendship which will make our comrades to the south of us our allies in times of peace and war. First let us look at the problem as it stands now, an important factor in the present conflict.

Many vital materials necessary to our war production have been cut off from us by the enemy. Our Latin-American neighbors have a large supply of these natural resources, including copper, diamonds, tin, manganese, nitrates, rubber, oil, and iron, which they may share with us. Also, they can lease us territory where we may place strategic land, air, and naval bases, which will help protect the American from foreign invaders. We, in turn, will send them technical experts who will improve their sanitation methods and help develop their hidden resources to the extent that they will be independent and self-sustaining from a commercial standpoint. This will result in increased production for the United States and more wealth and a higher standard of living for the Latin-Americas.

Now we should look to the future and some additional reasons why we should become better acquainted with our southern neighbors. We are far from the trade centers of Europe and we would profit by trading in our own hemisphere. The United States provides a good market for the products of Latin-America, and they will reciprocate, because the agricultural products are harvested in alternating seasons. Also, we have excess manufactured goods and they have raw materials on which our factories of tomorrow will feed and prosper. An increasing flow of trade between the Americas in the future will provide a source of employment for many discharged American soldiers.

We shall set an example for the world, showing that if 21 republics can live together peacefully, then countries all over the world can do likewise.

We, the people of the United States, should give more consideration to the good neighbor policy. Exchange of students, mutual comprehension of one another's language, and completion of the inter-American highway will help bind us together in a lasting friendship. Forevermore let us drop the word "policy" from our good-neighbor policy and just be good neighbors.

We are the new world, the united world. The influence of the old is fast fading, and our light should shine out as a beacon of inter-American friendship and love.

Court Martial of Polish Soldiers of Jewish Faith

REMARKS

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Wednesday, April 26, appears a statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN], regarding the court martial of certain Polish soldiers of Jewish faith who were A. W. O. L., saying "I arise today to call upon the Polish Government in exile to remove certain officers of the Polish Army who are responsible for the court martial of 30 Jewish soldiers."

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] has misrepresented the entire affair, and I am asking unanimous consent to insert at this point a statement made by a special correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor of London, and also an article by the Associated Press, a statement of the Polish Ambassador in London. I am also asking unanimous consent to place in the RECORD, at this point, a copy of a letter written by the Ambassador of Poland in Washington to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], and ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my own remarks:

BRITISH QUIET AS POLISH ARMY TRIES JEWS

(By E. Berg Holt)

LONDON, April 28.—A statement by Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden to the House of Commons to the effect that he is convinced the Polish Government is doing "everything possible" to eradicate anti-Semitism in the Polish armed forces, is regarded here as definite intimation that the British Government categorically refuses to intervene further in connection with the trials for desertion of a number of Jewish soldiers from the Polish Army.

By implication, it is apparent that the British Government will take a similar position regarding 25 Ukrainian White Russians, accused of the same offense.

Regarding the Jews, the British standpoint is understood to be that they had ample opportunity to transfer to the British Army and that, in fact, two groups of Jewish soldiers, numbering 207 in all, had actually been allowed to do so. To have allowed the possibility of transfers to stay open indefinitely would, in the opinion of military experts, be prejudicial to discipline, since it would enable Jewish soldiers to demand transfers whenever they had real or fancied grievances against either their comrades or officers.

While it is undenied that anti-Semitism exists in the Polish armed forces, many influential members of the Polish-Jewish community consider, in the words of Dr. Emanuel Scherer, Socialist member of the Polish National Council, that "Polish Jews should stay in the Polish Army."

Dr. Scherer added that the Polish Army is the "army of our country" and "we have to fight anti-Semitism wherever it appears by staying to fight it and not—as anti-Semites themselves would wish—by leaving any one of the institutions of our country."

While no figures are available as to the actual number of Jews in the Polish Army, Polish authorities declare those who have asked for a transfer are a comparatively small proportion of the whole. They add that some of those who have just been sentenced, deserted as long ago as 1940, and do not appear to have made any effort to join the British Army in the interim.

JEWS COMMISSIONED

An official Polish statement published here avers that "in the last 6 months 37 Jews were commissioned—a comparatively large proportion, considering the number of Jews serving in the Polish Army. Nine Jews were promoted to the rank of lieutenant, 3 to captain.

During the war 2 Jews have received the Virtute Militari, the highest Polish war decoration, 26 the Cross of Valor, and 3 the Cross of Merit. During his recent inspection of the Polish corps on the Italian front, Kazimierz Sosnkowski, Commander in Chief of the Polish Army under the exiled government, personally decorated 2 Jewish commandos of a Polish commando unit.

The official statement admits, on the other hand, that "six cases of alleged offenses against Jewish soldiers are now being investigated." It added that "during the court martial other cases of offenses were reported by defendants. * * * These cases will be investigated and offenders duly tried."

PROTEST MEETINGS

Despite these explanations, great excitement has been caused by the incidents. Mass protest meetings have been held. A deputation of Jewish clothing workers went to Downing Street on April 22 and left a letter urging the British Prime Minister to intervene.

By comparison, the case of the Ukrainian and White Russian deserters has attracted much less attention here. Moscow's Pravda, however, published a two-column article on the subject from its London correspondent on April 23. The statement in Pravda was to the effect that one of the deserters had had his arm broken by a Polish noncommissioned officer was denied by the soldier concerned when interviewed by a representative of the London Daily Herald.

Whereas a majority of the Jews in the recent trials are from Poland, the Ukrainians, and White Russians came from the Argentine to join the Polish forces. The fact that all those who have been tried have expressed a desire to fight Hitler gives rise to hope that the regrettable incidents will result in a closing of ranks and greater willingness to cooperate on both sides.

POLISH AMBASSADOR HITS ANTI-SEMITISM

LONDON, April 28.—Speaking at Bristol, England, Count Edward Raczynski, Polish Ambassador to Britain, said charges that anti-Semitism was condoned in the Polish forces "are entirely untrue and deeply resented."

Anti-Semitism would not be tolerated anywhere in the Polish movement, he said, "and any cases of Jew baiting brought to the notice of authorities will be severely punished."

APRIL 27, 1944.

HON. EMANUEL CELLER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CELLER: Your letter of April 24 reached me on the 25th, sometime after I had read its text in the New York Times, where you had previously sent it for publication.

May I draw your attention to a special correspondence from London in the issue of the New York Times of April 26, page 10, in which excerpts from an official statement by the Polish Government were published, which, in my opinion, supply answers to some of the points raised by you in your letter concerning alleged anti-Semitism in the Polish forces. That official Polish statement brings out the following points:

1. The sentences imposed upon the defendants were strictly in conformity with the penal military code of Poland applicable to all soldiers in the Polish Army, irrespective of their race or creed. It was therefore mandatory to apply the laws of this code in this special case, no discrimination being possible. However, you will note that the actual carrying out of some of the sentences may be indefinitely suspended, depending on the good will and future good behavior of these soldiers.

I should like to add that in judging this special case the court martial showed leniency, inasmuch as it did not apply the maximum penalties applicable to soldiers deserting in time of war.

2. The statement of the Polish Government clearly indicates that an investigation of cases of offenses against Jewish soldiers over a period of the past several months is being conducted and that eventual offenders will be brought to trial. This part of the statement should convince you that, contrary to your accusation, there is no attempt on the part of the Polish authorities "to whitewash the culprits."

3. Furthermore, it has been ascertained that the great majority of our Polish-Jewish soldiers desire to continue to serve in the Polish armed forces without complaints.

4. In the past 6 months the number of Jewish soldiers in the Polish Army who have been commissioned and distinguished with high military decorations for valor, proves that there is no anti-Semitic discrimination in the Polish Army.

I take exception to your totally unfounded accusation that the Jewish soldiers in our Army were victimized because of their religion. Throughout our history the Polish Nation has invariably shown the highest degree of religious tolerance. Poland's record is entirely free from religious persecution. The great majority of Jewish citizens who for centuries came to settle in Poland, did so mostly to escape persecutions in other European countries. This amply proves the irrefutable fact of Poland's traditional religious and racial tolerance.

If you had taken the trouble to verify the facts, you would know that there is an adequate number of Army chaplains of Jewish faith in our Army, and that every facility has always been given to our Polish soldiers of Jewish faith to follow the rites of their cult and to celebrate their religious feast days.

If you had taken the trouble to pass in review the statements issued by the Polish Government relating to our Jewish citizens in the course of this war, and the numerous initiatives it has taken, calling for United Nations action in defense of the Jewish people—you would undoubtedly arrive at the conclusion that the Polish Government and the Polish Nation have been and are actively working to save the Jewish people and that they are decidedly not anti-Semitic. It is therefore an injustice to accuse them of racialism, or of any other form of intolerance.

The Polish people and the Jews of Poland are closely knit in their common fight against the racialism, inhumanity, intolerance, and barbarism of German nazi-ism. An ever closer understanding is developing between them as a result of common suffering.

The Polish and the Jewish peoples are going through the most tragic period in their history. It is an unjustifiable wrong at this time to take advantage of regrettable isolated incidents or personal quarrels among individual soldiers of an army in order to accuse an entire army, a nation, or its government of mass tendencies of which they are not guilty.

Very truly yours,

J. CIECHANOWSKI,
Ambassador of Poland.

Mr. Speaker, throughout the struggle for independence which the Polish Nation carried on since Poland was partitioned between Russia, Prussia, and Austria, the Jews, alongside the Poles, took an active part in those struggles. In the Polish legions which fought in the ranks of the Napoleonic armies the name of Col. Berek Joselewicz, a great Jewish fighter, gloriously highlights the pages of Poland's history. In the heroic struggles against czardom in 1830, 1831, 1863, 1905, and through the bloody struggle of World War No. 1, Jewish names were inseparable from the Polish names on the lists of heroes of those struggles and of their victims.

In this war during the short but costly military campaign in Poland in September 1939, the Jews fought arm in arm with their Polish cocitizens wherever blood was shed. Many instances of Jewish heroism were rewarded by decorations and other forms of recognition by the Polish high command. During the now historical siege of Warsaw the Jews defended the Polish capital and certain sectors of Warsaw were manned by Jewish workers exclusively.

As in battle the Jews of Poland shared the fate of other Poles in the persecutions in which the conquerors indulged. When over a million and a half Poles were deported deep into the Russian Provinces of Siberia and Kazakstan, there was a fair percentage of Jews among the most unhappy deportees. In the latter part of 1941, when on the basis of an agreement between the late Polish leader, General Sikorski, and Marshal Stalin, a Polish army was to be formed on the soil of Russia, the Russian authorities were quick in trying to separate the Poles from their Jewish cocitizens. As early as January 14, 1942, the Russian authorities have forbidden the Polish Jews to enter the Polish Army, but so overwhelming was the will of the Jewish youth to fight the common German enemy in the Polish ranks, that despite most incredible difficulties which were put in their way by the Russians, several thousand Jews entered Polish military ranks.

When the Polish Army under General Anders was forced by Marshal Stalin's personal order to leave Russia and to leave every Jewish citizen within the borders of Russia, the Polish military authorities, upon heartbreaking insistence of the Jewish soldiers, literally smuggled out of Russia 4,000 Polish soldiers of Jewish faith, mostly under assumed names. But as soon as those 4,000 soldiers reached safety from the dreaded Ogpu and took stations in Iran—Persia—and Irak, within 5 months their number decreased to exactly one-half, because over 2,000 Jewish soldiers left the Polish ranks and tried by every means to reach the homeland of their ancestors—Palestine. The Polish authorities were rather complacent. They understood the internal urge driving young Jews who escaped both the cruel fate prepared for them by the Gestapo and by the Ogpu to reach the promised land. The good will of the Polish authorities went even so far that they negotiated with the Moslem-Arabic and violently anti-Jewish authorities of Irak the right for the Jews to cross Irakian territory unmolested and enter Palestine.

When a few months later the Polish divisions were moved closer to the African front into Syria and Palestine, 1,600 more Polish soldiers of Jewish faith found their way into the Jewish settlements of Palestine, leaving the Polish Army behind.

It is known that despite the law which gave the Polish authorities the right to seek those who fled, there is only one instance of such a search undertaken by the Polish and British military police, and this on repeated insistence of the British authorities.

When the Polish Army left Palestine and moved into Italy where it is now in the front battle line, 400 out of the original 4,000 Jews went along and are now fighting there. In the very first days of the battle 4 Jewish soldiers of the Polish Army won particular distinction for bravery—2 of them, Corp. Benjamin Kagan and Pvt. Henry Jedwab, in the ranks of Polish commandos, and 2 others, Corp. Fischel Krieger and Abraham Szapiro, were distinguished by the Polish commander in chief, General Sosnkowski, with the Polish decoration of Cross of Bravery.

When the Polish Army was formed in France by General Sikorski it accepted into its ranks several hundred Polish citizens of Jewish faith who lived in France, Belgium, and Holland, in many instances since 10 and 15 years, but still having maintained some ties with their mother country. After a determined fight as the rear guard of the retreating French armies, over 35,000 of the Polish soldiers were brought safely by General Sikorski to England, taking with them almost 700 Jewish soldiers who thus escaped the terrible plight which was the fate of their coreligionists in German occupied France. This group of Jewish soldiers served in the Polish ranks until this winter preparing for the day of invasion and of liberation of Europe.

A short time ago a strange agitation of foreign origin which should not be named, started its work among those soldiers. The awful strain of terrible news from their homes which is daily reaching both the Poles and the Jews, had probably also its influence. Quietly and without publicity the Polish military authorities negotiated with the British military authorities for the transfer into the British Army of 300 Jewish soldiers who volunteered for the British service.

And, finally, a very small group, 27 or 30 Jewish soldiers, went A. W. O. L. recently, some of them from outfits slated to spearhead the Allied invasion of Europe. It is obvious that no British, no American, and no other military authority could permit to overlook such acts without justice intervening. It is obvious, too, as many times stated by Polish authorities, that every occurrence of personal enmity in the military rank and file will be appropriately punished.

Address of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey

OF

HON. WINIFRED C. STANLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Miss STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a timely editorial commenting on the address of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey before the American Newspaper Publishers' Association on April 27 which appeared in the Buffalo (N. Y.) Evening News under date of April 28:

A NOTABLE STATEMENT

Gov. Thomas E. Dewey made clear his views in relation to foreign policy in his address last night before the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. Fundamentally his position is that expressed in the Republican Mackinac declaration, which he helped to draw and in the Fulbright and Connally resolutions passed overwhelmingly by Congress. Simply stated, he stands for total crushing victory of the enemy and for international collaboration—backed by adequate force—to maintain the peace and to establish a co-operative order for world economic progress.

Governor Dewey went much further in particularizing as to war aims and post-war peace structure than have any statements from administration sources, which largely have dealt in generalities. "No initial measures against Germany and Japan, however drastic, will have permanent value," he declared, "unless they fall within the setting of a durable cohesion between Great Britain and ourselves, together, I hope, with Russia and China." He was at the same time positive on the necessity for Soviet-American understanding, which he asserted must never be allowed to relapse into the old suspicions that clouded relations between them for a quarter of a century. "Russian affairs are in the hands of hard-headed, realistic leaders," he said. "That is nothing we should be afraid of, provided we are equally realistic and devoted to our country. If we are, the United States and Russia can deal with each other with candor while building firm mutual respect and friendship."

Warning against a repetition of the mistakes of the last war, Governor Dewey named three objectives of a foreign policy:

First. To carry on the war to total crushing victory, and in so doing to drive home to the aggressor nations a lesson that will never be forgotten.

Second. To establish in our relations with other nations conditions calculated to promote world-wide economic stability not only for the sake of the world, but also to the end that our own people may enjoy a high level of employment in an increasingly prosperous world.

Third. To build a structure of peace through international collaboration, backed by adequate force to prevent future wars.

Governor Dewey's address was pitched on the high plane of principle. He commended Secretary of State Hull's recent utterances on foreign policy but he noted the doubts that have arisen in the minds of many Americans as to whether expediency in the practices of our relations with other countries has not in many instances overtaken the principles set forth by Mr. Hull. There is also concern, he said, as to whether much of our foreign policy is not being handled privately by the President, rather than through the established diplomatic machinery.

Taken along with similar utterances by other Republican leaders as well as the statements of administration spokesmen, Governor Dewey's program forms the basis for removing fundamental issues of American foreign policy from partisan controversy. The real issues of the coming campaign have to do with the character of leadership; and the Republicans offer a progressive program and a fresh viewpoint, one unclouded by official responsibility for the mistakes of appeasement, international divisionism, and unpreparedness that led to the present war.

Finally, Governor Dewey, the leading possibility for the Republican Presidential nomination, has performed service for his country in taking an unequivocal stand for total victory and post-war collective security. He has struck a death blow to Axis hopes that a political division could be created in the United States on these issues—a division that might justify desperate measures to prolong the war. He has brought reassurance to the people of the Allied nations that the American people, whatever the outcome of the election, will assume their full responsibility in a world order for peace and progress. In so doing, Governor Dewey has made a real contribution, not only toward clarification of foreign policy issues, but toward winning the war.

Poland in the World of Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH M. PRATT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. JOSEPH M. PRATT. Mr. Speaker, it is an auspicious occasion when both sides of this House can join in paying heartfelt tribute to our gallant ally, Poland, on her national day, the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the Polish Constitution of the 3d of May 1791. When the century before last was drawing to its close, the despotism of Frederick the Great of Prussia, the Czar of Russia, and the Empress of Austria dominated eastern Europe, and no country could unfurl with impunity the flag of liberty and of the rights of man. Poland paid for her temerity with 123 years of national extinction. After the last war—and for this we, her American friends, may take some credit to ourselves—Poland was reborn or rather she rose again from the dead and for 20 years, until the day of Hitler's unprovoked aggression in 1939, astonished the civilized world by her progress. To her people, held in ignorance by the partitioning powers, she brought education and enlightenment. In their train commerce and industry, fostered by individual enterprise, grew by leaps and bounds. Reasonable taxation permitted a gradual increase in salaries and wages, in earning power, and the standard of living rose. Poland was a well-governed, modern state. And when Germany is beaten, Poland will rise again, great and strong and independent. We owe it to our 5,000,000 Americans of Polish descent to see to it that the land from which they come, the land that was the first to rise in arms to oppose German might, shall suffer no injustice at the hands of the 3 great powers—the United States, Great Britain, and Russia—banded together to win this war and establish on God's green earth, a just and lasting peace.

One Hundred and Fifty-third Anniversary of the Polish Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WINIFRED C. STANLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Miss STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, today as we celebrate the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the signing of the Polish Constitution, it is a privilege dearly cherished to join with my distinguished colleagues in paying tribute to the indomitable courage of the Polish people. Despite persecution of the most ruthless kind, despite the scourge of war and suffering, the Polish people have always maintained their love of freedom and their desire for representative government.

In the beautiful State of New York there are many loyal Americans of Polish ancestry among the thirteen and one-half million people it is my honor to represent. In my home city of Buffalo, for example, there are more than 200,000 Americans of Polish descent. Through my friends, neighbors, and classmates of Polish descent, I have come to appreciate and admire the fine qualities which are typical of the people of that great nation. Throughout the long and terrible months of the present world conflict, those qualities have been displayed in a truly heroic manner. Liberty-loving men and women everywhere have marveled at the brave resistance of the Polish people to the Nazi reign of terror.

Our hearts are heavy with sorrow when we consider the fact that this year Polish Constitution Day cannot be a celebration in the usual meaning of that word. It cannot be a celebration because on this May 3, 1944, men, women, and children in occupied Poland are suffering untold agony. Not only have freedom and liberty been wrested from them, but today they live, if it can be called living, under the yoke of the most cruel tyranny in modern history. We need not rehearse the ghastly details of that brutal reign, the systematic starving and torture of children, the unspeakable treatment of women whose only crime is that of loyalty to their beloved country, the death of stalwart Polish patriots, the enforced slavery of an entire people. But when we reflect upon such facts, which constitute so sickening a blot upon the page of human history, we realize that this day must be regarded not as a celebration, but rather as a rededication to the sacred principles of freedom and representative government which are embodied in the Polish Constitution.

The Constitution of the United States recognizes the ideal so well expressed by Chief Justice Marshall when he wrote, "That the people have an original right to establish for their future government such principles as, in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness, is the basis on which the whole American fabric has been erected." Similarly the Polish Constitution expresses the great principle that "all power in civil society is derived from the will of the people." The Polish people, believing as they do so fervently in self-government, will never cease to fight until Poland is restored as a free, sovereign, and independent nation.

As we join in this tribute to Poland on the anniversary of the Polish Constitution, those of us who know and appreciate the intelligence, the fortitude, and the idealism of the Polish people have complete faith that Poland will again be free.

May God speed the coming of that day.

Secretary Hull's Fine Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Dallas News of April 28, 1944, commending the record of Secretary Hull:

WISE OLD EAGLE

New details that illuminate, and are intended to justify, the policies of the State Department in these trying years of world-changing war are revealed by Kingsbury Smith, a Washington writer, in the May issue of the Reader's Digest. The wisdom of the course followed by Secretary Hull at every stage of the conflict, often adhered to in the face of stormy criticism, has been attested by results, in the opinion of this close-up observer who ends his spotlighting with this appraisal: "The wise old eagle who hovers over the conduct of affairs at the State Department may not live to see all his principles applied in this world, but he has steered a course in American foreign policy to which posterity is likely to pay tribute."

The true stature of a public servant of any period must be determined by the future's appraisement. What posterity will appraise in the light of results, and what many of the wise old eagle's contemporaries have found it hard to explain, are the long-sustained relations with the Vichy government, the long-delayed recognition of General de Gaulle, as yet only partially extended, and the tolerant dealings with Spain up to the time of the recent note which was couched in stronger terms.

By playing ball with Vichy for several extra innings, Kingsbury Smith notes, the French Fleet was saved for the Allies along with air bases in Africa, and, but for this, Hitler could have controlled the South Atlantic and there would have been no landing of American forces in north Africa, an accomplishment that marked a change in the war. By dealing with Franco Spain, the bulk of Spanish trade is now with this country and Great Britain, and Germany has been deprived of many vital war materials from that source. By withholding recognition from de Gaulle, the State Department has adhered consistently to its determination to permit the French people, after liberation, to choose their own form of government and pick their own leaders. It has been made plain that if de Gaulle should be the popular choice to head the French Government, recognition would be readily extended. Employment of Gestapo methods by the Free French Committee in acts known only to the State Department is cited by this commentator as the sound reason for lack of endorsement and denial of recognition.

All facts that should be known eventually will be revealed as a part of history. The wise old eagle will have as full justification as any man in his post of responsibility in such a troubled time could hope for as the conscientious, but wholly human, servant of an individualistic and opinionated democracy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, when the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of Agriculture was considering the appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1945, some controversy developed over the administration of FDO 79, a food-distribution order relating to the handling of milk and milk products and the imposition of a handling charge on certain handlers. The subcommittee thereupon inserted a proviso in the bill relating to this matter.

Subsequently it came to my attention that in other sections of the country milk dealers felt that FDO 79 was proving very useful and effective, and in support of that position I am herewith inserting a memorandum, dated April 18, 1944, from the International Association of Milk Dealers, 309 West Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, Ill., relative to FDO 79:

At the meeting of our war conservation committee and executive committee last Wednesday, President Skinner submitted the report received by him of unanimous recommendations made by members of the National Fluid Milk Conservation and Control Industry Advisory Committee of W. F. A. when they met in Washington recently. The national committee's position was endorsed by the two I. A. M. D. committees in every detail and President Skinner was authorized to urge all fluid-milk distributors to cooperate with the War Food Administration to insure the success of FDO 79 and, thereby, forestall possible coupon rationing.

President Skinner explains that the need for Nation-wide industry support now arises from the possibility of assessments which enable the order to function being knocked out by legal action or legislation. If this results in the dropping, or even the temporary suspension of FDO 79, more serious difficulties face the distributing industry in the future.

Members of the W. F. A.'s Industry Advisory Committee reported to War Food Administration officials at a meeting held April 11 in Washington that the milk-conservation order—FDO 79—is diverting substantial quantities of milk to manufacturing plants to meet the larger war requirements for evaporated milk, butter, cheese, and milk powder. As more troops move overseas even more of these products will be needed in the near future.

The sales limitations on milk dealers in FDO 79 represents the best method of channeling more milk into manufactured products. Under the order milk dealers may sell as much fluid milk as they sold last June, but not more. Cream and fluid milk byproducts are limited to 75 percent of the quantity sold in June 1943. These quotas are established for a month that enjoyed the highest sales of any month of record in the history of the industry.

Members of the W. F. A. committee unanimously adopted an 8-point resolution stating that "the objectives of the order are the joint responsibility of government and industry" and recommending "that the present method of financing the program be continued."

As the next 3 months of flush milk production will provoke a critical situation with respect to the sales quotas, continued cooperation between Government, industry, and consumers is most important.

A majority of the members suggested that some adjustment in the sales quotas be made during the imminent period of peak milk output to insure that all milk produced would be used.

The flush this year probably will be larger than ever before, whereas total production for the year might be slightly less than in 1943. Under these conditions and with war requirements for manufactured dairy products constantly increasing as soldiers go overseas, it is necessary to get as great a quantity of the surplus milk into manufactured dairy products as is possible. Otherwise it may be necessary later to reduce present quotas in order to supply these necessary products.

Milk distributor members of the industry advisory committee of W. F. A., prior to the last meeting with War Food Administration officials, unanimously adopted the following:

1. That Food Distribution Order 79 (the milk conservation order) is a necessary war measure.

2. That the objectives of this order are the joint responsibility of Government and industry.

3. That the milk industry is local in character and therefore that the administration of any regulation of this industry must be flexible and adaptable to local conditions to be equitable and efficient.

4. That the present system of operating FDO 79 makes possible local administration while achieving the over-all objective of the program—stabilization of fluid-milk consumption so as to make more milk available for manufactured dairy products for war use.

5. That the War Food Administration has done an excellent job of administering FDO 79.

6. That the record of compliance with this order by the industry has been outstanding because the need for the order is fully recognized and the method of administration has the cooperation of practically the entire industry.

7. That the present rate of administrative assessment is very low and is not an economic burden; and that producers as such are not assessed but only as they also become distributors of milk.

8. That the fluid-milk industry is predominantly in favor of administering the program through a handler assessment and this committee therefore recommends that the present method of financing the program be continued.

President Skinner further points out that if assessments supporting FDO 79 are eliminated and the order continued under usual governmental administrative procedures, we may only look about us and compare other Government programs to be convinced it will be more difficult for the fluid-milk industry to operate due to lack of flexibility.

The setting up of the usual Government administrative program could lead to the following:

1. A tendency to make emergency control permanent.

2. If no appropriations were made to carry on FDO 79 or a similar plan, coupon rationing would be the result.

3. Loss of right under FDO 79 which enables dealers to assist in working out allocations.

4. Loss of present broad-gaged, experienced market agents.

The most satisfactory solution from the milk distributors' point of view, suggests President Skinner, is for the industry to continue paying assessments and comply with FDO 79 regardless of a recent court decision or proposed legislation knocking out the assessment, thus keeping the present machinery in operation.

Many milk dealers have advised the House Appropriations Committee that they believe the assessment plan of financing FDO 79 should be continued during the war emergency, as it is the most satisfactory method yet devised of avoiding coupon rationing and preventing wartime disruption of milk marketing and distribution.

"FDO 79," said President Skinner, "is a remarkable demonstration of effective self-regulation and cooperation of industry with Government war objectives." It is a program immeasurably better than any other existing program of rationing, restriction, or allocation in the food field and it is his considered judgment that the program should be continued in its present form.

Our Job in the Pacific

OF
HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the gentleman from Minnesota, Hon. WALTER H. JUDD, before the Wethersfield Businessmen's and Civic Association annual banquet on April 27, 1944:

If we Americans who have been privileged to live for some years in the Far East have any particular contribution to make to our country's thinking in this time of confusion, it is, I believe, primarily because of the simple fact that we have had the opportunity to come to know something about the peoples who live there and their psychology, and with whom we must, whether we like it or not, be dealing in this war and after it.

I think we will have to admit that we went into this war without the slightest understanding either of ourselves or of our enemies in the Pacific area. We need to examine the situation there just as a doctor examines the body of a patient at the autopsy table.

Where did we go wrong in our thinking that a nation with the size and strength and strategic advantages of America would allow herself to get into a position where a nation with nothing but a bunch of volcanoes like Japan could shake us like a dog shakes a rat for a year? We must learn so that we won't make at least these same mistakes again.

The Japanese used to say back in 1938, after they had conquered the area in which I was working, "We fear eventually Japan and America will have to go to war. We don't want that war. But the only language the white men understand is force. They have called the tune; we have to dance to it. If such a war comes, we Japanese will win. You Americans have a great deal more money and men and resources and territory; yes. But we Japanese have spirit. We will win. Well, maybe we won't win the first time, but if we don't win the first time, then we will win next time; if we don't win next time, then we will win the next time; some day we will win." And then usually they would add, "Or if we don't win, at least you will lose." Of course, that's about as good, in the long run.

Now the Japanese militarists are aware of the fact they aren't going to win this war. That was merely a long shot, a chance worth taking. They know they aren't going to win, but they are still wholly convinced that we are going to lose. And no one yet can be wholly sure they are not right. We can win. There is no question about that. But will we? Are we willing to go on 3 years, 5 years, 10 years? I believe so, but I don't know. And neither do you, and neither can anybody else know until the chips are down.

Did those who thought up that Doolittle raid imagine that we were going to jar the Japanese out of their wits? Well, if so, they hadn't spent much time with the Japanese people. Look at what one tiny island, Tarawa, cost. Then look at the Japanese mainland, where there are 70,000,000 people like the Japanese at Tarawa, and think how many Americans will die trying to take that, if we try to win the war that way.

Perhaps two stories will illustrate the psychology of the Japanese and Chinese peoples and give us some clues as to how to deal with them.

A Japanese division had its headquarters in our city. I spent many hours negotiating with its officers on all sorts of matters, trying to protect the 1,700 women and children refugees in our compound from the things that were happening everywhere else in the city, trying to get permission to keep our hospitals and schools operating, etc.

One day in the midst of a conversation I inadvertently mentioned to the Japanese chief of staff that I had served as an officer in the United States Field Artillery in the last war. He looked at me rather hesitantly for a moment and then his face broke into a smile. Up to that time I was a troublesome neutral and a potential enemy, but when he learned I once had had military training, too, he apparently accepted me as a buddy, as if all people whoever had military training anywhere would automatically think the same as he did.

He said, "You had a hard time defeating the Germans but nothing like we have defeating these Chinese." I asked, "What do you mean? The Germans are considered to have one of the best, if not the best, military machine in the world."

He replied, "It is easier to defeat the Germans than it is to defeat the Chinese, because the Germans know how to fight. But the Chinese don't know how to fight. Therefore, it is harder to defeat them.

I began to get a glimmer of light, but I asked for further explanation. He said, "Military science is the same all over the world; the trouble is the Chinese don't understand it; that's why it's hard to defeat them. You could look at the map and study the terrain and you could tell where the Germans would put their artillery, where their infantry would come; but the Chinese never put them in the right place. You have no idea how hard it is to conquer them." He said, "We have defeated them and defeated them, and they still won't sue for peace."

I suppose that is what the Japanese mean when they say the Chinese are insincere.

Surely that gives us some insight into the Japanese mentality.

The key conclusion can be stated in one sentence. In fighting the Japanese, don't fight according to the book. If we just resist their offensives, planned and initiated at their time and place, they will be carried out with the utmost precision and with a meticulous attention to the most minute detail, such as we or any western nation are not capable of. They will be just as accurate and efficient as at Pearl Harbor, which was probably the single most brilliantly executed military feat in all history.

But, on the other hand, if we will meet Japanese offensives, not with defense but by taking the offensive ourselves and by unorthodox tactics, her military machine can be thrown out of stride, even disorganized, as easily as any great army in history.

The Chinese have proved that, over and over again. With nothing but their wits and courage, they made monkeys out of the Japanese repeatedly. And yet, in spite of all those years of Chinese experience, we insisted during the first year—and some still are insisting—on fighting Japan according to the book.

We were fools for too long not to learn more from China. The Chinese didn't have guns so they used their wits. Now they have got to have some guns in addition to their wits, but we have got to get more wits in addition to our guns.

The other story reveals the Chinese technique. A Chinese captain was brought in 60 days after he had been wounded up at the front. He had been carried from one village to the next by Chinese volunteers, civilians. His leg was so badly infected I had to take it off. As he was gradually recovering he said to me one day, "When I was a student in high school we studied English as our foreign language, and once we read a poem called, The Charge of the Light Brigade. Did you ever read that poem?"

When I replied that I had, he asked "You don't think that ever really happened, do you?"

"Oh, yes," I said, "that's true."

"How could it happen? It says in the beginning of the poem that they couldn't succeed, that there were cannon in front of them, cannon to the right of them, cannon to the left of them. Still they went on? Why?"

"Because that was the plan; that was the order."

"But," he said, "It says right in the poem that they knew the order was a mistake, someone had blundered. Still they went ahead?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"That's the way we fight, discipline, carry out orders."

He shook his head, "We Chinese don't fight that way. You westerners say, 'They shall not pass,' but even though you say that, sometimes they do pass; then what do you do? You fight like walls," he went on, "and not matter how thick a wall is you can break it if you concentrate enough power against it. We Chinese don't fight like walls; we fight like glue. You can't shatter glue. All you can do with glue is shove your fist into it, and the net result is that it's hard to get your fist out. And if you do get it out, pretty soon you can't see where it was."

There are two philosophies of waging war.

If we insist on fighting Japan according to the old orthodox plans, we will have incredible casualties. Fortunately, it appears we are learning, the hard way. That was the meaning of the interview with Admiral King, head of the American Navy, when he made an official statement a few months ago that the key to our war with Japan is China and he emphasized it by asking us to imagine what our situation would be if China were to drop out of the war. He knows how almost impossible it would be to beat Japan without China's wholehearted cooperation, and therefore he knows that we can't alone hold Japan until we can dispose of Hitler and get our full strength into the Pacific; we can do it only if our allies hold. Thank God we have a man at the head of the American Navy who is big enough to stand up and say so. It must have been an awful pill to swallow. Since the Spanish-American War our Navy has had one great commission and that was to take care of Japan; it carried out its Pacific maneuvers in great detail almost every year against Japan as the hypothetical enemy. And now its leaders frankly state "We can't do it alone."

The same thing was said by General Arnold in his report the first of January, and later by Admiral Nimitz. At last our strategists are forced to see what Chiang Kai-shek and General Chennault have been pleading with them to see since 1937—that the real way to defeat Japan was by land and air attack from China; that the best place from which to defend the Aleutians is not the Aleutians, it is China; and the best place from which to defend California and Hawaii is not California and Hawaii, it is China. The place from which to defend Australia is not Australia, it is China. The place to defeat Japan—the admirals admit it now, you don't have to take my word for it—has got to be China.

So, in addition to knowing our enemy and knowing ourselves, we must know our allies. Only by their holding can we be enabled to finish first in Europe and then bring our full strength into the Pacific to attack from the continent. What is the condition of our allies in Asia?

Begin at the north with Russia. Many Americans assume that Russia is not helping at all in our far eastern war. That is not true. Russia has been tying up five or six hundred thousand of Japan's best troops in Manchuria and Korea. Japan has never sent against us on the ground, to date, anything but her second team, except the Imperial Marines at Tarawa. Her first team has been and still is in Mongolia, Manchuria, and Korea. She dare not remove them. So actually Russia, without being in the war against Japan at all, is neutralizing more Japanese ground forces than we and the British and French and Dutch combined are neutralizing.

Second, it comes with rather poor grace, being perfectly blunt, for us who haven't gotten even one good front going yet to start out by demanding that Russia open a second front, when actually she has at least one front, and going pretty well, too.

The third thing is the assumption we could hold the much-discussed Siberian bases if Russia gave them to us. There are two important considerations about any naval or air base. One is its usefulness as a place from which to attack; the other is the ability to defend it against attack.

On the map you see how the Siberian border comes way down to the sea at Vladi-vostok, flanked for several hundred miles by Manchuria and Korea. Why, there are a score of places where the Japanese could overnight cut the Trans-Siberian railroad, the lines of supply to those bases, after an outbreak of war between Japan and Russia. Let's wait until we are in a position to defend those bases. I think we will get them when we can use them. We haven't had enough force at any time yet to use fully the bases we do have. Witness the appeals from MacArthur. If we haven't enough air power for the bases we do have, should we be demanding more bases that we can't yet defend, to say nothing of using fully?

Moreover, if Russia gave us those bases now, we would instantly lose what has been our best route of supplies to Russia, although probably overtaken recently by the Iran route. As many as three-fourths of the vessels in some convoys on the northern route to Murmansk in the summer of 1942 were sunk. Whereas every week out of Vancouver or Seattle or Portland fully lighted Liberty ships flying the Russian flag and loaded with war materials are sailing across the Pacific Ocean, right through the Japanese Islands into Vladivostok and other Siberian ports taking critical material to our Russian allies.

Russia is holding the northern flank. The center is being held by the Chinese. For almost 7 years Japan has thrown everything she could against the Chinese and has not been able to crack them. It has been an amazing phenomenon. Not a single white person in China or Asia, including myself, thought the Chinese could take what they have withstood.

The Chinese are a long-suffering people. They don't like trouble. They will yield to avoid it. Five times in 6 years they gave up to Japan, not pieces of somebody else's territory, as England and France did at Munich, but pieces of their own territory, to try to keep out of war. But when they found out that Japan could not be appeased, that they faced a choice, not between war and peace, but between war and slavery, they discovered that though they despised war, ghastly and terrible and cruel as it is, still it wasn't the worst thing in the world. Slavery was worse.

And when the Japanese committed the incredible blunder of not understanding the Chinese any better than we understood the Japanese, and when they attacked the Chinese homes, they bared a core of steel in the Chinese character, that even we who lived there did not realize existed.

China has demonstrated through almost 7 years that she can take the worst that Japan can send against her. She has endured bombings, invasion, migrations of more than 50,000,000 of her people, lack of medicines and even of anesthetics, starvation and the worst famine in two of three provinces since 1922, inflation so that the rice that used to cost $4 for 130 pounds costs up to $6,000 today, in some parts of China. All these China has gone through and never wavered. Only one thing could cause her to waver, a loss of expectation that out of her struggle she will eventually get full freedom and equal treatment among the nations of the world, a loss of confidence in the ultimate motives of her allies. That is the one thing that could break China's will to resist actively and offensively. And there are some reasons—I wish there were not, but there are—why thoughtful Chinese are being reluctantly driven to the conclusion that there is no intention on the part of some of their allies to help or even to allow China to become free and strong in her own right.

I don't like to mention these things, but we might as well be frank. They are there, and we will fool ourselves as badly as we fooled ourselves about Japan and Hitler if we don't recognize their existence and their danger.

What would you think if you were a Chinese and you observed such things as these: First, that the white man never made one real move against Japan's aggressions until Japan went into Indochina, that is, began to meddle with the white man's colonial system. Protests, oh yes, and condemnations, but never a real move until she began to interfere with the white man's empires.

Second, China was startled beyond comprehension that we, the great white powers, should prove so weak. For years we had watched Japan move ever southward, step by step by step, and yet we were caught absolutely flat-footed in our own possessions, all of us. How could we be so dumb?

And then third, our failure, our American failure, to make good on the promises that the President made on March 15, 1941, the week after the passage of the Lend-Lease Act. You remember what he said. He promised to China, as well as to the others, "unqualified, immediate, all-out aid." Now, of course, he should not have made any such promise as that. The Chinese were astonished at it; they never expected any such promise, because they knew what it involved. And for us now to try to excuse ourselves by saying, "Look at the difficulties in transportation." Sure, but those difficulties of mountain and jungle had been there all along. The Chinese knew full well the difficulties, they didn't see how we could do it; but we are the people who are always boasting that we can do the impossible, so when the responsible head of the great Nation to whom the Chinese had always looked as to no other made a flat, blanket commitment, they supposed we must have some way to deliver the goods. It may make other people feel better temporarily for us to make such promises. It raises their morale 10 points, but then if we don't make good, it falls 30 points. I don't like to say that because I may be accused of being partisan; but it is not partisan in the least. To report something unfavorable that isn't true is partisan; but to refuse to tell what is true just because it is unfavorable is equally partisan. We are first of all Americans.

Then the orientals observed, fourth, the calculated, carefully repeated speeches of Mr. Churchill. I am reluctant to bring this up because the last thing on earth I want to do is to create disunity among the Allies. Nobody can ever accuse me of being anti-British, because I was going up and down this country, as some of you know, 2 years before most Americans would believe that any of these aggressions abroad were a threat to us at all, begging that we help Britain in Europe and China in Asia, as the best way to serve our own interests in the long run. But we have no right to endanger the lives of thousands of American boys by keeping quiet on something that directly involves their lives and when even the stones are crying out.

You remember within a week of the time we landed in north Africa a year ago, and the tide began to turn, and for the first time it looked as if the Allies were certain to win, Mr. Churchill declared his views and his war aims. He said, "I have not become His Majesty's First Minister in order to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire."

I haven't the slightest criticism of his trying to establish his policy. I admire him for his frankness. My criticism is that we haven't established our policy in equally unmistakable terms. He gets there first, you see, and drives down his stake. He declares his policy, and then if we come along with a different policy we are accused of creating disunity. In a sense he was the one creating disunity, because what he said was in opposition to the Atlantic Charter. If there is disunity, it was he who created it, not we.

A month later he made a world-wide radio address in which he said that it would be a good thing, probably, if the war didn't end all over the world at the same time. If the war were to end everywhere at the same time, the chances are the allies would start quarreling among themselves; but if Hitler should be knocked out, we still would have to defeat Japan, and the fact that we had to hang together for that purpose might give us, he thought, enough cohesion so that we would be able to settle Europe's problems. Which to the Chinese, and to you and me if we were Chinese, could mean only one thing—that prolongation of their sufferings was considered of no consequence. They had been in it 6 years, but that didn't make any difference; they were just so many millions of flies. The only thing that was important was that the allies get agreement in Europe, that European civilization be saved—as if European civilization on the basis of its behavior the last 50 years deserves to be saved! I don't like to say that; I never liked to tell a patient he had tuberculosis, but if a condition exists we had better face it.

And then Mr. Churchill last May sent a message to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek in which he said, in essence. "Hold on until we finish in Europe, and then we will come over and rescue you." Now, may I suggest respectfully that the Chinese don't care to be rescued by the British or by the Americans or anybody else, any more than George Washington and Thomas Jefferson and the rest of the colonists wanted to be rescued by the French; no, indeed. They wanted the French to come in and help them get their American independence, not to have France come in and deal the deciding blow and then establish herself in control of the colonists in place of the British. Just so, what the Chinese want is not to change masters, but to gain their freedom from any master; and they have a right to expect some help from us in getting that freedom because they held the line for us so long before we woke up.

Now, the Chinese were not surprised unduly at these statements by Mr. Churchill. They are a wise, understanding, patient people. They know it would be a miracle if a man, brought up in Kipling's day in India, could suddenly begin to think differently about Asia and empires. They didn't expect that. The Chinese know that he is one of the last of a great but a dying dynasty, the Tories that built the British Empire. They know that he is a giant on the battlefield and they and we will never cease to be grateful for what he has done for us. They know also that another England is coming along in which they have confidence, as have I, and as have you.

That is, they did not expect a man with Mr. Churchill's background to come over to our side, our views on empires, but, on the other hand, they did not expect people with our background to go over to his side, his views. The thing that disturbs them most is not what he said; it is what we have not said and have not done. It is our appearing by our silence to acquiesce in the restoration of white men's empires in Asia, allowing ourselves to be in the position of seeming to have no war aims for ourselves other than the ones Mr. Churchill has for the English.

That is the dagger in China's heart, the doubt that the Allies have any intention to let her become truly free, lest it put similar ideas into the minds of other Asiatic peoples. That is awfully blunt, but we must recognize it. It may cost your boy's life out in the Pacific if you don't recognize and deal with it.

The Cairo Conference helped allay some of China's fears. The Chinese have been afraid, as well as some of us who have lived there, that the Allies had no real intention of completely destroying Japan's military power. They have been afraid, with good reasons which I can't recount in detail, that England would try to fasten on Asia the old European balance-of-power system which led in Europe to one war after another and could only do the same in Asia. They have feared that when it came to a show-down the white man would decide it might not be a good thing to reduce Japan utterly, for maybe the Chinese would get expansive notions, maybe they would produce a man with his glands out of order who thought he ought to conquer the world. (Almost every other country has had at least one or two, but China never has had a one in 4,000 years.) Maybe Russia would start expanding too much in Asia. Perhaps it would be better just to clip Japan's wings a little and keep her there as a balance, a buffer against Russia and China. That is what China has been worried about. Cairo apparently dispelled that because we can't go back on the flat commitments at Cairo without being utterly dishonest. England and the United States there agreed not to stop until Japan is totally defeated and disarmed and Korea, Formosa, Manchuria, and the mandated islands taken from her. Without Korea and Manchuria she never could have started a world war. Without them she never can start another world war. And therefore the Chinese, even though they still have doubts as to the western nations' attitudes toward them, are nevertheless reassured greatly by our blanket commitments with regard to Japan. They have feared we might give in to Japan's peace moves, which will begin the minute Hitler folds up—powerful ones aimed at those in America and Britain who are tired of war.

Another thing that has encouraged the Chinese in the midst of all the discouragements I mentioned is the four-power declaration at Moscow. I think we must credit this largely to the common sense and statesmanship of Joseph Stalin. When Hull and Eden went to Moscow, Stalin, of course, was in the driver's seat. He didn't have to make a single concession to us. He could do as he pleased. Yet, he moved over and invited some of us up on the seat too—not only England and America but also China—for the four-power declaration. If he had been like some of the men of small caliber and short vision who sold him out at Munich, he could have said, "I will show them. I'll humiliate them" He could have done that. But he apparently is smart enough to know it would almost certainly have solidified the world against Russia and within 25 years or so his country would be at war with the world. Stalin doesn't want that war, so he makes moves to reassure the other nations.

So, in the four-power declaration is clause 6, in which each nation pledges it will not use its troops after the war in the territory of another signatory nation for any purpose except the putting down of aggression, and then only after consultation with the nation in question. To the Chinese that means Manchuria. The Chinese know that after they get Manchuria back, Russia could take it over if it chose. But no, Stalin promises that he will not move Russian troops into Manchuria.

Those two declarations don't say all we wish, but I think we should rejoice in what they do say. There are two ways you can look at a situation. You can look at this glass of water and complain because it is half empty, or you can say, "It's at least half full." I think that our only sensible course is to take these recent declarations at their face value until proven otherwise, and hope they will lead to complete fulfillment eventually.

To continue the discussion of our allies: Russia holds the northern flank. China holds the center. On the southern flank there are other allies. First, the Philippines. I wish I had enough time to discuss the situation there. I think I will have to pass it by except to say that it is not too good. It is utterly unrealistic to imagine the Japanese have not made a lot of progress with their Asia-for-the-Asiatics slogan. Many of those Filipino officials who are in Japan's puppet government did not join because they like it or are pro-Japanese. They are merely hard-headed and practical. They could see no evidence that America would ever retake the islands. Therefore, why not make the best of the situation? There has been more disaffection in the Philippines than you realize. I hope and believe recent events will reverse the trend.

Now we come to the Dutch East Indies. The Dutch Government has come along with some concessions, some promises that, after several hundred years of control, they will take some real steps toward a sort of dominion status for the Indies. Better late than never.

The blackest spot on our side in Asia is the British colonies. I don't like to say this. I have British blood in my veins, as have most of you. I love Great Britain, the fine things in England's glorious past, yes, and that are there now. It hurts me that some blind Tories should destroy her through failure to understand the times in which we live. That's what they are doing, unwittingly. Time marches on and they cannot hold it back. The peoples of the Orient are on the move. No one can hold them down, no one can drive them. Japan tried that and has found out she couldn't. What makes us or Britain think we can?

In order to hold China, we have got to hold India, have got to hold Burma. They are the only bases from which we can get planes and roads to China, yet it is not because we need India and Burma for themselve, or for their resources, great as India's are. It is because we must have them as bases for the war against Japan that I plead for England to change her policy in order to gain and hold India's loyalty to the Allied cause.

Her unwillingness to make a bold movement toward reconciliation with the Indian leaders is most discouraging. It has got to come from England. But pride and tradition prevent. Let me illustrate the point by looking at Hong Kong, for instance. The Chinese aren't greatly worried about Hong Kong. England does not have a choice between giving it back to China, or not giving it back. Her only choice is between having sense enough to give it back now with a generous gesture and thereby make Hong Kong into a gigantic center of mutually profitable British and Chinese trade, or stubbornly hanging on to Hong Kong and having it become just a useless island, a drain upon the British Treasury. The Chinese can and will break Hong Kong by boycott. They did it once before, and they will do it again, if necessary. England will not gain, but will lose the good will of 450,000,000 Chinese, the greatest potential market in the world, just for the pride of saying, "We are going to hold it."

Some westerners don't see the trend in Asia. In modern times communication into China has been almost entirely by sea. On her south were the Himalayan Mountains, on the west the Tibetan Plateau, on the northwest the Gobi Desert, and on the north the frozen Siberian plains and forests. China was at the mercy of Britain, America, and Japan because they controlled the only open frontier, the sea.

But on the northwest China has a 2,000-mile-long land border with Russia. Russia knows how to make the roads and railroads to open those backward areas where China's great resources wait to be developed. If we don't watch ourselves, China is going to be oriented toward the heart of Asia instead of toward the sea. Russia can have the lion's share in developing China, if we continue to be blind and short-sighted.

In the last war, looking back upon it, we see the most important thing that happened was not any of the things that seemed important then—it was the Russian Revolution. I am willing to predict that 50 years from now, and probably in less time, we will see that one of the most important things in this war, along with the emergency of a free, independent China, was the Indian Revolution. You are not allowed to hear about that revolution. But it is going on just the same. Will the Indians and Chinese be for or against the west?

This brings us to one of the two most crucial questions of the whole war. Is this a war for freedom for all people as they fit themselves for it? Or is it only for the freedom of the self-selected peoples of the west? We are in an intolerable position, fighting for our freedom while we fight other people who are fighting for their freedom. When some French saboteurs wreck a German train, they are wonderful patriots. When some Chinese guerrillas wreck a Japanese railroad, the Chinese are wonderful patriots. When Indian patriots trying to get their freedom wreck a British railroad, they are dogs and traitors.

There are a billion people in Asia. They are awakening and no one can put them back to sleep. We will either anticipate what is inevitable, accept it, and get in at the start, and thereby gain enormous good will, or we will just cut off our own noses.

The Chinese, and oriental people generally, still trust the Americans, as I think no nation in history has ever been trusted, yes, they even look upon us with affectionate regard. Why? Because of certain things in our past. They never forget the fact that we took over the Philippines and, instead of making them the first colony in a new empire, made them a republic, set a date, and promised to give them their independence—a new chapter in the history of colonies.

They trust us because they know that although for a hundred and twenty-five years we had the power to take over the whole Western Hemisphere, we didn't do so. Every republic in the hemisphere today is independent. Hitler thinks and the Japanese think, and I suspect Churchill thinks, that the world will respect them because of the way they wield their power over others. China and Asia respect America because of they way she has not wielded her power over smaller nations. That is why they trust us; that is why we can lead—if only we will lead steadfastly in the same direction in which our forefathers started this Nation when they founded it.

Again, the Chinese never forget our 135 years of missionary work there—schools, hospitals, agricultural stations, churches, helping people—not giving them things, but helping them, strengthening them. You may have thought missionary work was rather insignificant, a sort of harmless philanthropy. But I tell you one good mission station does more for permanent friendship and peace than any battleship ever built. I don't know whether I will ever be able to do much good for my country as a Congressman, but I know the 10 years I spent as a missionary in China did a tremendous amount of good for America, although that, of course, was not the primary purpose I had in mind.

The Chinese don't forget that way back at the end of the last century, when the other nations were dividing China up, it was America's announcement of the open-door policy and resolute adherence to it which prevented the other powers from dismembering her then. They don't forget that when the other nations grabbed their indemnities after the Boxer Rebellion we took ours and returned it to China to build a great university there and to help over 4,600 selected Chinese students in the next 40 years to come to American universities and learn our ideas and skills and go back imbued with American ideals to be the leaders of China. There was never an investment in all of history that has paid larger dividends.

The Chinese veritably love General Chennault and the Flying Tigers. They still have an unbelievable, almost pathetic confidence in America, in spite of some less worthy chapters, like our arming of the Japanese and our refusal to relinquish extraterritoriality until we no longer had it to give back. They are a mature, experienced people. They know everybody gets off on the wrong track occasionally. But the main line of America's history has been toward freedom and equality for all.

One action of our Congress last fall has done more than any other single thing to reassure Asia as to our real war aims. It was the repeal of the old Chinese Exclusion Acts, and putting Chinese immigration on a basis of equality with our other allies. It was a deed, not just a word. The same quota formula which admits over 65,000 English a year will admit only 105 selected Chinese. For such a tiny price we remove a long-standing stigma, start treating them as equal human beings, instead of as biological inferiors. That is recognized instantly by all orientals as a revelation of our basic attitudes and war aims. That act will prove to be worth 20 American divisions.

One other thing has helped China's morale, the long hoped-for and spectacular successes of MacArthur and Halsey in the Southwest Pacific and of Nimitz in the central Pacific. For the first time there is visible to all real evidence that we have both the will and the ability to come back. You and I have known all along. They had faith but would not really be sure till they could see.

To sum up, then: Our first job in the Pacific is to understand our enemies, our allies, and ourselves. Second, we have got to win the military offensive. We can't win on the defensive. We must get more guns, planes, tanks, men to Asia. There never again can be a decent, orderly, secure world for America, unless there is a defeat of the thing that Hitlerism and Japanese militarism represent. But we can get that defeat, as we did once before, and still not get a decent world.

Therefore, third, we must also win the political offensive. That is where we have thus far failed worst. The less we are able to get military supplies to the peoples of Asia, the more imperative it is that we get to them spiritual help, during these desperately dark months, more encouragement and restored confidence in our ultimate aims. The harder it is to take the military offensive now, the more imperative it is that we win the political offensive quickly. That means that we in America must think through what we ourselves really believe, and how we can make the war of maximum abiding benefit.

I believe we in America today are in the valley of decision. We are at a crossroads. There are four main paths before us, each being advocated by some as the way to get security. My judgment is that the basic decisions we make now as to the directions we shall take, the attitudes and policies we adopt in these next critical months are likely to determine our fate and that of much of the world for a good many decades.

The first way, of course, is to try to go back to isolationism. It was once possible because we had two wide oceans that gave us physical separation from the rest of the world. But that separation is gone. We ourselves destroyed it with our own inventions. We, not the Germans, invented the steamboat. We, not the Japanese, invented the airplane. We, not the Italians, invented the submarine. We ate up that cake of our isolation with our own inventions and still thought we had it. Our own inventions, the ability of the airplane to ignore all land and sea boundaries, and the fact that other nations will not ignore us no matter how much we want to ignore them, make it impossible for us ever again to escape the world.

The second possible path is American imperialism. Some say that since we can't escape the world then we must run it. We must get control of the key air bases, the strategic islands, the main arteries of trade. We must build up an army and an air force and a navy that will cover the seven seas and make ourselves so strong that nobody can ever threaten us.

That sounds big, but let us look at it coolly for a moment. Have we got what it would take? In the first place, it would mean that one to three million American boys would never be able to return to civilian life. Your boy won't get back into civilian clothes, ever. Is that what you want out of this war? Permanent militarization of America?

In the second place, it would cost fifteen to twenty-five billion of dollars for armaments in our National Budget every year. We appropriated $106,000,000,000 for armaments last year. Of course, there isn't that much real money in the world, but we appropriated it nevertheless. The total to date for the war is $544,000,000,000. How many years do we think we can stand that rate of expenditure? Some day, even under these new-fangled ideas of economics, we are going to have to balance the Budget, and there are only two ways of doing it; one is by reducing expenditures, and the other is by increasing income, that is, taxes. Now we can't reduce expenditures if we are going to embark on a policy of dominating the world and provide the armaments necessary for such a program. There is left, then, only one way—higher and higher taxes. That means we will have less money for clothes, less money for food, less money for homes, less money for comforts, education, travel. That means labor cannot get what it deserves; it means capital cannot get what it deserves; it means the farmer cannot get what he deserves. Each group begins to quarrel with the others, to blame everybody else for its steadily falling standard of living; we divide into factions and America goes the way of France—blocs and national disintegration. Or some man comes along with a hypnotic personality and says, "I will show you the way. Follow me." And millions of frustrated Americans will follow him—and lose our freedom in the process: Do we want that?

In the third place, we don't have adequate natural resources. We are going to be a "have not" Nation in many, many respects when we get through with this war. We are using up our resources like mad. Those we don't have we are getting from our allies. But if we embark upon a program of ruling the world, the other nations of the world will gang up against us just as surely as we now unite against those nations who seek to dominate us. The next time, Bolivia won't be our ally to sell us tin; the next time, Chile won't be on our side to sell us copper; the next time China won't be on our side to export tungsten to us; Turkey won't be on our side to sell us chrome. We don't have them, and we simply can't fight wars without them.

And, in the fourth place, we don't have the manpower. We are going to have at the end of the war less than 140,000,000 people, a little tired and asking only to be let alone. But there are almost 200,000,000 Russians, and they don't seem to be very tired. There are 450,000,000 Chinese, and they are aflame with the desire to be free, just as our forefathers were in 1776. There are 375,000,000 awakening in India. There are almost 150,000,000 in Latin America, restless and uneasy. And America, with 140,000,000, is going to rule the world? Such an attempt would be suicidal.

The third path is that advocated by those who say, "Well, if we can't escape the world and can't rule the world maybe we can buy the world." Some people have that idea. We are to feed the people of the world, clothe them, and provide them shelter, and then they will all love us, and we will have no more trouble. Of course, that notion is based on a lack of understanding of human nature. You don't win people's love by giving them things except in temporary emergencies. Most people don't really want to be given things; they want the chance to get them for themselves. If you train them only to receive from you, then when sooner or later you have to say "No," they hate you worse for the one time you refuse them than they love you for the 10 times you gave in. It has always proved an unsound philosophy to try to help people by giving them things, instead of helping them to get on their own feet so they can establish their own freedom from want. What kind of freedom is it that you are dependent on someone else for? By very definition that is not freedom. It is self-defeating in the long run because it destroys independence and will end initiative and self-respect.

Well, if we can't escape the world, and can't rule the world, and can't buy the world, what can we do? We can join the world. We can cooperate with it. Its peoples are on the move. Let's not fool ourselves. We can't hold them back, we can't fool them, we can't bribe them. But we can join them, move along with them; yes, we can lead them, if it be on a basis not of superior and inferior, but of working together for the good of all as the true way to promote the good of each.

This is not starry-eyed idealism, or sentimentality, or utopianism. This is stern, inescapable necessity if we would make our own country safe and secure. I recognize fully the risks in such cooperation, but look at the risks of trying to go it alone. To try to stand alone in this shrunken world is to be overwhelmed. Our best hope for security is by working with other peoples of like mind to achieve in full, frank cooperation agreement as to the rules and procedures by which life and intercourse on this plane are to be conducted. They must be agreements that will be to the benefit of all parties concerned, and therefore will serve the vital interests of each. Otherwise, we cannot expect the agreements to be adhered to faithfully.

I am not greatly disturbed at the moment with the actual details of such organization. It is not possible to settle the exact form of it now, because the exact circumstances with which we will be dealing are not yet apparent. I am perfectly confident, however, that if we and the other peoples of the world see, first of all, that we must find some other way than war of solving our disputes—because neither we nor the world can stand these periodic returns to the jungle—then we can overcome the spirit of defeatism which tends t say that because it never was done, therefore it can't be done. We have plenty of able, resourceful, experienced leaders who can work out the actual machinery when we see that we must.

If we in America are sufficiently intelligent and resourceful and wise in our own American interests to be able to work out with our allies ways by which we can jointly win the war, then surely we are sufficiently intelligent and resourceful and wise in our own American interests to be able to work out with those same allies ways by which we can jointly win the peace, jointly establish order based on law and mutual agreement, and jointly prevent these periodic returns to the jungle.

The sufferings through which our country and the world is going can be either death pangs or birth pangs. They can be the end of all that freemen have struggled for through centuries and mark the beginning of a return to the Dark Ages, because mankind and civilization cannot stand more of these wars.

Or, they can be the sufferings that attend the birth of a new era in history, with greater material, cultural, and social richness than we have ever glimpsed or dreamed.

Which they are to be depends, more than anything else in the world, I believe, on the way we in America in the next few months decide to go in cooperation, with other freemen.

Thank God our country is one of the few remaining places in the world where the common people, just like ourselves here this afternoon, still can determine their own destiny—if they will.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. CURLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 2, 1944.

Congressman JAMES M. CURLEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I was deeply moved by the beacon of freedom you so ably held aloft on two occasions in the House of Representatives, once when you declared that the Jews of America, who constitute only 4 percent of our population, number 7 percent of our armed forces. This you linked to a great tradition which we have inherited from the Revolutionary patriot and financier, Haym Salomon, whose contribution to the birth of America will remain in the archives of our independence. Another occasion when you excelled in paying tribute to Jewry was when you addressed the House on the subject Mass Murder of Jews Must Stop. In conjunction with the above I should like to have a word in the midst of prevailing chaos, for I, too, was among the afflicted.

While at one time I thought that we Jews stand alone, marked for annihilation by the most ruthless enemy of mankind, I was gratified, indeed, to find that millions of Americans are too horrified and angered over the inhuman persecution by Hitler's gang of the helpless minorities of Europe. I find that all of us have a common cause, the saving of these people. If we are going to save them we must act now, today, before it is too late.

This Government has made a beginning. It has created a War Refugee Board. It has charged that Board with taking "all measures within its power to rescue victims of enemy oppression who are in imminent danger of death and otherwise to afford those victims all possible relief and assistance consistent with the successful prosecution of the war." That is a fine and noble objective in keeping with the wishes of the American people. The question is: Have we taken all measures within our power to rescue those tortured victims of Hitler's hate? If we have not, then our hands, too, are stained with blood.

I believe that the War Refugee Board is working sincerely. It has opened the way for a trickle of refugees to come out of the Balkans via Turkey to Palestine. But a trickle is not enough. They should be coming in a great, swollen stream.

The eyes of the suffering people in the Balkans are turned westward to America. Those who have managed to survive the rigors of torture, disease, and privation are hungry, whipped, footsore, and weary. They look to us for help. Through Istanbul they may escape. But more ships are needed. It is the obligation of this Government to provide those ships insofar as military operations will permit.

We are a humanitarian people. We place a value on human life. We deplore needless waste. It is, therefore, our sacred obligation to exploit every conceivable means to save lives without delay. Here at home we can do no less than see to it that our immigration laws are so administered as to place no unnecessary obstacles to the entrance of refugees into this country under our quotas. Anything less would be out of keeping with the American tradition, out of keeping with the humanitarian instincts of civilized people.

Mr. John Pehle, Executive Director of the War Refugee Board, has manifested the American way of life before a world at war. He is, in my estimation, the redeemer of millions of human beings appointed to die. He, John Pehle, has lit for the helpless a candle of hope. We must follow it with a flare of action.

You, my dear Congressman, are well under way with that flare of action. Godspeed to you.

Yours very truly,

RABBI BARUCH KORFF.

Bill Bailey and the Four Pillars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Bill Bailey and the Four Pillars," written by F. P. McEvoy and published in the Reader's Digest for April 1944. The article is one of which I am very proud. It gives good advice to bankers in every county of my State, as well as in every county of the entire United States. I recommend its reading to every Senator and Representative. I know Mr. Bailey personally. He is entitled to the greatest credit for his fine work.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BILL BAILEY AND THE FOUR PILLARS

(By F. P. McEvoy)

In Tennessee you hear a lot about the resourcefulness of C. W. (Bill) Bailey, president of the First National Bank of Clarksville, and you can understand why, because he is a good example of what country bankers can do for their communities when they are willing to use their resources and resourcefulness.

Banker Bailey will tell you that an old farmer rocking on his porch changed his whole viewpoint about country banking—and revolutionized the agricultural economy of that part of Tennessee.

For more than a hundred years the rolling red fields of Montgomery County were planted to "dark-fired tobacco," so-called because it is cured for weeks in dark barns over smoldering fires, and for decades this heavy-feeding plant has been devastating the soil and impoverishing the farmers.

Bailey, who had worked up from a junior clerk to the presidency of the bank, had been sending out circular letters filled with advice for his farmer clients. But conditions steadily deterioriated—and so did the bank.

The one day Bailey called at a farmhouse. The old farmer, rocking on his porch, invited him to sit a spell. "I want to talk to you," he said. "I've been readin' your letters all these years and now I want you to listen to me.

"The farmers around here have forgotten how to farm. For a long time we've been growin' dark-fired tobacco because this was one of the few places where it would grow, and we made a lot of money. But those days are gone. Yet the farmers go right on plantin' nothin' but tobacco, and you go on lendin' 'em money to do it—when you should be tellin' 'em about the four pillars.

"The what?" asked Bailey.

"The four pillars," said the farmer. "Four crops for the four seasons. Tobacco to sell in the later winter, lambs to market in the spring, wheat to harvest in July, and cattle in the fall. That's the way our fathers farmed before we started makin' so much money out of tobacco that we got greedy and forgot how to farm so we'd have somethin' to sell all year round."

Banker Bailey went home that night and pondered. A few days later those on his mailing list received a letter explaining the Four Pillars of Income theory.

The proverbially conservative farmers scoffed at the idea. They told Bailey that sheep couldn't be raised in that region. But Bailey had learned that, in a nearby Kentucky county with similar soil and climate, the farmers grazed 58,000 sheep and received $1,000,000 a year for lambs and wool. And that county was much smaller than Montgomery.

Organizing an auto cavalcade of 63 farmers, Bailey led them over the border to Kentucky and let them see what they could do by showing them what was being done. They came home converted.

But where would they get the money to raise sheep? Bailey promised financial backing. What was equally important, he would also provide the know-how. Expert guidance in their new endeavors was needed to make the farmers good bank risks. So Bailey staffed his bank with men experienced in every department of this diversified farming program.

A folksy letter to the farmers, entitled "Twenty-five Ewes and a Ram," told about these experts and helped sell the idea. And when Bailey brought in a shipment of 2,000 cross-bred yearling ewes which he had purchased in Montana, the farmers came from miles around to buy. Those who couldn't pay cash were financed by Bailey, who loaned nearly $20,000 in the first few days. Within 5 years 30,000 sheep were grazing in Montgomery County, providing a cash crop of meat and wool for the late spring.

Meanwhile Bailey had set up several demonstration stock farms. The bank bought 50 purebred Hereford bulls from Oklahoma and loaned them to farmers free of charge, on condition that the service of these bulls be given free to neighbors. At the end of 2 years the farmers had the option of buying the bulls or returning them to the bank. Most bought, but not before a puzzled bank examiner in going over the bank's books found 50 bulls under "current assets." The examiner questioned the asset, but Bailey convinced him. It is even rumored that his sense of humor led him to change the item to "bulls receivable."

Today practically every Montgomery County farmer owns a small herd furnishing milk and butter for the table, and calves for the fall market. Similar success attended Bailey's wheat-growing program. The wheat yield was down to 10 bushels an acre when Bailey started his "four pillars" campaign. It has climbed to 40 bushels.

Next, the marketing was made easy. At first farmers had to ship or truck their stock 26 miles to Hopkinsville, Ky. Then Bailey backed the local chamber of commerce in promoting a community-owned stockyard where, in the first 6 months of 1943, $750,000 worth of cattle were sold.

Now every Wednesday is auction day in Clarksville. The farmers flock to town, many of them with a calf or a few pigs bouncing in the back of the family jalopy. They can get as much at home as they would in Nashville; and as soon as Pa collects money at the auction, Ma takes it to the local stores to pay old accounts or make new purchases. As one merchant put it, "Now we have two Saturdays a week."

Bailey made two movies to spread his gospel. The first, Sheep in the Clarksville Trading Area, drew crowds whenever it was shown in churches and schools, all over the county. Later Bailey dramatized The Four Pillars in a color movie that ran for an hour and a half. The bank officials themselves made this picture with hand cameras, starring well-known farmer neighbors.

The film, which cost less than $1,500, unrolls a dramatic symphony of the four seasons, demonstrating step by step how to grow better tobacco, finer cattle, more abundant wheat, and how to conserve the soil. More than 15,000 farmers and their families have seen the picture.

Bailey has built up his community by lending money liberally but judiciously. His credit-information system is considered a miracle by other bankers. It is a complete record on each of the 7,500 farmers in the trading area, and is so accurate that a farmer can get a definite "Yes" or "No" on his application for a loan within 5 minutes.

Bailey tells bankers' meetings that the country banker must know three things: the people of his community, what the land can produce, and what the market is for the products. He points out that any country banker can do what he does: list all the landowners in his community from the tax records, break this list down into districts, consult at least two men in each district as to the standing of their neighbors, and cross-check these reports. He names the merchant, the doctor, the schoolteacher and the substantial farmer in each community as reliable sources of credit information.

Bailey meets his junior officers at 7:30 every morning in the bank to go over loans, new accounts and other routine business. Then the officers scatter out through the countryside to visit with the bank's farmer customers, ready with information and advice about individual problems. If a farmer needs a loan, they talk it over right there on the ground.

Bill Bailey, now in his sixties, is tall, burly, white-headed—a dynamic homespun prophet with honor in his own country. When the Graduate School of Banking holds it annual summer session at Rutgers University, in New Jersey, this rural oracle from a Tennessee town of 12,000 population draws a large and respectful hearing. Bankers by the scores have come from Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and the Carolinas to see for themselves what Bailey and the "four pillars" have done for Montgomery County.

As one of them put it, "the South has all the elements that have made great and prosperous civilizations: Mineral wealth, fertile soil, a long growing season, favorable climate—and yet the South is the poorest section of our country. Obviously what we need is more economic statesmen with the practical vision and enlightened self-interest of Country Banker Bill Bailey."

Put Humanity Above Bureaucracy

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from Il Progresso Italo-Americano of May 3, 1944:

PUT HUMANITY ABOVE BUREAUCRACY!

Before the Italian people overthrew Mussolini last July, outstanding representatives of our Italo-American community gathered to launch a movement for united and harmonious action. This committee set to work to help take Italy out of the war and aid in feeding and clothing and providing medicines for the hungry and ailing Italian people.

Many of the leading figures in this body had, for months, been appealing by short wave to the Italian masses to rise and revolt and cast out the Fascist regime which drove them into degradation and disastrous war. History has since shown what a magnificent response the people of Italy have given to these American appeals. When the Fascist dictatorship collapsed, the American Committee for Italian Democracy inscribed on its banners: Freedom and Bread for Liberated Italy.

Here were free citizens who were eager and ready to throw all of themselves into a splendid humanitarian and patriotic cause. They were not looking for material rewards, credit, glory, or power. They were concerned primarily with those to be helped. To them hunger and disease knew no political differences. Therefore, their relief organization was to be—like all bona fide American charity institutions—on the broadest all-inclusive basis, embodying all constructive forces, drawing in everybody who could be helpful.

But under our Government regulations, all such solicitations and collections of funds and contributions with which to secure food, clothes, and medicines are under the direction of the President's War Relief Control Board consisting of three members. Here the American Committee for Italian Democracy struck a snag in its efforts to help the starving women and children, the sick and the famished in freed Italy. One member of this Board died; another has been ill. Virtually, only one was left to constitute the functioning Board and to concentrate in his hands colossal power over the lives of millions of needy.

We are grieved to say that the destitute and the ailing among the freed Italian folks have been victimized by the lone member of this War Relief Board. Sundry subterfuges were resorted to to thwart the noble endeavors of the American committee to speed succor to starved Italy. Wearisome delay stalled every effort of these noted citizens to overcome poverty and pestilence in redeemed Italy. This was especially exasperating in view of the fact that this same War Relief Board has permitted extensive drives for aiding other national groups—like the Chinese, Yugoslavian, Greek, Russian, and others. These campaigns have been generously assisted by our Italo-American community.

This unwarranted conduct, rank prejudice, and injustice against the suffering Italian people, simply outrage all the dictates of humanity. By what authority can anyone arrogate to himself the right to deny free American citizens an opportunity to engage in humanitarian endeavors, in activities which can only serve our country in its crucial hours, and save thousands of lives of men, women, and children in unoccupied Italy? Why, the very name of this Board is misleading. Operating under the label of the President's War Relief Control Board, it gives the false impression that the President himself is aware of and responsible for its policies and malpractices. We know the President is beset and weighed down by countless grave problems and is, therefore, compelled to delegate authority to others.

Thus, without any justification, President Roosevelt, who has been a stanch friend of the Italian people, becomes a target of widespread resentment. Many tend to place on his shoulders the blame for the misdeeds of an individual official. We are firmly convinced that this Board must be immediately reorganized so that it can function on a fair and democratic basis—without malice or rancor against any needy nation fighting alongside of us against Axis savagery.

We call upon every fair-minded American citizen to write his or her Congressman and Senator in vigorous protest against the course taken to date by the War Relief Control Board—a course extremely harmful to everything that is near and dear to the American and Italian people. Let every organization and institution—civic, educational, fraternal, labor, and press—in our democratic ranks make its voice heard in unmistakable words to our legislators in Washington—to the President himself—in behalf of the unfortunate Italian victims of Nazi-Fascist aggression and brutality.

The fair name of our great American people and the very cause for which liberty-loving people everywhere are now paying with their limbs and lives cry aloud: Humanitarianism above bureaucracy. Away with all obstacles to adequate and prompt relief for the distressed and ill in freed Italy. Save the famished Italian people, our comrades in arms, from starvation, disease, and death.

The South's Share in the Nation

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a very informative article by Thurman Sensing, director of research, Southern States Industrial Council, Nashville, Tenn., entitled "The South's Share in the Nation."

THE SOUTH'S SHARE IN THE NATION

(By Thurman Sensing, director of research, Southern States Industrial Council, Nashville, Tenn.)

The people of the 16 Southern States, from Texas to Maryland, comprise one-third of the population of our country. It is quite fitting, therefore, that these same States comprise one-third of the Nation's land.

To rank on a par with the national average, the people of the South should also own one-third of the Nation's wealth and should receive one-third of the Nation's annual income. On a total basis, this is far from being the case. While it is impossible to give actual figures, it is unquestionably true that the per capita wealth and per capita income of the southern people are considerably below the national average. Some estimates place the southern per capita average as low as half the national average.

In only two important divisions of the main sources of income does the South exceed its proportionate one-third share: namely, the forests and the mines. The South produces 42 percent of the board lumber cut annually and 45 percent of the value of mineral products produced annually.

In a third important division of the main sources of income, the South receives almost exactly its one-third share. That is in the cash income from all products of the farm.

As fundamental as are these materials from the farms and the forests and the mines, however, they do not produce a very large percentage of the money values in present-day commerce. It is in the changing of these raw materials into finished products that the greater value accrues. In this respect, the South has been sadly lacking.

In 1940 the Southern States produced only 20 percent of the value of manufactured products. This means an average production per person of $248 compared with a national average of $433. The per capita income of the South from forests and mines and farms amounts to approximately $145 compared with the national average of $133, but this advantage of $12 per capita looks small indeed when compared with the $185 advantage the national average has over the South in value of manufactured products. The net result is to give the Nation a per capita advantage in income from these three main sources of raw materials and from manufactured products of $173 over the South.

The other main sources of income are from services rendered and from capital invested.

So far as wages and salaries for services rendered are concerned, here again the Southern States compare very unfavorably with the average for the Nation. The median income for the United States in March 1940 was $833. Of the 21 States with a better than national average, only 1—West Virginia—is among the 16 Southern States. Of the 16 lowest States in the Nation, 13 are among the Southern States. The 6 lowest States are Southern States.

The median wage or salary income for cities of 250,000 and over in population shows an even more striking difference between the South and the national average. There are 37 cities in the United States with a population of 250,000 or over. The 30 cities with the highest median wage or salary income are all outside the South; the 7 cities with the lowest median wage or salary income are all in the South.

There are a number of reasons for this lower median income for the South than the national average. The percentage of nonskilled labor in the South is much higher than in the North; 30 percent of the people in the South are Negroes compared with 10 percent for the Nation at large; a large percentage of the southern people are small farmers, where cash income does not play a large part in their welfare. Dry census figures overlook this latter point. It may well be possible that a small farmer, say in Mississippi, who has a cash income of $300 per year is just as well off as a clerk in New Jersey who has a cash income of four or five times as great. Perhaps the Mississippi farmer may be even better off insofar as the welfare of his family is concerned. There is a great difference between welfare and health in dollars, and the fact that the average per capita income in the South is considerably lower than the average for the rest of the Nation does not necessarily mean at all that the welfare of the people of the South is lower than that for the rest of the Nation.

Then, when we come to the per capita income from invested capital, the Southern States undoubtedly suffer in comparison with the national average. There are no total figures available to prove the point but we have indicative figures that unquestionably substantiate it. For instance, the Southern States have only 15 percent of the Nation's banking resources, a per capita average for the South of $281 compared with the Nation's $666; and only 10 percent of the savings deposits of the Nation, a per capita average for the South of $55 compared with the Nation's $190.

The estimated property value of the Southern States is only 25 percent of the Nation's total. (The assessed property value in these States is only 20 percent of the total for the Nation, but this is not a good comparison, inasmuch as property is usually assessed on a lower percentage of full value in the South than elsewhere.) This is closer to the South's proportionate one-third than the banking resources and savings deposits but still leaves the South with a per capita property value average of $1,300 compared with the Nation's $1,832.

It would be no explanation to say that the South's disproportionately small share of the Nation's wealth is due to the fact that the people of the South do not have as much money as the people of the balance of the country. That would be similar to the famous statement ascribed to President Coolidge that "when a great many people are unable to find work then we have unemployment."

It would be an explanation, however, to show why the Southern States do not have as much money as other sections of the country. That is a different story and goes back a long way, at least to the Civil War. In 1860 the South had 39 percent of the total wealth of the Nation; the per capita wealth of the South was greater than for the Nation as a whole. Following 4 years of the bloodiest war in history and then more years of carpetbagger rule, the South's proportionate share of the Nation's wealth was reduced to 14 percent by 1870. It's not so hard to replace living expenses; it's terribly hard to replace capital! The Civil War set the South back 100 years or more.

During the war practically everything in the South was destroyed except the spirit of the southern people. A large part of the capital of the South had been invested in 4,000,000 slaves, valued conservatively at $2,000,000,000. If the South had been reimbursed for this amount which was destroyed by Presidential edict during the war and this $2,000,000,000 had been put to work in southern industry and had increased at an average rate of 4 percent per year for the last 80 years, the South would now have $46,000,000,000 capital which it does not have. This is not an unreasonable assumption and when it is realized that the total assessed value of all taxable property in the South for 1940 amounted to only $29,000,000,000, it can readily be seen what an enormous change this would have made in the picture.

And it must be remembered that the value of the slaves was only a part of the capital lost by the South. Most of the accumulated capital of 200 years or more was destroyed. Almost two generations of the South's finest men were destroyed. Those who were left came home barefooted to a ravaged land. Then was a time when it might well have been said of the Southerners that they wore no shoes.

But the South did not complain. It set about to work out its own destiny. And it is that spirit which will not be downed that is the hope of the South. It is that spirit which is now, after all these years, beginning to bear fruit.

For the outlook for the South is not dark. The outlook for the South is bright. The South has the greatest future of any section of our land. It has the climate and the natural resources and the people and the spirit that make this inevitable. Comparing the South with the national average may give an unfavorable complexion to Southern economy but we must not be blinded to the fact that that complexion is clearing up and is now beginning to do so rapidly. The status quo (which the old Negro said was Latin for "de mess we's in") may not look good, but comparing it with the past and comparing the present rate of growth of the South with that of the Nation gives a different aspect.

The South is advancing faster industrially than the Nation as a whole. It is usually considered an agricultural section, yet in 1939 the value of manufactured products made in the South was $11,190,000,000, while the cash income from all farm products was only $2,800,000,000. The South's share of value of manufactured products remained stationary for 30 years—from 1900 to 1930—at 15 percent of the Nation's total. During the next 10 years—by 1940—it advanced to 20 percent of the Nation's total. The Southern States now contain 38,980 manufacturing establishments, 82 of which are the largest industrial plants of their kind in the world or in the United States. The value of manufactured products in the South increased from $9,805,000,000 in 1919 to $11,190,000,000 in 1939, a gain of 14 percent, while for the United States as a whole it was decreasing from $62,418,000,000 to $56,828,000,000, a loss of 8 percent. The number of wage earners in the South increased from 1,597,684 to 1,765,064 during the same period, an increase of 10 percent, while for the Nation as a whole the number of wage earners decreased from 9,096,000 to 7,887,000, a decrease of 13 percent.

Some illustrations are in order. In 1900 the South manufactured 40 percent of the Nation's cotton; in 1940 it manufactured 85 percent of the Nation's cotton. For the years 1936-37 the South gained 57 new plants in cotton manufacturing while the rest of the country was losing 42 plants. For the year 1937 the rayon industry in the South increased 238 percent over 1935, while the rest of the country was gaining only 97 percent. The South manufacturers 90 percent of the Nation's tobacco. In 1900 the South manufactured 12 percent of the Nation's furniture; in 1940, 26 percent. The South has been consistently producing approximately 40 percent of the Nation's lumber for the last 40 years. The value of wood pulp produced in the South, a new industry for this section, increased 70 percent in 1940 over 1939, compared with an increase of 15 percent for the rest of the country.

In 1900 the South only produced 15 percent of the value of the Nation's mineral products; it now produces 45 percent. Some of these mineral resources produced by the South are practically 100 percent of the Nation's sulfur, phosphate, carbon black, bauxite; 90 percent of the ball clay, barite, fuller's earth, and kaolin; 71 percent of the natural gas; over 70 percent of the natural gasoline; 60 percent of the petroleum; 50 percent of the marble; 49 percent of the bituminous coal; over 40 percent of the fluorspar and lead; over 35 percent of the feldspar, stone, zinc, limestone and lime; and hundreds of other products too numerous to mention.

The 1941 Blue Book of Southern Progress stated, " * * * the (industrial) growth which is taking place in the Southern States can be justly termed phenomenal."

As has been noted, the South produces one-third the value of the Nation's farm products. The South produces 98 percent of the Nation's cotton; 98 percent of its tobacco; 27 percent of its corn; 15 percent each of its wheat and oats. Great strides are being made in the use and development—both for agricultural and manufacturing uses—of such special southern crops as tung oil, peanuts, and sweetpotatoes. The South contains 33 percent of the Nation's cattle; 27 percent of its sheep; 30 percent of its hogs; and 46 percent of its horses and mules.

Unquestionably, the South has a marvelous future before it. Its mineral resources, with an annual output almost half the Nation's total, are almost beyond compare. Its forests produce more than 40 percent of the Nation's lumber and the manufactured products therefrom are rapidly growing. The South's income from farm products is on a par with the Nation.

Of course, the South still has its needs. It is most backward in education. The South needs better teachers, more progressive educational leaders, and more up-to-date educational facilities for its youth. The farming of the South might be more diversified. The South needs to produce much of the feedstuffs which it now imports. The South definitely needs greater industrialization, with its attendant greater income and higher standard of living. The South greatly needs more capital with which to develop its own resources.

On the other hand, the South does not need sympathy. The South would not take kindly to subsidization. Both have been exuded and advised in considerable amounts by certain alphabetical agencies in their social studies of recent years. The South has been forced for 80 years to work out its own destiny. The South as a whole desires to be let alone so that it may continue to do so.

Most of all, the South simply needs time. Under the system of free enterprise and individual initiative which has made our Nation great, the South is destined for a wonderful prosperity and in the normal course of events nothing can prevent it. Time—and the spirit of the South—will bring this about.

All Votes Are Soldier Votes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the Appendix of the RECORD a recent editorial entitled "All Votes Are Soldier Votes," written by Edward Lindsay, and published in the Herald Review of Decatur, Ill., on February 6, 1944. The editorial makes particular mention of my colleague, the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS]. It is also of interest to know that the Decatur Herald-Review is one of the most independent newspapers in Illinois.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALL VOTES ARE SOLDIER VOTES

(By Edward Lindsay)

Republican Members of Congress have maneuvered themselves into an uncomfortable position on the soldiers' vote bills. This is particularly impressive if you sit in the Senate gallery for a few hours listening to each of them building up an extensive explanation for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the folks back home. * * *

It is easy to see what happened.

After administration leaders presented the simplified Federal ballot bill that did not recognize the constitutional fiction requiring a vote for electors rather than candidates for President and Vice President, Republican Members rebelled.

This was partly reflex—if the administration wants it, there must be something wrong with it—and partly an extension of the grass roots political philosophy upon which the Republican comeback has been built.

States control the election machinery, with a few minor exceptions, so it seemed to be good politics for the Republicans to defend them against this newest encroachment by the Federal Government. It looked like a good bet.

If the fight could have been kept on this basis—an argument over the relative importance of permitting the soldiers to vote and the constitutional rights of sovereign States—the Republican position would not have been damaging to the party's chances in the next election. It might have helped.

Two other reasons for opposition to the Federal ballot bills have been widely discussed. The opposition of most of the Southern Democrats underscored the panic into which many Southerners are thrown at the thought of the consequences of making ballots available to all Negroes over 21. Moreover, the idea has gotten around that an overwhelming majority of servicemen, especially those overseas, favor the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt.

The Republicans, then, found themselves in the position of opposing the Federal soldiers' ballot to sterilize 10,000,000 voters who favored President Roosevelt, and incidentally to protect States rights. The Negro vote issue added confusion.

Obviously, this was not so good. There has been a great clamor by Republicans in both Houses to repair the damage by getting State ballots into the hands of at least some soldiers. The Army and Navy have not been very helpful. They have refused to call off the war while the ballots of every county in the United States are routed to each of the servicemen from those counties wherever they may be. Their position is that a simplified Federal ballot is the only kind they could consider handling.

This leaves the Republicans the choice of facing the charge that they deprived the soldiers of a vote or of accepting the uniform Federal ballot with as many face-saving amendments as can be tacked on. Whatever happens to the legislation, the Republicans have hurt themselves.

There is, I believe, some merit to the widely held idea that a majority of the soldiers overseas favor the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt. A few months ago I saw a confidential poll made in one group of soldiers overseas that bore out this belief. (The poll was not made by the Army or the Government.) While this report is not available for publication, it was widely distributed so there was the opportunity for political leaders of both parties to know about it.

On the other hand, reports from reliable correspondents and personal letters from soldiers at the front suggest that voting, one way or the other, is not the first thing in the minds of our fighting men. My guess is that while every soldier would tell you he ought to have the right to vote, not one in 10 would walk across the street to do it.

A soldier in a training camp in the United States is preoccupied with his weapons, his comforts, the fighting techniques he is learning and the most interesting use of his leisure time. At the fronts this absorption with the military business at hand must crowd out civilian considerations even more completely. A good bed, a bath, a package of cigarets might seem more important, most of the time, than the privilege of drawing an X in a square.

The effect on the election of the ballots soldiers mark or don't mark will be negligible. The vote of the folks at home, however, will be affected tremendously by what they think their soldier sons, brothers, sweethearts and husbands would have them do. Nearly every vote cast in the next election will be a soldier vote.

The point I am trying to make is that the soldiers' vote bills, as such, are not nearly so important as the atmosphere around the contest they engendered. It seemed to me that the opponents of the Federal ballot have lost ground and that its supporters have created so favorable an impression that Democratic candidates in the North may do better in the fall election than seemed possible 2 months ago.

If this is a fact, it has particular significance in our own State. All of the pollsters and political prognosticators put us in the "doubtful" column with a nip-and-tuck contest between Democratic Chicago and Republican down-State.

Moreover, Illinois will not overlook the part played in the soldiers' vote bill contest by her senior Senator, SCOTT W. LUCAS, Democrat. Mr. LUCAS was cosponsor in the Senate of the administration's Federal ballot bill, but he was more than that. He led the fight for its adoption on the Senate floor so effectively that he has won national recognition. He is being mentioned as a possible candidate for Vice President.

And I can see why. I have thought well of Mr. LUCAS for a long time. He is, I have known, a good representative for the State, well informed in the ways of the Federal Government, and willing to use his influence to the benefit of worth-while local projects requiring Federal cooperation. I was not prepared for the discovery that he is one of the biggest men in the Senate, and respected on both sides of the aisle.

Seizure of Montgomery Ward Plant

OF

HON. C. WAYLAND BROOKS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a splendid editorial entitled "By Due Process of Force," appearing in the Daily Republican-Times, published in Ottawa, Ill. This editorial expresses the view of the vast majority of the people who reside in this section of Illinois.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BY DUE PROCESS OF FORCE

In an outrageous abuse of his authority, President Roosevelt has seized control of the mail order properties and Chicago retail store of Montgomery Ward & Co. Uniformed, armed soldiers have evicted physically the legal operators of the business and the valuable properties now are under Government control.

The situation arises from a controversy between the management of Ward's and a union to which a number of Ward employees belong. Ward's refused to recognize the right of that union to bargain for all employees until, by vote or otherwise, such right was established.

A strike ensued and the War Labor Board, unable to effect a settlement, laid the matter on the President's doorstep. Why the War Labor Board failed to require a ballot to determine whether the union represented a majority of employees no one seems to know * * * we hope it was not to protect and foster a union which might prove to represent but a small employee group and therefore could not win in such an election.

Regarding the legal merits of the altercation between Ward's and the union the Republican-Times has little knowledge and no opinion. We believe, however, that every person in these United States must take an interest in the steps the President has chosen to take.

The management of Wards points out that the mail-order business and retail store are in no manner equipped for manufacture, production, or mining of any product or material required for the war effort, and consequently cannot be considered in the category of plants or mines in which strikes would interrupt vital war production. In view of this, it is difficult to understand why the President has a greater right to seize Wards than he would have to take over your business or ours, or to take over operation of a labor union, with an Army to force subservience.

If the position taken by Wards is upheld, President Roosevelt has openly and advisedly violated the Constitution he has sworn to uphold—the Constitution which guarantees to all of us fundamental rights without which there can be no liberty. He didn't go to the courts; he didn't ask Congress to act or to so empower him; he simply commanded the Army to take over.

Unless empowered by Congress to do so, no man—President or otherwise—may legally seize any other man's property, either in time of war or peace, and even Democratic Representative SMITH of Virginia, coauthor of the Smith-Connally Act, which gives the President power to handle labor disputes in wartime, joined with both Democratic and Republican Members of Congress yesterday in demanding an investigation of the President's action.

If Roosevelt has ordered gun-point seizure of the Ward properties without legal right, then no property is safe. Then he becomes openly a dictator * * * doing the sort of things our sons and husbands and fathers are giving their lives to prevent. If that's the way it is—and certainly that's the way it seems—the President's action is unpardonable and impeachable.

If no war production is involved in the seized Ward properties, a close examination of the Roosevelt motives becomes even more important. For more than 2 years, the Government has been jousting with Sewell Avery, chairman of Ward's board of directors, over labor matters and has forced upon the mail order house a union contract, which Avery signed over bitter protest. Could it possibly be, as some quarters point out, that the President is using the United States Army to punish Avery and to pay personal obligations to C. I. O. unions by forcing the employer to his knees? Could a greed for continued power become so insatiable that the head of our Nation has been led to a point where, for votes, he will disregard his oath of office and cater to the whims of any class or group at the expense of others? That seems utterly fantastic. Is it?

The Republican-Times believes that operation of war industries must continue without interruption and that the Government is both legally and morally justified in taking any step necessary to guarantee continuous production, whether the threat of interruption has come from management or labor. But one's imagination must be stretched thin to picture Montgomery Ward's retail store as a war industry.

We admire Mr. Avery's courage in fighting for the rights we thought were won for all of us in the Revolutionary War. We regret he was forced to bow to Hitler-like tyranny. We hope the courts will render a quick decision and that Congress will take whatever steps are necessary to prove to the people of this Nation that we still live in a democracy and that the Constitution yet means those things our school teachers said it did, 'way back before 1932.

Additional Details Concerning the Atlantic Charter Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. DANAHER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, in the permanent RECORD, volume 88, part I, at page 780, appears a reference to an address by Prime Minister Churchill dated January 28, 1942. It deals with certain discussions and events which transpired at the Atlantic Conference in August 1941. In the permanent RECORD for the events of July 7, 1942, in volume 88, part V, at page 6013, appears an account by Mr. Ernest Lindley dealing with the same matter. Those events are not unrelated to later disclosures.

I refer particularly to an article which appeared in the New York Sun on April 21, 1944, under the title "Churchill Asserts Roosevelt Reassured Him About Empire."

On the morning of Sunday, April 23, 1944, the Hartford Courant published an editorial entitled "An Empire Firster"; and collateral thereto, an editorial entitled "With No Apologies" appeared in the New Haven Register of the same date.

In view of the reference just made, it is interesting to find that in the Washington Post for Tuesday, April 25, 1944, appears an editorial entitled "Bulldog Breed."

I ask unanimous consent that these various articles may appear in continuity in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Sun of April 21, 1944]

CHURCHILL ASSERTS ROOSEVELT REASSURED HIM ABOUT EMPIRE—TELLS COMMONS ATLANTIC CHARTER DOES NOT CONTEMPLATE ABOLITION OF BRITISH PREFERENTIAL PROGRAM

LONDON, April 21.—Prime Minister Churchill told the House of Commons today that the Anglo-American mutual-assistance agreement was reached in 1942 with assurances from President Roosevelt that "we were no more committed to abolition of imperial preference than the American Government was committed to abolition of their protective tariff." Winding up a debate, Mr. Churchill said:

"At my first meeting with the President of the United States, in Newfoundland, at the time of the so-called Atlantic Charter, and before the United States had entered the war—a meeting on very anxious and critical matters—I asked for insertion of the following words in the Atlantic Charter which can be read in that document:

"'With due respect for their existing obligations.' There are the limiting words and they were inserted for the express purpose of retaining to this house and to the Dominions the fuliest possible rights and liberties over the question of imperial preference."

[Imperial preference means that States belonging to the British Empire charge lower import duties on goods coming from other States of the Empire than they do on goods arriving from countries outside the empire. Sometimes it means a waiving of duties altogether on empire goods.]

"Again, in February, 1942," he went on, "when the United States was our closest ally, I did not agree to Article 7 of the mutual-aid agreement without having previously obtained from the President a definite assurance that we were no more committed to the abolition of imperial preference than the American Government was committed to the abolition of their protective tariffs." This part of the prime minister's statement was greeted with loud, approving shouts of "Hear! Hear!"

BRITAIN FREE TO ACT

"The agreement for discussing as to how a greater volume of trade and a more harmonious flow of trade can be created in the immediate post-war years leaves us in every respect, so far as action is concerned, perfectly free," Mr. Churchill said. "How could it otherwise be when Parliament itself would not only have to debate the matters, but would have to legislate upon them when they were brought before it?

"I am convinced that there should be a careful searching and far-reaching discussion of the economies of the post-war world and a sincere attempt should be made to reconcile conflicting interests wherever possible. There must be a wholehearted endeavor begun in good time to promote the greatest interchange of goods and services between various communities of the world, and to strive for that process of betterment of the standings of living in every country without which expanding markets are impossible and without which world prosperity is a dream which might easily turn into a nightmare."

SNEERING AT EMPIRE

Declaring he never had thought that the Empire "needed tying together with strings," Mr. Churchill said he agreed that natural forces "will carry everything before them, especially when those forces are fanned forward as they will be, by the wings of victory in a righteous cause."

Reviewing Britain's ups and downs, Mr. Churchill acknowledged that there had been mistakes, but at this stage of the conflict we find the British Commonwealth and Empire more strongly united than ever before.

"It is extraordinary," he went on, "what a business it has become to sneer at the British Empire. Those who have tried it in the United States have been discredited. Those who have tried it in the Dominions have found no public backing."

CLOSE TIES ALREADY

With the meeting of Empire premiers approaching, Mr. Churchill said that the question was how the British Empire family could gain greater benefits from its already close ties.

"I do not think we should embark upon that task with the sort of feeling that if we do not do something, everything is going to crash. The world is in a crisis, but the British Empire, and the commonwealth within it, never were more united," he said. He concluded his remarks by saying:

"I have never conceived that the fraternal association with the United States would mitigate in any way against the unity of the British Commonwealth or Empire, or breed ill-feeling with our great Russian ally, with whom we are bound by a 20-year treaty. I do not think we need to choose this or that. With wisdom, vigor, and courage, we can get the best of both.

"We have often said of our British Empire, 'In my father's house there are many mansions.' So, in this far greater world structure which we shall surely raise out of the ruins of desolating war, there is room for all generous and free associations of a special character, so long as they are not disloyal to the world cause, nor seek to bar the forward progress of mankind."

[From the Hartford (Conn.) Courant of April 23, 1944]

AN "EMPIRE FIRSTER"

It is not at all to the discredit of Prime Minister Churchill that he is an Empire and British Commonwealth of Nations "Firster." In closing a 2-days' debate on the Empire he told the House of Commons that he insisted at his meeting with President Roosevelt, resulting in framing the so-called Atlantic Charter, that the words "with due respect to the existing obligations" be inserted. "These are the limiting words," he said, "and they were inserted for the express purpose of retaining to the House of Commons and the Dominions the fullest possible rights and liberties over the question of imperial preference."

And on another occasion, the signing of the lend-lease agreement in 1942, Mr. Churchill objected to one article until he "obtained from the President definite assurance that we were no more committed to the abolition of imperial preference than the American Government was committed to the abolition of its protective tariff."

Imperial preference is the system under which members of the British Empire levy lower import duties on goods exchanged among themselves than on goods from outside the Empire. It is one of the evidences of Empire, one of the ties that bind the Empire together. Mr. Churchill is a stout and staunch champion of that Empire, as he gave further convincing and eloquent demonstration in his speech last Friday.

No, this statesman who did not became the King's first minister in order to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire hasn't bartered away a bit of that Empire nor surrendered a single one of the privileges that its members enjoy. Nor will he. His foreign policy, even toward the United States, to which he admits Great Britain owes a great debt, is based on self-interest, self-preservation. In that respect he is an unashamed "Empire firster." He knows that in no other way can the British Empire be held together. Nor through any weaker policy can any other nation long survive.

WITH NO APOLOGIES

At least twice in the process of drawing up mutual agreements between Great Britain and the United States, Prime Minister Churchill assured the House of Commons on Friday, he took express precautions to make it clear that he was in no fashion or degree signing away the Empire's own preferential trade practices as between divisions thereof.

He did it first in connection with what he referred to as "the so-called Atlantic Charter," which reference brings that down somewhat out of the clouds, and implies that it may be gazed upon and weighed by mortals without deep genuflection. He did it the second time in connection with the negotiation of the mutual assistance agreement in 1942. That time, he told the Commons, he did not agree to a certain article "without having previously obtained from the President a definite assurance" that the imperial preference was in no way being jeopardized.

Mr. Churchill did not appear to be in the least reluctant or apologetic about giving Parliament the assurances. Nor, judging from his manner of relating the incidents, was he backward about insisting on full British prerogatives at the time of the transactions.

No reason can be seen, in fact, why he should have been either apologetic or backward. The incident is conspicuous, and commanding of notice, only because of its contrast with the attitude of foreign sublimation and self-derogation which some persons who try to expound proper United States policy seem to think should be America's mood in dealing with her allies. They seem to think that no American should say a single "Boo!" lest someone now on our side might take offense.

Where these get their apparent phobia toward standing four square and unashamed for the natural and earned interests of the United States and its citizens, is difficult to see. Certainly they can find no model in the attitude evidenced by those who make or expound policy for our foreign associates.

BULLDOG BREED

Mr. Churchill's speech on the future of the British Empire must have caused some eyebrow raising in Washington. It is all very well to retort to captious or ignorant critics in the United States that he wasn't called to his high office in order to liquidate the British Empire, as Mr. Churchill prefers to call the Commonwealth. It is another matter when he talks about a program to strengthen the Empire in a bond of exclusive federation. An economic tie-up is his stated aim. That doesn't mean that non-Commonwealth goods would be kept out of the nations of the Commonwealth in order that the Commonwealth might be self-sufficient. But it does mean that priority would be given to goods from other Commonwealth nations. This practice of playing favorites is called by various names, though, except in extraordinary circumstances, they are all equally noxious to Secretary Hull, who believes in a free field and no favor in commercial dealings. Economic discrimination is the commonest and the plainest phrase to describe the Churchillian prescription. In this case discrimination goes under the label of imperial preference, which came to flower in the Ottawa agreements of 1932. For returning to that system or lack of system, says Mr. Churchill, there have been reserved "the fullest possible rights and liberties."

Mr. Churchill was referring to those provisions of the Atlantic Charter and the master agreement governing lend-lease which seemed to sound the death knell of economic discrimination. Article 4 of the charter pledged equal access to trade and raw materials for all the signatories. But a qualification marred the purity of the pledge. It protected "existing obligations" in violation of the pledge. Thus the charter kept the path open to the victors for a return to all those discriminations in trade which thrust the nations into economic war in the decade prior to the outbreak of hostilities. It was Mr. Churchill who, as he now says, insisted upon keeping that path open. It was Mr. Hull who, in the negotiations over a master agreement governing lend-lease, sought to close it. Article VII appeared to renew the charter pledge sans qualification. But, though at the time it was widely hailed as having accomplished that purpose, in fact the text is as noncommittal as any of Mr. Hull's speeches prior to April 9. The clause is too long and involved to permit of recital. But, though there was no repetition of the qualification in the Atlantic Charter, the provision was so drawn as to be all things to all men. What it meant to Mr. Churchill is plain from the Prime Minister's speech. To him it didn't prohibit a return to an even tighter system of imperial preferences.

This clarification of a clarification is to be welcomed when so many weasel words are being uttered in the name of post-war reconstruction. We now know where we stand. That is we know where we stand so far as the British are concerned. But it would be surprising if the other members of the Commonwealth would want to go back to the Ottawa policy. That policy led to misunderstanding and trouble abroad and mutual recriminations among the nations of the Commonwealth culminating in a boycott of Australian goods by Lancashire towns. It will be interesting to see whether the Dominion Prime Ministers soon to assemble in London will subscribe to the Churchill policy. We are in some doubt. The Dominions like to think of themselves as free and independent nations whose nexus with the mother country is sentimental and institutional. So they are. But the surest way to injure their international status as separate sovereignties, and to intensify the feeling that they are one and not many, is to embark again on economic exclusionism under the Churchillian formula of federation.

Perhaps Mr. Churchill is merely trying to win the Commonwealth over to a bargaining position in future trade negotiations with America. There is indeed a suggestion of bargaining in his reference to American tariffs. But the two subjects are not comparable. The tariff system is by no means singular to the United States. What is at issue is whether the end of this war is going to witness a return to the pre-war days of discrimination and reprisal and war or to a serious effort to promote equality of treatment. Mr. Churchill's statement must have left Mr. Stettinius in London more than a little discomfited. Clearly Mr. Stettinius must have pleaded for a serious effort to promote equality of commercial treatment under Mr. Hull's instructions. That would be one way, the trade way, of showing that we all belong to "one world."

Lend-Lease Scarecrows

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Lend-Lease Scarecrows," published in the Lexington (Ky.) Herald of April 19, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEND-LEASE SCARECROWS

Leo T. Crowley, Foreign Economics Director, said in a statement to the House Foreign Affairs Committee that there is no truth in many of the wild stories that have been told about lend-lease, including the one that Russians were using American butter to grease their boots.

Mr. Crowley flatly, convincingly, and categorically denied a long list of accusations that have been going the rounds as half wisecracks, half whispering campaigns. He branded these charges as fiction "in some cases directly inspired by Axis radio propaganda."

We do not know to what extent Axis radios or secret agents have started these tales of the misuse of lend-lease, but it is apparent that if they were actually the products of spy rings they could not be more damaging to morale in this country. The whole basis for Axis aggression is that the weakness of the democratic nations and their incompetence and carelessness has justified the "superrace" in its depredations.

Mr. Crowley also denied flatly that the British charge up Washington whisky parties against lend-lease funds or that a variety of frivolous imports including powder puffs and nylon stockings had gone to the women of Australia or that Scotch whisky had been furnished to the British delegations.

The State Department has repeatedly investigated rumors spread by radio Tokyo and has found these statements to be utterly without foundation, Mr. Crowley said. He did say that butter shipped to Russia had found a new use in that military surgeons were giving injections of it in a new technique for the treatment of abdominal wounds whereby food was pumped directly into the intestines of a wounded man.

The biggest story of all has been that Russia was trading American airplanes for Japanese rubber and therefore was giving to Japan airplanes with which to fight the United States.

Mr. Crowley brands this as without foundation. He is right in condemning these canards and in denying, one by one, the charges that are being made because, of course, there cannot be wholehearted support of the prosecution of the war if it is believed that the resources of this country are being recklessly wasted.

Post-War World Organization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD an address delivered by David Dubinsky, president of a very large labor organization, at the American Federation of Labor Post-War Planning Forum, at the Hotel Commodore, New York, April 12, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We in the American labor movement traditionally have maintained a strong sympathy for minorities and small nations. In the open declarations of policy and in our public acts we have invariably followed out the theory of equal rights and privileges for groups of all races, creeds, and nationalities. This may be due to the fact that our labor movement, as the economic organization of all wage earners, organically draws no line between creeds and nationalities, and it may have been influenced by the fact that as part of America itself we are historically bound up with the philosophy of equality of all men.

This outlook and this philosophy of the labor movement is not exclusively American. From their very inceptions the labor movements of all countries, with very few exceptions, have adhered in thought and practice to the principle that small nations have an inherent right to independence and cultural freedom within the frame of international teamwork. Our international federations of trade unions in various crafts and industries were set up as models of such world-wide organizations within which major economic and social problems were to be deliberated upon and legislated.

It is due to this social philosophy that our trade-union leaders welcomed with such faith and enthusiasm the Wilsonian doctrine of self-determination of nations, large and small, and why Samuel Gompers and his associates of that day laid such great store by it. If this doctrine and the international institutions which emerged at the end of the First World War failed, with the result that we have a Second World War, it surely was not the fault of the labor movement.

When President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill, therefore, met on a battleship in the mid-Atlantic in August 1941 and gave the world the Atlantic Charter, labor throughout the world felt that the war had become overnight something far greater than one of defense against the menace of Nazi aggression. Labor felt that this war is a crusade for a better kind of a world, the world we have always believed in. Labor, therefore, hailed the Atlantic Charter with enthusiasm.

During the following 2 years, that enthusiasm suffered a decline as we watched with disappointment that the promises of the Atlantic Charter were not being implemented into reality.

Then came the Moscow meeting of the foreign secretaries of Russia, Britain, and the United States, when labor's hopes were again renewed. As you will recall, the Moscow Conference pledged the three powers to form a general international organization for the preservation of peace after the war. The Conference also stated that pending its formation, they would immediately set up machinery for consultation on all subjects of mutual concern. They also specified that they would call in the smaller nations whenever issues which concerned them would have to be decided.

Later came the meeting at Teheran of Churchill, Roosevelt, and Stalin and everybody expected that out of that meeting would come the announcement of a step in the direction of creating such an international organization promised at Moscow. Unfortunately, the announcement issued after the Teheran Conference said almost nothing about the organization of peace after the war.

Since that time, we have come to realize that, instead of moving to create a general international organization to maintain the peace after the war, we are face to face with policies designed to establish spheres of influence in which the great and powerful nations can dominate militarily and politically.

And Secretary Hull's interpretation of the Atlantic Charter given only a few days ago, while it was received with general favor and has aroused hopes, it does not contain enough assurance that our own disinterested policy as a member of the United Nations can prevail against facts accomplished today while the common struggle against the Axis enemies is still on. Said our Secretary of State: "The Atlantic Charter is only an expression of fundamental objectives. It points the direction in which solutions are to be sought; it does not give solutions."

Does that mean that we are ready to drop the Atlantic Charter, the promises of the Moscow Conference, and the hopes that we entertained from the Teheran meeting? Does that mean that the policy of power, the policy of spheres of influence, the policy which permits a few gigantic empires to absorb the smaller nations on the ground of "strategic security" is to prevail at the end of this World War? Does it mean that the vision of a better organized world that labor saw when the Atlantic Charter was proclaimed is to be abandoned? Does it mean that we are still adrift with regard to peace planning and peace organization? Or does that mean that after having won the war we are still likely to lose the peace?

There is one very important thing to bear in mind in attempting to answer these questions. The swallowing up of the smaller nations will not come by the consent of these small nations themselves. It could only be accomplished by force, against the will of the peoples concerned. The Nazis tried to accomplish this by the most brutal force, with what results? They could not organize Europe on the basis of swallowing up the smaller nations. And it means further that within the great empires that will absorb the smaller nations by force there will arise rebellions and insurrections against the dictatorships that will be imposed upon them. There will be no room left for democracy, no room for liberty, no room for national freedom.

What will inevitably follow is rivalry, jealousy, and conflict between the big empires, each of them desiring still greater spheres of influence, wider domination over the smaller national units on the various continents. This would, indeed, be a sad prospect, a sad conclusion to all the bloody sacrifices of this war. For such an outcome would present almost unavoidable dangers of a third world war.

American labor, the millions organized in the greatest sector of our national community, does not welcome such a tragic prospect. American labor is fearful of the prospect of great empires controlling spheres of influence after the war because it is convinced that this will never lead to permanent peace and stability. An unstable world and an unstable Europe mean that the working masses the world over will never be able to form stable organizations to defend their standards of living. An unstable world means the continuous break-down of labor organization, it means misery and degradation for the wage earners everywhere, including our own country.

Poland is a case in point. Poland is a testing ground. Poland was the first of the United Nations to resist Nazi aggression. She fought bravely against the Nazis more than 4½ years ago and she is still fighting bravely today, both on the battlefields and underground.

The Atlantic Charter promised Poland that she would not be the victim of any territorial mistreatment by any of her neighbors after the war. It assured her that she alone—her people alone—would decide what kind of a government they wanted to live under. Today Poland is faced with the probability that, whether her people like it or not, a sizable part of her territory will be taken away from her by the Soviets. What is even worse, the promise is now made to her that she will be "compensated" by a large slice of eastern Germany. That means that Poland, or what remains of her, will become a center of constant and bitter struggle after the war, a football which other nations so inclined will be able to toss around to achieve certain political objectives.

We hold no brief for the former governments of Poland. Many of their former rulers were blind reactionaries who persecuted minorities and who denied the millions of Jews, Lithuanians, and White Russians in Poland equal rights and opportunities with other sections of the Polish population. But it would be stark blindness to deny that the Government in exile of Poland, representing as it does a cross section of Poland itself, is composed of a majority of sincere democrats, many of them well-known leaders of the labor movement. But regardless of what one may think of the Polish Government today or even the anti-Semitic colonels there is one principle to which we must adhere—that the Poles and only the Poles must decide the personnel of their cabinets or ruling administration. We cannot deny to Poland as she is bravely struggling on our side in this great war for human rights, the same rights we accord ourselves and Great Britain though very few will defend British policy in India or British treatment of the Palestinian problem.

Next week, if I may be permitted to bring it to your attention, marks an anniversary of a stark tragedy which has befallen the Jewish masses in eastern Europe. Out of the continued massacre of millions of innocent Jewish men, women, and children by the Nazi demons in every part of Europe under Hitler domination, the battle of the Warsaw ghetto, which occurred on April 19, last, stands forth as a timeless monument to the desperate courage of thousands who in the face of hopeless odds chose to die as men rather than to be slaughtered as cattle by their merciless executioners. The voice of the martyrs who died as heroes in the barricaded houses of the Warsaw ghetto calls for a reckoning from the fiends who deliberately ordered the extermination of an entire people. The civilized world must not, will not, forget this titanic butchery.

And while at this point, I believe that I express the undivided opinion of the labor movement in our country without regard to affiliation when I say that the obstinate refusal on the part of Britain to lift the immigration bars in Palestine in this greatest period of tragedy in Jewish history is an act that stuns the imagination and freezes the heart. It means death for countless thousands of Jewish people seeking escape from Hitler's charnel houses and gas chambers in his bloody domain.

It is my conviction that the American labor movement, with the exception of a tiny minority who follow blindly the totalitarian angle, will stand up, together with the other free labor movements in Allied Nations in defense of the Atlantic Charter. And by that I mean not the interpretation of the Atlantic Charter to accommodate and to appease certain elements in Britain as well as the "realists" in Soviet Russia.

No one will honestly charge the American trade-unionists with enmity or jealousy toward Soviet Russia; no American trade-unionist can honestly underrate the magnificent role of the Russian people and its armies in the common war we are waging on nazi-ism and its barbarities. But if it is realism that we must practice, let us keep our eyes open as realists of the situation. There is today an unfortunate and dangerous tendency to confuse ruthlessness with realism. We shall not be fooled by those who pay lip service to unity, but in reality hunger for power and domination of other peoples; by those who profess to believe in national rights and freedom for all small nations, but in reality follow the policies of narrow national interests and world power.

We of the labor movement who hailed the Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms" do not wish to see them emasculated and watered down to a point that neither friend nor enemy will be able to recognize their force and meaning. As a great democracy, our strength in war and peace does not lie in appeasement—this we have learned from bitter experience in the past half-dozen years. Rather, is our strength in the force of principles which underlie decisions; rather, is our strength in the confidence and faith which the world may have in America as a land that believes in what it promises and acts accordingly.

We of the labor movement are for real democracy and real freedom. That's why we stand by the Atlantic Charter for all and every people on the face of the globe. That's why we demand that it shall not be treated as a scrap of paper. It is such scraps of paper which today incite national hostilities and tend to even more ghastly conflagrations tomorrow.

Governor Dewey's Report to the People of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEONARD W. HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I am confident that the Members of the House will be tremendously interested in having made available to them the text of the address by Governor Dewey to the people of the State of New York, made on April 14, 1944.

In appraising the message, many things stand out. Especially significant, to my view, is the matchless teamwork, unity of effort, and cooperation that has been achieved in the government of the Empire State. Governor Dewey's administration is close to the people, and it is particularly refreshing to see this contrast in government with what is happening in the national field.

Tonight I want to give you my second annual report on the administration of your State government. When I reported to you last April, we had just made a fair beginning on the task of cleaning out, from the departments and agencies of the State, the accumulated cobwebs of 20 years. In the last 12 months, without interrupting or disturbing for a moment the day-to-day business of the State, that job has made tremendous progress. We have now in Albany a complete administration, infused with new blood and new energy, filled with a spirit of teamwork between the legislative and executive branches, working in cooperation with each other, with the people of the State, and with the local units of government which are closest to the people.

We are striving, in other words, to establish and maintain a genuinely competent and progressive government—in sharp contrast with that type of personal government which talks fine phrases of liberalism while seeking to impose its will and its whims upon the people through centralized bureaucracies issuing directives from a distance.

Three immediate and fundamental purposes have guided our work to strengthen the State government: First, to win the war; second, to prepare for a rapid and smooth readjustment to peaceful pursuits, once complete victory is won; third, to preserve and develop that freedom at home for which our young men are fighting abroad. In the light of that intent I want now to throw into perspective for you the pattern and interrelated purposes of what we have been doing since last April.

When the year began it was clear we were going to have a large accumulated surplus in the treasury; actually, at the first of this month, starting the new fiscal year, that surplus amounted to $163,000,000. This money had piled up as a result of abnormal wartime conditions and of good State housekeeping. There were many suggestions of pleasant and useful ways in which we might spend it. But it seemed to me, and to the Republican leaders of the legislature, that this money was not really ours to spend. Rather, it was a fund to be held in trust for the million young men and women of our State who are in the armed forces, for the millions of war workers who, when hostilities end, will be changing over to peacetime jobs. When that time comes, a great responsibility will fall upon the State, which it must be ready to meet without delay—to help industry convert itself to peace production and to contribute its own part through immediate launching of needed and deferred public works.

Accordingly, in my opening message to the legislature—to forestall raids which were later vigorously attempted by pressure groups on this wartime surplus—I proposed to create a post-war reconstruction fund and to lock up in it, the entire surplus. This was done, as chapter 1 of the laws of 1944.

Our State Post-War Planning Commission has been working hard to prepare for the day of reconversion for peace. Blueprints are now being drawn for new housing projects. Plans are being made for urgently needed additions to our overcrowded State hospitals. Under a law passed this year we are now already at work, preparing to purchase rights of way for a great arterial highway system.

When the day of reconversion comes, New York State will approach it, not merely with blueprints and bond issues to create new debts; we will have, ready for instant use, a minimum of $163,000,000 cold cash. Moreover, the State department of commerce is working intensively with business, big and small, all over the State, for the new industries and quick change-overs, which will provide the great bulk of opportunity and employment for our people.

Some of you have now paid the first quarterly installment of the State income tax. You know, therefore, that we were able to salt away our surplus while continuing the 25-percent reduction in the tax on personal incomes. Many of you did not have to pay any State tax at all, because we had been able to continue the high exemptions—$1,000 for single persons, $2,500 for married folk, and also to continue the deductions for medical expenses, life-insurance premiums, and children in school. But the most gratifying thing about the income tax this year was that we were able to let the taxpayer make his return on a new and simpler one-page form.

When the president of the State tax commission first proposed that simplified form I realized once again how fortunate we now are to have a cabinet officer who is out to make taxation more simple, rather than to drape it in mysterious complexities.

When I spoke to you last April we were just hearing the first of that sordid history of corruption under the workmen's compensation law which was revealed by a Moreland Act Commission. For many years groups of corrupt lawyers, doctors, and laymen, licensed by the Department of Labor to represent claimants, had been siphoning off millions of dollars from benefits due to injured workers. There were also shocking delays by the industrial board in determining the case of injured workmen; the board was 4 months behind in its work.

Eighteen bills designed to correct these long-standing evils were proposed by me to the legislature this year and are now law. Under this program the industrial board was enlarged from 5 to 10 members, so that determination of claims of injured workmen can be cleared within a month. Another bill increases benefit claims from $25 to $28 a week. Still others provide for increased benefits for disability and death resulting from dust—the disease we know as silicosis. Other bills will, I hope, under good administration, drive the thieves permanently from the field of workmen's compensation.

The working men and women of our State can now know that they will receive full and prompt compensation for their injuries. They do not have to pay 1 cent for tribute to anyone.

Trade-unionism is an increasingly important factor in the life of our State, but events of the last year have shown us that workers and employers alike have much to learn about the vast field of industrial relations. One of the most important things we did this winter was to create, through action of the legislature, a State school of labor and industry at Cornell University. This school, blazing a great trail, will offer advanced studies in this rapidly expanding field, will prepare young men and women for useful careers of leadership in the solution of labor's perplexing problems. Such a school as this can become not only a training place but also a meeting ground for industrial statesmanship.

One of our most grievous problems in industry has been that of discrimination against some groups because of race or religion, and particularly because of color. I am deeply gratified at the progress we have made through a committee of the war council, and New York State today leads the Nation in employment regardless of race, creed, or color. But with the end of the war the fight against discrimination in employment will need new legal basis. Accordingly the committee proposed legislation to me and to the legislature to this end. Unfortunately the bill came in just 2 weeks before the close of the session, and I was advised that, despite my interest in it, no action could be taken at this session. To make progress in the meantime, after consultation with the chairman of the committee, I recommended to the legislature, and it passed, a bill creating a temporary State commission for the purpose of drafting good, sound legislation. Shortly the members of the commission will be appointed, and I have every hope and expectation that they will be able to report to the next session of the legislature a system and philosophy of law for the permanent elimination of discrimination in industry in peacetime.

Now, as in normal times, much of your State's daily work has to do with the health and social well-being of its people. Let us take a swift glance now at some of the things which have been happening in some of these basic State departments.

I have just signed two important laws to improve our public health service. One of them discontinues the so-called means test for care in county tuberculosis hospitals. In other words, a person no longer has to be a pauper to have quick treatment for tuberculosis in a county hospital. The means test has long stood as a barrier to the early hospitalization of many tubercular patients, who have stayed at home risking the infection of others in their families, gradually exhausting their resources and becoming impoverished and neglected. Now we have a better chance to put them under treatment right away; they have a better chance for recovery and restoration to a useful place in society.

I have also approved a bill empowering the commissioner of health to reorganize his department, rearrange divisions and bureaus—in short, to bring it up to date. Since the health department was last reorganized some 30 years ago, its annual budget has increased from $576,000 to $5,346,000, its personnel from 230 to 2,300. In those years our needs and concepts of public-health service have changed utterly, but the department just grew—like Topsy—and its divisions remained rigidly in the old mold. Now they can be reshaped for present needs with better service to all.

The same principle of responsible administration was involved in a recent bill to give New York City a real superintendent of schools. Down through the years, since the consolidation of the greater city, its schools have been run by a circle of nine associate superintendents, each with a neighbor on his left and another on his right, with whom to share responsibility. Every city I know, except New York City, has long had a superintendent of schools who, under the board of education, was the responsible operating head of the school system. I am profoundly convinced that the school children of New York are entitled, equally, to a system with responsible leadership. We had to fight hard, for 2 years, to get it but get it we did, this year.

The social-welfare department has been busy at the job of reexamining and simplifying its procedures. I have just signed a whole series of bills wiping out technicalities which long had stood as obstacles to assistance for worthy cases among the blind, the aged, and dependent children. During this past year our social-welfare program extended aid, for the first time, to some 7,000 dependent school youths between the ages of 16 and 18. With the aid of the State, free school lunches for New York City's needy children were continued when the termination of W. P. A. threatened to force abandonment of the program.

I am happy to report real progress in our program of providing care for the small children of women engaged in war industry. Through the committee on child care, the State is contributing to 47 child-care centers in New York City and to 105 centers upstate. Arrangements are now being made to speed the opening of new centers in war manpower shortage areas.

A year ago we had just discovered the deplorable epidemic of amoebic dysentery which had raged unchecked for 2 years at Creedmoor State Hospital. Since then the Department of Mental Hygiene has had a thorough investigation; its headquarters staff has had a house cleaning, and a new cabinet officer is at its head—the finest, I believe, in the United States. Where we had defeated hospital administrators who had thrown up their hands and surrendered to discouragement, we now have able, energetic men who are giving real leadership. We still have, of course, serious problems in our mental hospitals because we simply cannot hire enough help to give proper care to our overcrowded mental patients. But with the superb loyalty of the employees we are carrying on the work and making great strides in its improvement.

During the last year the administration, by heroic efforts, has virtually completed a long-overdue classification of some 20,000 positions, aimed to make these hospital jobs more attractive. The classification and salary boards and the division of the budget are still working long hours to smooth out the kinks in this tremendous undertaking. All told, improved pay scales and administrative practices are helping the employees. In addition we are getting better cooking, as a result of increases in pay for cooks, and for the first time, provision has been made for dietitians in all the hospitals.

Most important of all, we are in the process of trying, at long last, to change the basic concept of our mental hospitals. We must not regard them as mere institutions of custody. We must and will make them into institutions not merely of care but of cure, not of despair but of hope—hope for restoration of mental health. Our State can have no more important long-range objective—through research and sound administration—than the cure and conquest of mental illness.

Last year we were worried about food; this year we had better not stop worrying. Right now we have gluts in certain foods, which give us an illusion of plenty, and which might lead to a dangerous complacency.

There is, for example, a temporary surplus of potatoes and eggs which, for the farmer who went all-out for maximum production, is a matter of serious and unjust distress. But there is a great, overshadowing specter of food production in general which is a matter of real concern.

The people of New York may well be proud of the way the farmers of this State met the crisis last year, with inadequate help, little new machinery, excessive regulation, and, at times, not even gasoline for plowing or cultivating. Under the distinguished leadership of the Emergency Food Administration many obstacles were overcome. The crops of our State were harvested and processed without loss last fall with the extra aid of a volunteer army of 111,000 workers.

This year, as we enter what may well be the decisive moments in our war against the enemies of mankind, it is doubly important that the crops of our State be produced, harvested, and processed. The Emergency Food Commission is on the job to foresee and meet critical problems. This year the State and Federal farm-manpower agencies estimate that we will need a volunteer army of 140,000 seasonal farm workers. I am sure the people of the State will respond to the call for help to the farmers in even greater numbers than last year.

I have told you about our post-war fund and how it has been segregated and saved, to be used for the benefit of our returning veterans. Now, in conclusion, I want to explain in some detail our further plans for these young people who must be first in our hearts and plans.

One thing immediately at hand for the benefit of these veterans while they seek employment is unemployment insurance. Nearly half of the members of the armed forces from our State come from our farms and from small businesses, which are not covered by the unemployment insurance law. So today, as a result of action this year, and until the Federal Government takes action, there is unemployment insurance for every returning New York veteran.

We have set up a temporary commission to study the various proposals for assistance to veterans and to help them and their families learn of the many provisions, both State and local, which exist for their assistance. The sum of $100,000 was appropriated for this commission.

Your State administration also took the lead in proposing a simple, workable formula for soldier voting. Under the new State law, adopted at this last session, every member of the armed services desiring to vote has simply to send in his name and his home and service address. He will then receive in the mail a ballot and self-addressed envelope.

This soldier ballot will not be the blank piece of paper which was sponsored in Washington. Nor will it, as the National Government tried to do, deprive the soldier of his constitutional right to vote for every office to be filled. It will give every man and woman in the armed services, by the simple act of signing his name once, a valid vote for every candidate from President down to the local officers in his home town. Under this New York law voting is simpler for a soldier on foreign service than it is for a citizen here at home and the honest ballots cast by real soldiers will not be canceled by the frauds which other proposals would have permitted.

The problem of the interrupted or incomplete education of our youth in the armed services is vital to them and to our country. We must not miss part of a generation of skilled men and women or of doctors, clergymen, lawyers, architects, and engineers. To this end, the legislature this year created 1,200 scholarships for veterans to continue their studies. Those scholarships are available now for the veterans who are already returning from war this year and 1,200 per year will be available after the war.

We have taken the first step in the direction of technical training through action looking toward a system of vocational courses throughout the State. In the present State institutes and others to be established our returning veterans who have served in technical ratings will be able to receive further training in their military-taught trades for peacetime use.

These, then, are part of the fruits of the labors of the past year. They are, of course, only the portion of which mention is possible in a summary report. But they show the purpose with which our war tasks are being met and the spirit and purpose of your State government.

Running like a thread through our every thought and act has been the sacred task of bringing this tragic war to a speedy and overwhelmingly successful end. No other consideration can be allowed to enter our minds until nazi-ism and fascism are totally wiped off the face of the earth.

But, as we labor with singleness of purpose to this end, we can think and plan for the future. We must look to the day when freemen everywhere, regardless of race, color, or creed, can live in freedom, can work at occupations of their own choosing, can raise their children in the traditions of their parents, can worship God in the manner of their own choosing. We can, and we must, keep our own society clean of those within who would lead us into paths of narrow or bigoted selfishness.

Our State will be strong to meet the great problems after the war. It will be clean of the poison of hatred or prejudice. It will be set on its course toward full peacetime production and employment for all the day the war ends. It will do its part in the Nation to the end that out of this war may come a happier day for all mankind and the beginning of a just and a lasting peace.

Statement of Senator Taft in Voting for the Connally Resolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by me regarding my vote for the Connally resolution, together with a copy of the Connally resolution.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Connally resolution expresses the opinion of the Senate in favor of international cooperation to assure peace in the future world. While it has no legislative effect, the overwhelming vote by which it has been adopted demonstrates clearly to our allies the desire of all the people of this country to make every effort to develop a practicable plan. The resolution makes clear that any specific plan negotiated by the President must be later approved by a two-thirds vote in the Senate, and the resolution is therefore not a commitment to support any specific plan.

The first three paragraphs comprise the original Connally resolution. The fourth paragraph is identical with paragraph 4 of the Moscow Four-Power Declaration. The fifth paragraph is an amendment offered by Senator Willis of Indiana. I think it was wise to add the Moscow Declaration, so that there might be no question of any conflict between the Senate and the executive representatives of the Four Powers.

As I read the Connally rsolution, it expresses the willingness of the Senate to abandon the traditional policy of the United States which usually refused to commit our Government to any action in advance, and left it free to deal with each crisis as it arose. On the other hand, the insistence upon the "sovereignty" of nations in both paragraphs excludes the idea of any federal union, or international super-state, or predominant international police force strong enough to overcome the national forces of every nation in the world. The language taken from the Moscow Declaration excludes the policy of any exclusive military alliance as advocated by Mr. Lippmann.

My only criticism of the resolution is that it omits any reference to the establishment of a rule of law and order, and to a world court to interpret that law. This principle is set forth far more effectively in the resolution adopted by the Republican Post-War Council at Mackinac. However, it may be argued that a rule of law is implicit in the setting up of any general international organization.

The resolution as passed, therefore, is like the Mackinac resolution of the Republican Party, the Hull speech of September 12, and the Moscow Declaration. It looks in the direction of a league of nations not unlike that established after the World War, but with more definite obligations to use national military forces to suppress aggression in its early stages. This is the policy which I have heretofore favored, and I believe there is now substantial unanimity on the broad outlines of such a policy, between the President and Congress, between the Senate and the House, and between the Republican and Democratic Parties.

THE CONNALLY RESOLUTION—ADOPTED BY THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES NOVEMBER 5, 1943

Resolved, That the war against all our enemies be waged until complete victory is achieved.

That the United States cooperate with its comrades-in-arms in securing a just and honorable peace.

That the United States, acting through its constitutional processes, join with free and sovereign nations in establishment and maintenance of international authority with power to prevent aggression and to preserve the peace of the world.

That the Senate recognizes the necessity of there being established at the earliest practicable date a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security.

That, pursuant to the Constitution of the United States, any treaty made to effect the purposes of this resolution, on behalf of the Government of the United States with any other nation or any association of nations, shall be made only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

H. R. 1649

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED J. ELLIOTT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, when a legislative bill is presented for the consideration of this body that will simplify taxation and at the same time apportion the tax burden in accordance with the ability to pay; a bill that will raise abundant revenue for Government without oppressing the taxpayers and at the same time insure permanent prosperity while adding to the sum total of human happiness—and all without incurring one cent of debt—such a bill, Mr. Speaker, should immediately engage the interest of this Congress.

Unless my ability to analyze the written word has gone entirely hay wire such a bill is now in the hands of the Ways and Means Committee and should be brought on the floor of this House for discussion and debate. I refer to H. R. 1649. This bill is quite revolutionary in many respects, but we are living in a revolutionary age and are being presented daily with new ideas that a generation ago would have been labeled fantastic, yet are proving their worth with every passing day.

The first unique feature of this bill that I shall mention calls for every individual in the land who is making a living or selling goods or services for profit to pay a tax on each and every such transaction and do it every 30 days. This feature of the bill makes the payment of taxes almost painless, at least not more painful than paying the grocery or rent bills. It makes practically the entire adult population taxpayers. This is an immeasurable improvement on our present system. We are facing the necessity of carrying a debt and interest burden greater by far than any other nation has ever faced in all history—a burden that cannot be carried unless every soul in the land assumes his or her proportionate share and hands it over promptly. Not only does the bill require the individual to do his share, but it requires every business of whatever nature that is run for profit to do the same. This feature, as stated flatly in the bill, is a gross income tax. It would permit of no deductions other than to eliminate the tax from the first hundred dollars of intake.

This exemption is for the relief of the lowest income wage earners. Few there are who have ever given heed to the tremendous possibilities in the gross income form of taxation. Economists of note are of the belief that at least 10 times the revenue can be obtained through it that is collected from a net property tax. To the doubters I would refer the report of the tax commissioner of the Hawaiian Islands where the gross income tax system has been in operation since 1935 and is producing from a 1½ percent rate $25 per capita from each of their 400,000 people, young and old. This low rate gives these island people $10,000,000 this year for their cash box which is always full. They have not borrowed a cent since they cleaned up a burdensome debt of $2,000,000 after adopting the gross income tax system.

The next unique feature of bill H. R. 1649 lies in the disposition that is to be made of the money that is collected. It only asks for a 3-percent tax to begin with until the fruitfulness of the system is demonstrated. The entire production of the 3 percent tax is to be distributed equally each month to some 16,000,000 people who are distributed about equally—10 percent of the population everywhere—throughout the country, who are so afflicted with physical disabilities as to hinder them entirely from making a living. Each of these will be paid his prorata share of all the tax produces every 30 days on the one condition that the money must be spent within the ensuing 30 days as a qualifying requirement for receiving the next month's payment.

The intent of this disposition of the tax money is evident. It will convert some 16,000,000 people, who are now to a great extent objects of charity, into self-reliant contributors to the public market, thus building business in every locality instead of being a burden to that locality. Here is indeed a unique feature. It is believed by economists that the 3-percent tax will raise on the present level of business $1,600,000,000 each month, or enough to pay each of these afflicted people about $100. Now, when we contemplate what would happen in any community where a tenth of the people who are nonbuyers suddenly become important buyers, we begin to see the true design in this bill. What every community wants is a factory pay roll or a sustaining business revenue that is dependable. This distribution of tax money coming, as it will, into every community each 30 days and being expended there will be the equivalent of a factory pay roll the wages of which would rise with the growth of business, for obviously, as the gross business of the country grew the volume of tax money would grow, and more money could be distributed accordingly.

Now let us see what would in all probability take place if our National Government were to establish this constant and liberal flow of money into every community. In the first place it would make every community prosperous, not just those which have factory pay rolls now. The war has taught us how enviable are those communities where Government contracts have been placed. Unfortunately not every community has received these contracts and thus we see a spotty and uneven condition in the financial health of the Nation. The even distribution of buying power throughout the entire country proposed in this bill will eliminate the upkeep of poor houses and farms, wipe out the costs of charity in all its ugly forms, probably reduce our jail and penitentiary population by 75 percent within a few years, and raise the standard of living and education immeasurably. What a boon it would be for the general health of the Nation in eliminating the cares and worries of all the afflicted ones as well as those of the ones who are burdened with the necessity of caring for the afflicted.

This war in which we are engaged has taught us one all-important lesson, namely, prosperity depends entirely upon the rapid and continuous movement of money. The income of the country has risen during the past 2 years a hundred billions of dollars above prewar times and for no other reason than that the demands of war made a rapid distribution of money necessary. While turning all our energies into the production of destructive goods, we have become immeasurably enriched and now are enjoying a prosperity that we never believed possible. We have developed our productiveness as a nation beyond any former conception of our ability. We must not allow this productiveness to lapse. We have foolishly burdened ourselves with an enormous public debt. This debt we must pay. If we repudiate it, we will destroy the profit system of business upon which our Nation has developed and grown great. To pay off the debt and its concomitant burden of interest we shall have to maintain our wartime prosperity. This cannot be done unless we systematize the flow of money throughout our entire population on an even more equable basis than the war has made necessary. Every community must prosper. Not just those where industries have developed. We must make it possible for industry to develop in every community. Wealth must not be allowed to accumulate in certain spots to the impoverishment of other spots. To have a nation safely and enduringly prosperous all its citizens must become prosperous.

I believe, my colleagues, that in House bill H. R. 1649 we have a proposal that, if we adopt in time, before the war ends and unemployment piles up on us, will insure the continuance of our present prosperity and steadily improve upon it. I adjure you to give serious and prompt consideration of this bill and to see that it is brought before this body of lawmakers for immediate discussion.

Candidacy of Senator Lucas

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "SCOTT LUCAS Announces for Reelection," from the Alton Evening Telegraph. I am advised that the Alton Evening Telegraph is one of the most influential Republican newspapers in downstate Illinois.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SCOTT LUCAS ANNOUNCES FOR REELECTION

Senator SCOTT LUCAS, of Illinois, in announcing that he would seek renomination and reelection on his record, is relying on a fine background when he seeks office. Senator LUCAS has done well since he became the Democratic Party candidate for Senator. It is a fitting compliment to him that he is to have no opposition in his own party and he deserves that recognition. He has been a useful man in the Senate. Though he has not always sauntered happily along the New Deal path hand in glove with the policies of the New Deal, he nevertheless has merited and received the confidence of his colleagues in the Senate and he is one of the most influential men in that body. He has always shown a readiness to be of any possible service to his constituents and he has had the natural ability as a legislator and an influence that has made him a useful man.

For usefulness he is on the high level of two predecessors, William B. McKinley and James Hamilton Lewis, which ought to be a high compliment.

Continuance of O. P. A. Is Essential to Wartime Business, Say Grocers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in the near future this Congress will consider the manner of extending the Office of Price Administration.

It is my opinion that the testimony before both the Senate and House Banking and Currency Committees justify that extension without modifying amendments.

The administration of the Price Control Act presented tremendous difficulties and many mistakes have been made, but at the conclusion of its second year we find the O. P. A. functioning smoothly and holding the line against inflation.

The independent retail grocers are cooperating with the O. P. A. in a fine manner, and I wish to append to my brief remarks an article which appeared recently in their trade paper, the Independent Grocer:

CONTINUANCE OF O. P. A. IS ESSENTIAL TO WARTIME BUSINESS, SAY GROCERS

(By Martin V. Merritt)

The independent retail grocers of this country are pretty well united on one point. They want the O. P. A. continued. It's a safe bet that every one of them will be glad enough to see O. P. A. go when the time comes, after the war, but right now they feel that it is needed and needed badly.

One does not have to inquire far in metropolitan grocers' circles to learn which way the wind blows on that subject here in New York City. There is a very evident unanimity of opinion and those who express this opinion appear to have sound reasons for their judgment. They are not content to say that they want O. P. A. continued, they insist on reasoning it out with their questioner, and it would seem that no one knows better than the independent grocer why the Government price agency should be carried on.

existence of O. P. A. comes to an end on June 30. There appears to be little doubt that it will be given another year of life, for even with the opposition to O. P. A. that can be found in Congress without scratching the surface, there are few Members of that august body who would want it on their politic souls that they had voted against O. P. A. and thus caused what would be likely to be the greatest economic holocaust we have ever seen.

As one food manufacturer put it, speaking of O. P. A. this week, the crash of 1929 would be schoolboy stuff compared to the crash and profiteering spree that would follow immediately on the heels of O. P. A.'s sudden and unheralded demise.

BILL INTRODUCED

A bill has already been introduced in Congress to extend the life of the Price Control Agency until June 30, 1945. Whether this bill will pass in that form or will be roundly amended is something no one can say. There is a marked difference of opinion, however, between many grocers who have expressed themselves on this subject and the Congressman who introduced that bill. The grocers believe that O. P. A. should not be extended for a year and then possibly for another year but rather should be continued by enactment at this time for the balance of the war and for as long thereafter, with a reasonable limit, as is necessary for an orderly retirement of its regulations.

It is quite obvious that O. P. A. cannot simply close its doors at any time, whether it be this June or 5 years from now, without causing a tragic upheaval in business. The price structure that this agency has set up during the past 3 years must be retired systematically and in good form. It must be done in each specific case at a particularly appropriate time, when conditions in that market are sufficiently adjusted to stand the shock. It is probable that this ideal time will arrive in some fields much more rapidly than in others and this must be taken into consideration by O. P. A. when it is preparing to close its doors.

Just as O. P. A. established ceilings in various commodities only when and because they were needed, so must O. P. A. retire those ceilings only when and because they are not needed. Of course, some limit must be placed on its liquidation because it seems that everyone agrees that continual Government control of price is not desirable.

RATIONING PROVIDES ANOTHER PROBLEM

The rationing feature of O. P. A. operation provides another problem, for here is a governmental function that must continue as long as there is a demand for food beyond the capacity of our national supply. As long as we contribute to the feeding of post-war Europe and possibly post-war Pacifica, there will not be enough food to satisfy any demand in this country and as a result of this condition we must have rationing.

On the price front, the grocers of the city are farsighted enough to know that they would have lost much of their volume had it not been for ceilings on many food items. Had these prices been allowed to climb to unreasonable heights, the average family would have found it well-nigh impossible to buy a well-rounded menu and would have sought specialized fields in foods.

GROCER FARES WELL

It is generally admitted that the retail grocer has fared well under price control. While there have been, and still are, several items in which the grocer may feel a pinch, nearly all of the price-controlled items in today's grocery store provide a fair mark-up—a margin equal to or better than that provided by independent operation in the pre-war period.

From the consumer's side, too, there is reason to want O. P. A. continued, say the grocers, for it is evident that the cost of living would have soared high above present levels were it not for the controlling influence of the Federal agency.

SOME ERRORS SEEN

There have been a few mistakes made by O. P. A., grocers point out, but they have been recognized sooner or later and adjusted. The original idea of housewife policing on price ceilings proved to be "the bunk," as one grocer put it, and O. P. A. was reasonably quick to change the plan.

The multitude of regulations that once flooded and confused the grocers has been reduced and at present are being cut down even more by consolidation of price orders in groups.

O. P. A. has also restyled its orders on a specific price basis wherever possible, thus doing away with much of the confusion of formula plan in retail pricing.

All of these changes show that O. P. A. is flexible enough to correct its own errors—a point that is very much in its favor.

There is little doubt that the agency will be given a new lease on life, but the grocers of New York nevertheless have expressed themselves forcefully in favor of its continuance.

The Guayule Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE E. OUTLAND
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, on several occasions I have addressed this House on the importance of continuing our guayule program. Especially have I emphasized the necessity of carrying through the experimental work at the station at Salinas, Calif. We have already invested over $30,000,000 in this guayule program, and it is only good business that we protect our investment, not only by carrying through the experimental program to its logical conclusion, but by harvesting the rubber which is now under cultivation. Yet the entire appropriation for continuing the guayule program was stricken from the last agricultural appropriation bill.

A few weeks ago, during the Easter recess, a special subcommittee of the House Agricultural Committee visited California and carefully inspected the Salinas station, as well as other phases of the program. While the recommendations of this committee have not yet been published, it is my understanding that all members are heartily in favor of continuing the present program. The importance of reinserting in the agricultural appropriation bill the $7,000,000 to carry through the work has been urged. It is my sincere hope that the Senate will restore this amount to the bill and that when the conference report comes back to this House we too will concur in its restoration.

This is a matter which goes far deeper than one district or one State; it is of vital importance to our entire Nation. The Office of the Rubber Director has urged the importance of carrying through the guayule experiment. Common sense dictates that after spending millions of dollars we get every scrap of information possible out of our experimental work. The possibility of having a source of domestic rubber reserve in case of future emergencies has frequently been cited. The importance of experimenting with private growing of the shrub has been pointed out many times.

I urge every Member of this House to thoughtfully consider the issues involved in this case; I am sure that after such consideration a majority will decide that it is both wise and far-sighted to replace the money in the bill which will enable the American Government to carry its guayule program through to its logical conclusion.

The Late Honorable Frank Knox

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FOSTER STEARNS
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. STEARNS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, in Frank Knox the country has lost a great American. A vivid personality, he was a fighter for every cause which won his allegiance, who served in the field in two wars, and died at his post of duty in the present conflict. While intolerant of evil and pettiness, wherever found, he was a warm-hearted and devoted friend, and a fair and honorable employer who won the respect and affection of those who worked with him.

He had always been known as a man of fine character and great energy, successful as a newspaperman and in many fields of public relations; but it was the present crisis which gave him his great opportunity and showed forth to the world the full stature of the man as he will live in history.

For those of us who were honored with his friendship his passing has left a void which will not be quickly filled. What his loss means and will mean to the Nation has been splendidly expressed by Maj. George Fielding Eliot in an article in the New York Herald Tribune for April 30, which I am including in my remarks under leave granted me:

KNOX'S DEATH CALLED LOSS TO UNITED STATES IN WINNING PEACE AS WELL AS WAR—NAVY SECRETARY, RELENTLESS FIGHTER, REALIZED VAST ROLE THE MIGHTY FLEET HE HELPED TO BUILD CAN PLAY IN ASSURING A SECURE WORLD

(By Maj. George Fielding Eliot)

The Nation has suffered a loss which will not be easily replaced in the death of the Secretary of the Navy, Frank Knox. To all who were privileged to know him during these days of trial, his forthright courage, his unswerving singleness of purpose, and his astonishing energy were an inspiration.

He won the respect and the affection of all ranks of the naval service as few secretaries have ever done. He went to the fighting fronts; he never was so happy as when he could actually come within reach of enemy fire, in order to be for a little time with the lads who were doing the fighting; he was tireless in his devotion to duty and to the Navy, of which he always regarded himself as the servant rather than the master. He never spared himself. He died at his post; he gave his life for his country as truly as any bluejacket who has fallen in battle.

But if the Navy and the Nation will miss his wartime leadership we shall miss him still more in the time to come when the fruits of victory must be safely garnered and the world made secure against the recurrence of the holocaust of total war. Frank Knox grasped—as few men in civil life have grasped—the essential fact that this Nation is, in the military sense, an insular power. He understood the fundamental importance of sea power to the security of the United States. He understood the relationship of command of the sea to our national military policy. In the Cabinet or out of it, his voice would have been raised to speak with authority on this point, which is so often lost sight of amid the complexities of modern warfare.

LED GREATEST NAVY EVER

Under his direction the United States has built the greatest navy the world has ever seen. Under his direction that Navy has grown until America stands, for the first time in her history, as the premier naval power of the world. This sea power has given America the ability to launch her armed might across two oceans, against two enemies simultaneously: The Germans to the east, the Japanese to the west. It has been the foundation of the greatest military effort in all our history. It will become the foundation of our greatest victories; which, alas, Frank Knox has not been permitted to live to see.

But above and beyond the golden horizon of those victories stands the goal of a greater achievement of which that American sea power may likewise become a cornerstone; the establishment of a just, charitable, and enduring peace, a peace of free men and women, of free nations, a peace preserved by the safeguarded use of force in the hands of a law-abiding majority of peoples. It was in these terms that Frank Knox thought. It was of this final achievement that he spoke with earnest and fiery devotion whenever his mind had a moment of leisure to turn from the besetting cares of his daily duties. He would have been one of the major architects of that peace; and his sure hand and clear mind will be sadly missed when the time comes to begin its fabrication.

LEGACY OF STRENGTH AND HOPE

Yet he leaves behind him the Navy he has done so much to create and to inspire. He leaves behind him the work he has done and the legacy of his great thoughts and his unselfish purposes. His country, our country, will emerge from this war not only victorious, but powerful; able to speak in the councils of the nations with the sure voice of proved strength; the mistress of the seas which wash her shores, the seas by which her power can go forth to the uttermost limits of the world. In that fact there is hope. In the realization of that fact there is the beginning of hope fulfilled.

It is not enough to be strong. We must know how to use our strength in our own interest and in the interest of the world community of which we are a part. We Americans have created the sort of fighting power particularly adapted to our needs, and based on that sea power which must always be the foundation of our military system. We have done these things under the stress of a war, which we did not seek; we can use them, and the lessons of their creation, not only to win that war, but to build a better future in which there shall be no wars.

That would be the work to which Frank Knox would have turned his hand from the moment victory was assured. He has not lived to assume that new and greater burden, but he has left behind him the inspiration of his courage, his selfless sacrifice, and his vision for the future.

The Plight of America's White-Collar Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a very able article appearing in the May issue of the American magazine. The article was written by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], chairman of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor. It deals with the tragic plight of the great army of white-collar workers of the country trapped between rising prices and lowered incomes, and affected by other economic consequences of the war. The story is a startling one, demanding the attention of the American people. In the face of the fabulous profits made by some, and the wild extravagance displayed in many places in the country, it is well that we consider this story told by the distinguished senior Senator from Utah.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWENTY MILLION FORGOTTEN AMERICANS

(By ELBERT D. THOMAS, United States Senator from Utah, chairman of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor)

(The startling truth about the plight of America's white-collar workers, trapped between rising prices and lowered incomes, is revealed here by the head of the Senate's investigating committee. These neglected millions, he says, are taking more than their share of punishment. Many are losing their homes, insurance, and life savings in the struggle to keep going. Their very existence is threatened. Can they be rescued?)

We must put an end to the general impression, fostered by some statesmen, that almost everybody outside of the armed forces is getting along fine in this war. True, there is much evidence to sustain that idea. Theaters, restaurants, hotels, expensive resorts, and Pullman cars are full to overflowing; department stores, jewelers, and furriers are doing a rushing business; the black-market crooks find an endless supply of contemptible customers eager to pay preposterous prices for beefsteaks, whisky, nylon hose, and gasoline.

There are, indeed, millions whose standard of living has risen or, at least, has not dropped. But beneath this upper layer of war rich is a great mass of war poor—larger than any of us even suspected until the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor recently completed its investigation of the white-collar class. Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida, is chairman of this subcommittee, and the other members are Senators JAMES M. TUNNELL, of Delaware; ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin; KENNETH S. WHERRY, of Nebraska; and myself.

Skeptics may say, "Of course, there are a few who aren't getting along so well, but total income payments to individuals in 1943 were nearly $142,000,000,000. There is no such thing as unemployment; every newspaper carries columns of 'Help Wanted' ads offering good jobs to one and all. There just can't be many whose standard of living has gone down."

Not many? Well, I have before me incontrovertible testimony which shows that 20,000,000 Americans and their dependents are living as best they can on incomes that have not risen appreciably since Pearl Harbor. While their incomes were frozen, their taxes have increased, they have bought War bonds they have contributed to war charities and their cost of food, clothing, and shelter has gone up. The United States Bureau of Labor Statistics says the rise in the cost of living is 23.4 percent. Philip Murray, president of the C. I. O., says it's 50 percent. Our committee isn't sure as to the exact figure, but we do know that millions upon millions of good American citizens have had their incomes cut, in effect, from 25 to 50 percent.

Few thoughtful and patriotic Americans expect to go through the war without sacrifice. Those at home realize that no matter how much their standard of living is cut, no matter how shabby and hungry they may be, their sacrifice is nothing compared to that of their sons, husbands, brothers, and sweethearts on the fighting fronts. But as the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps share the hardships of war as equitably as possible, so should we at home divide the hardships of the home front.

We're not doing that. Our white-collar workers are taking more than their share of punishment. Those in this class who are in the better-income brackets have tightened their belts, set their teeth, and probably will manage to get the necessities of life throughout the war. But in most areas now a white-collar family cannot exist upon much less than $50 a week, an independent business girl needs $30 a week, and millions of these low-salaried workers and their dependents will suffer dire poverty if the cost of living continues to rise.

Millions of white-collar workers are trapped like a man in quicksand. The more they struggle, the deeper they sink. Desperately they cut their expenditures for food, clothing, and housing; they give up movies, books, magazines, vacation trips—everything but the bare necessities—but still, with their actual income going down, they can't make ends meet. Piling up are fixed expenses incurred before the war—installment purchases, insurance payments, payments on a home, to dependents, on a car needed in business. No longer can they save. They must sell their War bonds, spend the funds accumulating for education of the children, give up their life insurance and their home.

When we increase by millions the number of persons who are debt-ridden we are endangering the economy of the Nation. But that isn't the only danger. Upon this class depends the further growth of American education and culture.

When you drive these workers into a bare-existence living you retard the development of music, of literature, of the arts; you stop the progress of education; you block the development of better homes and of the decent living of which the United States has been so proud.

In the category of white-collar workers we arbitrarily place many who are not exactly that, such as the aged and infirm who have pensions and annuities that gave them a decent living until prices went up. One man wrote me, "After running an engine 45 years I was put on a pension of $100 a month and I could get along. Now it takes $125 for my wife and me to get by on. Last week I bought a bushel of oats for my chickens for $1.10. For those same oats last year the farmer got 40 to 45 cents. That is not fair to me or to the farmer."

We also include those men in the armed services whose dependents are affected by the rise in living costs. Most of the families of servicemen reduce their standard of living the moment the wage earner goes into the service.

The wife of a serviceman wrote me: "My best girl friend and I both married about the same time, and each had a baby. My husband was getting $52.50 a week when he was drafted. I get $80 a month allowance, and everything costs so much more every day that I am selling our War bonds, and even cannot take the baby to the doctor as often as I should. My girl friend and her husband work in a war plant, and I would do that, but I have nobody to take care of the baby, and she has. I have no relatives who can help me. The two of them make more than $150 a week. My husband writes to me to be a good soldier and everything will be all right after the war, and I try to be and not worry about what will happen to us if he is killed, but it seems to me something is awful wrong about everything."

About 15,000,000 of the white-collar class are salaried workers, and you can't fight a war without them. You can't have schools, churches, hospitals, or Federal, State, or municipal government; you can't operate stores, offices, hotels, or restaurants; or publish magazines, newspapers, or books; you can't get your mail delivered or your checks cashed at the bank, or make a long-distance call on the telephone.

Harass them, undernourish them, force them, through underpayment, out of their jobs, and you cripple the Nation. They are vitally necessary to the thousands upon thousands of vitally necessary men and women. How many lives could doctors save if they had no nurses? How could a judge hold court without clerks and stenographers? What good is a college with a scholarly president if there are no teachers? How much could be accomplished by executives of great banks, insurance companies, and industries if even one-fourth of their white-collar assistants decided to don overalls and go to work in war plants?

Many white-collar workers have done just that. In addition, hundreds of thousands, of course, have left to join the fighting forces. Fortunately for our economy, enough have stayed on their jobs to keep the wheels going, even though their raises in pay usually have been inadequate, or nonexistent. We worry about the lack of manpower that may reduce production in war plants. It's time we started to worry about manpower that is just as essential—white-collar manpower. Weaken the present staffs and you'll create behind-the-lines bottlenecks that will affect war operations far overseas.

The typical white-collar worker, man or woman—7,500,000 of them are women—is a mighty good American. He usually is well educated, versed in current affairs, and must dress well and make regular trips to the barber or hairdresser. He budgets his expenses and wastes no money. I have no figures to prove it, but I believe he has made more real sacrifices to buy War bonds and to contribute to war charities than have workers whose earnings have risen because of the war. Usually, white-collar workers do most of the volunteer work in War bond, Red Cross, March of Dimes, and Community Chest drives. They're on the job in civilian defense and they're, mostly, the ones who worked long hours at the schoolhouse getting out the ration books.

Who is interested in these people? Nobody. They're the forgotten men and women.

Ordinarily they belong to no union. No experienced negotiators plead their cases. Their collective bargaining usually is a brief session in which the employee stands before his employer's desk and, shaking in his shoes, asks for a raise which he doesn't get. He enjoys his work, likes his associates, has been on the job for years, is in a groove, and he stays on the job.

Back at his desk, he's resentful, perhaps, or maybe he agrees with his employer that this is war and everybody must make sacrifices to help the boys on the firing line. He doesn't quite understand why he must suffer more than do his friends in war work, but loyally he plunges back into the old routine, working harder at longer hours to make up for the vacancies in the staff left by those who have gone to war, proud that he's doing his job well, hoping that some day, some way, things will get better.

One group of these workers is made up of the 900,000 school teachers. They exist upon an average salary of less than $1,550 a year. More than 250,000 teachers have gone into the armed services or have taken more profitable jobs, and, according to Dr. Donald DuShane, of the National Education Association, "At least 30 percent of our children are being cared for by improperly and inadequately trained teachers who are working only temporarily." That means that 7,000,000 children—perhaps yours are among them—are not getting the kind of education they need.

More than 4,500,000 white-collar workers, in addition to teachers, are on public pay rolls, from the tiniest towns up to the Nation's Capital. In some cases these employees have been given relief—an over-all average increase of 14 percent between January 1941 and July 1943. But that increase brought the average earnings up to only $118 per month.

A clerk in a Los Angeles court writes, "I would be willing to make sacrifices if others would do the same. My cost of living has increased 40 percent and my income tax 400 percent. My income has not increased one red cent. Yet a neighbor's daughter, 19, on her first job, receives $225 a month—much more than I get."

A civil engineer writes: "I am 42 years old, and have worked for this city for 12 years. Checking back over my records, I find that 2 years after I left college I was making just as much, in buying power, as I am now. Then I wasn't married. Now I have to support a wife and three children."

Too many college-trained men and women are reaching the point where they must cash in their life's savings and borrow to get the bare necessities of life. These include librarians, lawyers, social workers, architects, college professors, and scientists of many kinds. The income of some classes of scientists has risen, but the American Association of Scientific Workers reports that "large numbers of scientists earn between $35 and $50 a week."

There are 136,000 clergymen, most of whom never had much more than a bare living, whose parishioners have given them little, if any, increase in salary. Nearly a million employees of hospitals, including nurses, are working loyally and tirelessly, attempting the impossible task of caring for more patients with smaller staffs. Hospital workers are notoriously underpaid, but ask a $25-a-week nurse why she doesn't give up the drudgery and take a more profitable job in a war plant, and she probably will tell you firmly, "I love my work. I'm happy to be helping the unfortunate." That's the kind of American who is being pushed around.

The largest group that is paying more than its share of the cost of the war is made up of workers in offices and wholesale and retail stores, and itinerant salesmen. The National Industrial Conference Board in 1943 made a survey of 35,600 employees in 351 companies in 21 cities, and found that the average file clerk got $22 a week; the average stenographer, $30; switchboard operator, $25; key punch operator, $25; and junior typist, $23. These generally were in the larger companies that pay fairly well. Conditions vary in different areas, and hundreds of thousands in those classes, particularly in small businesses, are paid much less.

Although it is agreed that the average woman cannot live in most cities on less than $30 a week, the average wage for clerks in department stores in New York is $23 a week. A recent survey by the Y. W. C. A. showed that the average salary of women office workers in the Midwest is $27.89 a week.

Remember that an average figure is reached by combining the salaries of workers who are being paid a living wage with the salaries of multitudes who are not. Statesmen may attempt to quiet protests by arguing that the average isn't too bad, but such oratory won't buy food and clothing for the office worker who gets $16.60 a week.

One office worker wrote me: "We who work in offices and stores and banks are in a pocket. Even in the boom of 1928 we didn't get raises in proportion to those given the bosses. For most of us there is little opportunity of advancement, for we can't all rise to the heads of departments and there always must be $25-a-week clerks. I've given up hope ever of increasing my standard of living, but surely, in order for my company to do its part in the war, it isn't necessary that my standard be cut in half."

Too many persons don't consider the difference between salary and take-home pay. One office worker observes, "When I get my pay, 20 percent has been taken out for withholding tax, 10 percent for War bonds, 1 percent for social security, and 5 percent for the company retirement fund, totaling 36 percent. Then when my wife and I pay for food and clothing we find they've gone up 30 percent. And now they want us to double our purchases of War bonds. I haven't had a raise, yet workers out in the plant have had two or three raises and, with all the deductions, make more than ever in their lives before."

How can Congress help the white-collar worker? First, we must keep the cost of living from rising any more. If possible, we must reduce it.

But we must do more than that. We must increase the "take-home pay" of those white-collar workers who are suffering real privation. They should be given some relief from taxes, which can be done by increasing the exemption figure. It has been suggested that, also, there should be an additional exemption for those workers whose income has not increased perceptibly since Pearl Harbor. Certainly a good tax program should be based primarily upon ability to pay.

Probably most important of all, Congress should ease the War Labor Board restrictions on frozen salaries in the lower brackets. The wage-stabilization program is necessary and its over-all effect has been good, but whoever thought we wanted to freeze the wages of clerks getting $25 a week?

While the stabilization program, justly, has been blamed for much of the suffering of white-collar workers, some of the criticism has been unfair. There are two classes of employers: one that is willing to give raises, but is often blocked by War Labor Board rulings; and the other, that wants to buy labor as cheaply as possible, and falsely tells employees, "The War Labor Board has frozen all salaries. We'd like to give you raises, but the Government won't let us." So employees of the latter go around cussing the W. L. B. and the Government.

The War Labor Board has been partly to blame for this. W. L. B. rules and forms are so complicated that the average person can't understand them, and when an employer says, "That's the W. L. B. ruling," employees don't know what the rules really are and are unable properly to plead their cause.

When William H. Davis, Chairman of the Board, appeared before our committee he admitted that the forms are complicated and promised to try to simplify them. We suggested that the W. L. B. prepare and circulate to all white-collar workers a statement in simple English that would tell them exactly how they can get a raise.

One thing that should be made clear is that most employers of eight or fewer employees are exempt from W. L. B. rulings, and also that the Board has no control over State, county, and municipal employees, nor over those of nonprofit hospitals and charitable organizations. When teachers and nurses don't get raises it's the fault of local officials. It should be made clear also that, in most cases, the W. L. B. does not oppose raises that bring wages up to 50 cents an hour. And that the Treasury Department, not the W. L. B., controls salaries of more than $5,000 a year.

Unfortunately, in most cases, increases in salary are limited by law to 15 percent above the base salary of January 1941. But individual increases, under certain limitations, may be given for length of service, merit, reclassification, promotion, etc. Some employers don't understand how to give raises properly; some don't want to know.

"My company had a job classification that had been approved by the W. L. B.," one clerk writes me, "and they said they couldn't give me a raise. When I told them I would quit, and convinced them I meant it, they quickly wangled a way to give it to me."

Another: "I am an office manager for a Tennessee concern. I am 37 years old and earn $180 a month. I have received one $5 raise since 1936. But for W. L. B. rules, I would be getting at least $225 a month, which is what new men doing less important work here are getting."

The cure for this is to raise the 15-percent ceiling in the lower-salary brackets and to loosen slightly the restrictions, so that fairer adjustments may legally be made.

"That will bring more inflation!" some statesmen cry in horror-stricken tones. "You'll raise prices so a loaf of bread will cost $100!"

That is nonsense. Inflation doesn't come from the bottom. The $25-a-week clerk doesn't overspend. It is the uncontrolled waster who brings inflation. In Washington, in New York, in every city, you see men and women spending $100 in one evening in a night club, you see them buying mink coats, jewels, and liquor. They toss away millions of dollars to get what they want at any price in the black markets.

Thousands of businessmen, evidently with unlimited expense accounts, are coming to Washington in drawing rooms, living in expensive suits, spending enormous sums for food and drink. The money they spend and the money the Government pays them for contracts, much of which is spent lavishly all over the United States, may cause some inflation.

But you won't get inflation by giving a shabbily-dressed typist $2.50 more a week, or by increasing the wages of a bank clerk so he and his family can keep up the payments on their little home, or by giving a college-trained school teacher enough money to buy a new dress. That money is spent for bare necessities, not squandered on luxuries.

If we give a fairly decent living to the white-collar class we won't weaken our economic structure—we'll strengthen it, and in spots that are becoming dangerously unsound today. They're fine, upstanding patriots and are being kicked around, forced to make more than their share of sacrifices for the war effort, mostly because they are unorganized.

No longer must they be the forgotten millions. Not only for their good, but for the good of all of us, we must give them aid, for these people are as necessary as the men and women who are building airplanes. Crush the white-collar workers and you cripple America.

The Seizure of Montgomery Ward Mail-Order House

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. C. GATHINGS

OF ARKANSAS

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, several months ago the War Labor Board issued an order requiring Montgomery Ward & Co. to enter into a contract with the C. I. O. union which acted as bargaining agent for its members working at Ward's Chicago plant. The contract carried a maintenance-of-membership provision under which the union members had a stated time to resign from the union. If they did not resign within that time they were obligated to remain members in good standing by obeying all the rules, and to pay all dues and assessments. For failure to do so, Ward's was compelled to discharge them. Such a provision in the contract, in reality, amounts to a closed shop. Not all of Ward's employees, and as the company contended, a majority never did willingly belong to the union. This contract expired in December 1943.

The Ward Co. has been appealing to the National Labor Relations Board since last November to hold an election for the purpose of determining whether the employees wished to be represented by the C. I. O. The Board has refused to hold the election.

The C. I. O. demanded that the contract be renewed, but Ward's refused and stated that it would gladly continue in effect the hours and wages and other conditions of employment which were carried in the expired agreement, but would not enter into a new agreement with the C. I. O. without the National Labor Relations Act was complied with by the holding of an election to determine whether the employees wanted the C. I. O. or some other bargaining agent. The company emphasized that if the employees voted for the C. I. O. to represent them it would bargain with the C. I. O. But C. I. O., probably fearful of the result of the election and relying upon the W. L. B. to force the contract upon the company, went on strike and threw up picket lines around the Chicago offices of the mail-order house. The Chicago police prohibited violence on the part of the picketers who were trying to prevent workers from entering the plant to continue at their jobs. The strike failed. Ward's continued to operate their business.

C. I. O. appealed to W. L. B., who ordered Ward's to sign a new contract without an election as provided by law. Ward's refused and the W. L. B. appealed to the President, who issued the order that the Government take possession. In walks the Army and bodily throws Sewell Avery, chairman of the board of Montgomery Ward & Co., out of his office and into the street. These are the facts in connection with the case. I have been asked what I thought of such tactics of the Government sending in the Army to take over private business that is engaged in civilian pursuits. Here is my reply:

Could anyone think of anything more ridiculous as to have to write:

"Dear General Marshall, would you please deviate from your accustomed war duties to fill my order? I wish you would please send me 4 yards of flowered gingham and a No. 50 spool of white thread. Rush please."

I never dreamed that I would live to see the day that an Executive order would be issued in America for the Government to take possession of a private firm, a civilian mail-order business, because the company had not signed a C. I. O. contract carrying a maintenance-of-union membership clause. It is an arbitrary and flagrant exercise of powers unauthorized and far removed from the prosecution of the war.

Regardless of the outcome of the court action, which is expected soon, the whole incident is extremely unfortunate coming on the eve of the all-out invasion of Europe. Such dictatorial action of the Government for the purpose of appeasing a labor union in forcing membership in the C. I. O. is in total contravention to the principles for which our brave warriors fight and die on the field of battle.

Mr. Speaker, I urge immediate action by this House to the end that the rights to work when, where, and for whom a person pleases shall not be challenged by this or any other administration in America.

Polish Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. O'BRIEN of New York. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, today the Polish people are celebrating the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the adoption of their liberal constitution. May 3 is a glorious day in Polish history, and the people of this great country are justified in commemorating this notable event—an event hailed by every freedom-loving nation in the world.

For 6 long years the people of Poland have gallantly suffered martyrdom under the domination of the Nazis. The sacrifices made by the Polish people—their sufferings and ignominies—will go down in history and prove in a most conclusive manner that they are a determined, rugged, freedom-loving nation.

The Constitution of the Polish Government is a symbol of the ideals of democracy and liberty. It clearly defines the direction and development which the Polish people have worked to attain. The creators of the constitution had for their objectives many noble aspirations. They continually worked to further prove to the people of the world that they were deserving of such men as John Sobieski, Kosciusko, and the other Polish leaders who made such great contributions to Poland and the entire world.

People of Poland, today we honor you and we know that through your patriotic determination and with the assistance of divine providence you will again enjoy the freedom and privileges that belong to a great nation.

We in this country hold the inhabitants of the great country of Poland in high esteem. The Polish people of the United States consist of some of our outstanding citizens and their firm belief in our free institutions, precepts and policies of a republican form of government have helped make America the great country that it is. On this day our heartfelt sympathy goes out to you and it is our ardent wish that on one day in the very near future you will again enjoy the privileges which you so richly deserve.

I salute you Polish patriots and you American citizens of Polish extraction.

Poland Still Lives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RANULF COMPTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following message to the Polish people.

Throughout the world today the Polish people are commemorating the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the Constitution of Poland, the first bill of rights in Europe and one of the world's great documents of freedom. The freedom of spirit that was born within all Poles on that day has marked the tragic history of Poland down through the centuries.

As a nation, Poland today has very little cause for celebration. Her land has been overrun. Her people are being ruthlessly persecuted. Her future is dark and uncertain. But Poland still lives.

Just 1 year ago, on this similar occasion in 1943, I urged before the House that no one permit the observance of Polish Constitution Day to take on too much the aspects of a funeral because Poland would rise again. I said than and I have repeated it today—Poland still lives. She lives in the hearts of freedom-loving Poles all over the world; Poles living and fighting underground in Poland; Poles living and fighting over the skies of Europe; and Poles ready and willing and anxious to fight through the defenses of western Europe and into the land of the oppressor.

Yes; Poland still lives and she will rise again to take her rightful place among free and democratic nations. But she will need the help of the United States and the American people.

The spirit, the tragedy, and the heroism of the Polish people will be recited here in Congress today by many of the friends of Poland. The story behind the story of the 3d of May 1791, can better be told by those who pridefully recall their Polish heritage. For my part, I think this occasion can be used to best advantage by reminding the Members of this body that if the United Nations owe a first duty anywhere in the world they owe that first duty to Poland. When we win this war—as we surely will—we will have lost more than we will have gained if we do not make certain that Poland arises again as the same great nation she was on September 1, 1939. It is fairly certain that we can protect Poland from further harm at the hands of her enemies and our enemies, but it is less certain that we can and will protect her from our friends.

Many problems will face this Government and the leaders of the United Nations between this moment and the moment when an armistice ends hostilities in Europe. No problem is deserving of more sympathetic and just consideration than the problem of Poland as a nation. Many promises have been made to the Poles. Already there have been indications that settlement of disputes affecting Poland may be held secondary to the settlement of other matters. Perhaps we Members of Congress will take little part in the final settlement of any of the problems, but I think one of our primary duties, from this moment on, is to let it be known that we consider the solution of the Polish problem a paramount issue on which the Government of the United States should take a position on the side of Poland.

Since December 8, 1941, when this country accepted the challenge of the Axis nations, our Government has assumed many obligations. We have set up clearly before the world a pattern of ideals to which we should adhere if we are to preserve the respect of all other nations. Within that pattern is the Atlantic Charter and the Joint Four-Nation Declaration of the Moscow Conference both of which give assurance of friendly cooperation toward the settlement of international dispute. The United States is a friend of Poland and we have pledged ourselves to oppose any territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned. In any dispute which may occur between Poland and other nations as a result of territorial changes resulting from the Nazi invasion, let the United States be certain that it alines its strength and good will on the side of justice. If such is our course, Poland, indeed, will rise again.

Polish Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STEPHEN A. DAY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. DAY. Mr. Speaker, the 3d of May is Poland's national holiday. It commemorates the signature on May 3, 1791, of the Polish Constitution, one of the world's greatest documents of freedom, like the Magna Carta and the American Declaration of Independence.

In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the Republic of Poland was the freest state in Europe, the state in which the greatest degree of constitutional civic and intellectual liberty prevailed. In fact, it was so free that Poland's neighbors, absolute monarchies, were unwilling to have such a free state on their frontiers.

The tragic partitions of Poland commenced in 1772 at the hands of Russia, Prussia, and Austria. On May 3, 1791, the Polish Parliament passed a constitution, which was the first written democratic constitution in Europe, establishing the rights of the middle classes and of the peasants. It was a challenge to the divine right to rule and the cruel partitions of 1793 and 1795 resulted. Kosciuszko on his return from America in 1794 led the first Polish insurrection which preceded the third partition. Thereafter, for 123 years Poland disappeared from the map of Europe and it was not until 1918 when she again resumed the place that was hers among the nations of the earth. The absolute rulers of Poland's despoilers, the Czarina of Russia, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor of Austria, although they envied Poland's culture and progress, feared that Poland's love of liberty and democracy might infect their own subjects. Poland was free, independent, and democratic. Poland was doomed.

It must be noted that the Polish Constitution of 1791 recognized the cardinal principle that all power in civil society is derived from the will of the people and religious toleration was thus proclaimed:

> For as the same sacred faith enjoins us to love our neighbors, therefore we should guarantee to all people peace in the faith and government protection, and therefore freedom to all rights and religions in the Polish lands, according to the country's laws.

This constitution proclaims three separate and equal authorities—legislative, executive, and judicial. It was therein stated that:

> The judicial power cannot be wielded either by the legislative authority, or by the King, but only through the courts of law established and chosen for this purpose.

It is highly significant that the Poles thus defined the role of the Army:

> The Army is nothing but the defensive and ordered strength drawn from the general strength of the nation.

Today we must pay respect to this courageous declaration by the Polish people. We must also resolve that there must be a future Poland dedicated to equal freedom if we are to remain true to our own professions of faith. The sad predicament of Poland today would be discouraging if we could not take renewed hope from the fact that the fire of liberty still burns in the hearts of the Poles of 1944. We dare not countenance any ravishment of Poland which will destroy the national existence of the Christian Poland. Millions of Americans are deeply discouraged by reports reaching them to the effect that Poland will be a victim of aggression. It is well for us to recall that on September 14, 1939, German panzer units had been stopped, thanks to the resistance of the Polish Army and an organized opposition was formed, and then on September 17, 1939, without any declaration of war, Soviet Russia, despite her nonagression treaty with Poland, attacked the rear of the Polish armies fighting Germany. On September 28, 1939, Germany and Russia signed an agreement dividing Poland between themselves "for all time," along the Ribbentrop-Molotov line. Once more, Poland had been despoiled by her autocratic neighbors.

I am informed by my many friends of Polish extraction in the United States that the people of Poland believe that the post-war organization of the world should be based on Christian morality, international democracy, and political and economic collaboration. They insist that Poland, the first real democracy in Europe, is deeply attached to her parliamentary system based on broad democratic representation of the people and that Poland will be a land of the middle class, of workers and farmers. The Polish love for constitutional liberty is deep and abiding and on this day which commemorates the great Polish Constitution of 1791 we should dedicate ourselves to the high resolves that such a government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

Polish Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY P. JEFFREY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. JEFFREY. Mr. Speaker, today when the young men and women of America are displaying incomparable courage and unquestioned patriotism on fighting fronts all over the world it seems most fitting that the attention of the Congress of the United States should be directed toward the courage and patriotism of one of our allies. Were anyone to write a history of human courage a most amazing chapter would be devoted to the people of Poland and their struggles toward liberty. Today marks the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the adoption of the Polish Constitution of 1791, the first constitution in continental Europe to recognize the political rights of the townsmen and the common people.

In reading the glorious story of this struggle toward freedom I am impressed by the parallels it reveals with our own American history. Although the Polish Constitution—adopted May 3, 1791—came several years later than ours, which was framed in 1787, the conditions surrounding them revealed marked similarities. Poland had encountered some most instructive demonstrations of the dangers of a weak and disunited government, just as the 13 American States had been disappointed with the Articles of Confederation. Forceful action was required to bring about the necessary changes. But when this was taken the same spirit which motivated the framers of our Constitution at Philadelphia motivated the framers of the Constitution of Poland. This is shown by the manner in which these two documents were headed. The Polish Constitution, significantly enough, began with the words: "All power in the state emanates from the people's will," while that in America began with the familiar phrase, "We, the people of the United States." Even the difficulties of translation and the differences of phraseology cannot obscure the similarity of thought and purpose in both documents.

What happened to this noble political instrument in 1791 must be rated among the political tragedies of the world. Unlike the liberty-loving Americans who were protected from alien aggressors by a broad ocean or trackless forests, the people of Poland found themselves menaced by aggressors on all sides. The result of this liberal document—a document which seemed revolutionary to the selfish and privilege-loving powers nearby—was another partition of Poland which aggravated the plight of an already long-suffering people.

Instead of entering upon a period of growth and development, like the liberty-loving colonials in America, Poland was again subjected to the terror, the cruelty, and the indignity of foreign domination. This is something that we as Americans find it difficult to understand; it is so foreign to our own happy experience that it is hard to appreciate what it really means. But to me this indignity is represented by the pathetic and dramatic account of the secret classes in history conducted in Warsaw in 1872 and so magnificently described in the immortal biography of Marie Curie. The picture of the class of little girls swiftly abandoning their textbooks on Polish history—the teaching of which was forbidden by a foreign government—and becoming a sewing class, studying in the regimented and prescribed fashion decreed by their overlords, is one not easily forgotten. It helps an American understand the uncompromising devotion and the reckless courage of men and women whose patriotism was acquired under such conditions.

Even lacking this priceless ingredient of liberty—save for a brief period following World War No. 1—Poland has given the world much. Mankind has Poland to thank for the music of Chopin and Paderewski; for the majestic narratives of Joseph Conrad, one of the few masters of literature whose greatest work was done in a foreign language; the brilliant bravery of Marshal Pilsudski and his celebrated Kadrowka, which eventually became the Polish Legion; and for the priceless contribution to science and humanity made by Madam Curie. When we think of what the Polish people have accomplished under conditions of indignity and torture what marvels may we expect of them when they are free.

Mr. Speaker, I make no attempt to draw the national boundary lines of the Europe of tomorrow; I would not be so rash as to say what land should be allotted to what people. Yet the feeling is inescapable in me that a nation of such brilliance, such courage, is facing the dawn—not the dusk—of its development. Earnestly we hope, fervently we pray, that Poland which is now the home of the brave may tomorrow become the land of the free.

School-Lunch Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED C. GILCHRIST

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

LAURENS, IOWA, April 30, 1944.

Hon. FRED C. GILCHRIST,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our Ware School superintendent received word from Des Moines last week we should write our Congressmen at once regarding our hot-lunch program for schools.

I have been chairman of the Ware Parent-Teachers Association for the past 4 years, and we have sponsored a very successful hot-lunch program for the past 3 years. We have the entire community's approval and backing, and the Ware school board has always cooperated 100 percent. When we started we had an empty room and $13 in our treasury, but the school board bought us an eight-foot General Electric refrigerator and a fine gas range and helped us pay our gas bills. By securing 3 cooks through the W. P. A. we fed the 120 students, which is Ware's enrollment. This last year we have paid our 3 cooks with money received from the lunches. Now, our kitchen is one of the best in this part of the State, and our record of students eating in our lunchroom is 100 percent.

As you know, Ware is a farm community, and the students are farm children ranging in age from 5 to 17. They climb into cold buses early in the morning, with many times only a hasty breakfast. I send five children. The older ones have had to do chores before they hurry to their bus, and the little ones are hardly awake. Don't that child deserve a hot meal 4 or more hours later? If he doesn't get a hot lunch he munches cold sandwiches and has 4 or more hours before he gets home. Not only this, but since the shortage of hired help a lot of these students do practically a day's work after they get home from school. The hot-lunch program is not the place to start cutting down expenses in our State or Nation, Mr. GILCHRIST. These farm boys need good food as much as soldiers, for they are future soldiers, and all growing youngsters eat and need hot food—not a cold sandwich of minced ham and bread or, as some records show—of left-over pancakes from breakfast, or peanut butter and bread. School teachers can tell you what some misguided mothers send as school lunches. The penny-milk program and the hot-lunch program are a godsend to the entire Nation, and it's regrettable if they take it away. By watching our money carefully in the treasury and by donations of money and commodities we balanced fairly well. But it's impossible to continue without Federal or State aid, because in our case 15 percent are considered by the county welfare office to be undernourished and unable to pay and are fed on a free list. This is a lower percent than in most communities because it is solely agricultural. Will you let me know immediately if a signed petition from the entire Ware community would help you. If necessary, we can send you one at once. Believe me, we are all anxious about this hot-lunch program. It seems that out of all the millions being appropriated for our bureaus to regulate our lives that they could find a few dollars to see that some of these children get enough to eat.

Sincerely yours,

MRS. ROBERT R. CEJKA,
President of Ware
Parent-Teachers Association.

The Montgomery Ward Seizure

OF
HON. WILLIAM S. HILL OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the action of Attorney General Biddle in using the Army to seize the Montgomery Ward mail-order plant in Chicago has generated a storm of protest over the entire country. I enclose the following editorial from the Denver Post of Sunday morning, April 23, 1944, which expresses the general feeling throughout the Nation:

United States soldiers, carrying out orders of President Roosevelt, forcibly seized the Montgomery Ward mail-order plant in Chicago, Wednesday. According to press dispatches, men in the squad dispatched to the office of President Sewell Avery of the company carried their rifles at the ready and soldier guards posted outside the building stood facing the crowds with fixed bayonets.

Army seizure of private property is commonplace in Nazi Germany. No American is surprised at such a high-handed procedure in Communist Russia, or in Fascist Italy. But who would have thought that such a thing could happen in the United States which is supposed to be a free country and in which the Government is supposed to be a government of laws—not a totalitarian dictatorship?

Whom does President Roosevelt think this country is fighting—the Japs and the Germans, or American business? The American people have been under the impression that the Army to which they have been giving their young men was mobilized to fight the Jap and German enemies of the United States. Certainly it never occurred to them that American soldiers were to be used to Hitlerize American business.

Under article V of the American Bill of Rights, which is a part of the Constitution of the United States, "no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." If the Army seizure of Montgomery Ward & Co., doesn't violate these constitutional guarantees, then how can they be violated?

President Roosevelt's order of seizure was not issued to enforce any court order. The Montgomery Ward Co. had not refused to perform any war service. It had only refused to obey what it considered an illegal and unconstitutional order of the War Labor Board, directing it to extend a contract with a C. I O. union. We have courts to decide, in an orderly and lawful manner, whether such an order is binding and must be obeyed. But the Government did not resort to its own courts. It said, in effect, to Montgomery Ward:

"Constitutional or not, you obey this order," and sent in armed forces to take over the company.

Wards insists it is a nonwar business. The administration disputes this on the grounds that the company supplies a lot of farmers and war workers with essential equipment, clothing, and other supplies, and therefore must be kept in operation. But Wards has not threatened to close down. The only threat to its uninterrupted operation has come from its union employees. They went out on a strike. But President Roosevelt made no attempt to take over the union nor to send in troops to protect employees who wanted to remain at work. No labor union is compelled to obey any War Labor Board order, but let any employer balk at submitting to the Board's dictation and soldier bayonets are ready to force him to submit or to take his business away from him.

If President Roosevelt gets away with this seizure of Montgomery Ward there is nothing to prevent him from taking over and having the Government run every other private business, large or small, in the Nation. If Wards can be classed as a war business because it sells to war workers, then every other business in the land can be placed in the same category, subject to Government seizure.

On November 5, 1942, the Labor Board ordered Wards to incorporate in a contract with the C. I. O. a clause establishing a form of closed shop called maintenance of union membership. The company finally did that, under protest, at the express order of President Roosevent as Commander in Chief in time of war.

"When Wards brought suit to have the Board's orders declared illegal," President Avery, of the company, said in his telegram to President Roosevelt a few days ago, "the Board asked the courts to dismiss the case. The Board's plea to the court was that its orders were not legally binding, but were only advice which Wards need not accept. The purpose of this plea was to deny Wards a trial before the courts."

If the order issued by the War Labor Board for inclusion of a maintenance of union membership clause in Wards' contract with the union was illegal, as Avery says the Board admitted, then the President, in forcing Wards to obey that order, forced it into an illegal contract. And the recent order of the Board for extension of that contract was an attempt to continue an illegal contract.

There is no excuse at all for the present trouble at Ward's Chicago mail-order house. Last November, the question of whether the C. I. O. union represents a majority of its employees was raised by the company. That question could easily have been determined by calling an election. But the Labor Board didn't do that. It stalled along and tried to favor the C. I. O. by attempting to force the company to extend the union contract until an election was held.

Avery charged in his telegram to President Roosevelt that on April 13, the Post Office Department, presumably acting on order from Washington, removed its 70 employees from the mail-order house in Chicago and that on April 17, the United States Post Office refused to deliver to Ward's incoming parcels from customers on which postage had been paid. And now the administration insists that Ward's is an essential war business.

If the charge is true that the Post Office Department refused to deliver mail on which postage had been fully paid, then the Postmaster General or whatever official was responsible for that should be impeached and kicked out of office. This matter is one which demands immediate congressional investigation and action. In fact, the whole controversy between Ward's and the Labor Board should be thoroughly probed by Congress.

The Signal From Wisconsin

OF
HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Farm Journal for the month of May:

THE SIGNAL FROM WISCONSIN

Wisconsin voters in both parties had something important to say to America in their primary election April 4. No press or radio analysis that we have seen has emphasized the message.

About 70 percent of the combined vote was against Mr. Willkie and Mr. Roosevelt. The three-term President, after long submerging his party under personal power, received about 60 percent of the Democratic primary vote. He was opposed only by a headless anti-Roosevelt party slate. Mr. Willkie, an apostle of personal leadership rather than party responsibility, received only 15 percent of the votes in the Republican primary. Since Wisconsin voters are permitted to cross party lines in primaries, it is fair to assume that Mr. Willkie, after a 13-day campaign appealing for Democratic as well as Republican support, may have saved some of the delegates for Roosevelt by attracting a margin of the Roosevelt opposition.

The significant fact is that 70 percent of all the Wisconsin people voting opposed both men.

This is notice, sharp and clear, that one-man government and party irresponsibility are not desired in America. It is a signal that fully responsible, two-party government, our safeguard of freedom, is again on the way forward.

The instinct of the people prefers moral and spiritual values to cynicism, character rather than charm, and demands the eternal verities of honesty and righteousness in public places. This instinct is stronger than party masters, partisan tacticians, or political organizations. It comes from the soul of the Nation when the national future is at stake.

Mr. Roosevelt has long been credited with a high degree of political astuteness. Perhaps the Democrats of America now have a real chance to regain their party.

Polish Independence Day

OF
HON. CHARLES S. DEWEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. DEWEY. Mr. Speaker, is supposedly free America in the same unhappy condition as Poland on her Independence Day, May 3, 1944?

In that unhappy country many a Polish shopkeeper sits with anxious heart behind closed doors listening to the tramp of the Gestapo, who on the order of some German official, may seize his property and eject him from it. The same astounding action has occurred in Chicago when soldiers seized the private property of Montgomery Ward & Co. and ejected its management on the order of a Government official.

There is a similarity of action between what happens in Poland and what happened in Chicago, but there is this difference in our blessed land—we still have a people's Congress who can act swiftly in protection of the people's rights.

As author of House Resolution 521 to appoint a special committee of investigation of this un-American procedure by the Attorney General of the United States, I shall spare no effort to search to the bottom of this whole matter and bring the facts to the people's Congress.

I believe that the people's Congress will act promptly.

Statement of General Patton

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including below a letter received from a lady in my district. If the incredibly ill-considered remarks of General Patton about it being "our destiny" along with certain selected members of the United Nations "to rule the world" have such an effect on a normal American, can any one estimate the disastrous effects on the billion actual or potential allies in Asia and on the oppressed peoples and guerillas of the small countries in Europe, or upon our Latin-American neighbors?

If the Commander in Chief is not going to reprimand the general publicly, as a minimum, then he owes it to this country and to the rest of the world to at least repudiate publicly the general's remarks.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., April 29, 1944.
Hon. WALTER H. JUDD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DR. JUDD: Is the attached clipping (the authentic version released by American military authorities) an exact transcript of what General Patton actually said, and if so why has he not been relieved of his command?

I think most of us are willing to concede that there was some excuse for the former "Patton incidents" on the grounds of human frailty and his value as a military strategist, but what possible excuse can be offered for this outburst? Was he under the influence of liquor—or just drunk with power? In my opinion this affair could be more disastrous than Pearl Harbor in prolonging the war and a greater detriment to friendly relations with our allies and the neutrals than all the Nazis' propaganda. If he is not removed from his position, won't his utterances be interpreted by the rest of the world as a reflection of the sentiments of the United States Government and its people?

The thought that my husband will possibly be serving under this blundering, bloodthirsty egotist makes my blood boil. How must this disgraceful speech delivered in their midst make our men in England feel on the eve of the invasion? Does it give them confidence in their leadership—and faith in the cause for which they are fighting?

Is it not natural that those of us who are totally in the dark as to what is going on behind the scenes would wonder if this speech, coming from one who perhaps is in a position to know more about what is going on than some of us will ever learn, does not represent the true picture? Has General Patton unwittingly exposed the war lords? Is this war just a farce after all? If this is the true picture, then we wives, mothers, and sweethearts entreat your aid in bringing home those of our boys who are not fighting for the glory of it—and we don't want General Patton, or his kind, on the welcoming committee when they do come home.

Sincerely yours,

GENINE KRENZ.

Twentieth Anniversary of the Anglo-American Treaty on Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following addresses delivered at the dinner commemorating the twentieth anniversary of the Anglo-American Treaty on Palestine, sponsored by the New Zionist Organization of America, Hotel Commodore, New York City, Sunday, April 23, 1944:

ADDRESS BY GOV. J. HOWARD M'GRATH

Friends of a Jewish homeland in Palestine, my distinguished colleagues on this program, I am happy to be here and enjoy the opportunity of contributing to the cause of a Jewish homeland in Palestine, a cause which you are so heartily interested in.

In times such as these, and at the price of enormous sacrifices, we are laying the foundations for a new and more decent world. In its accomplishment the statesmen of the great powers bear a heavy responsibility. Suffering humanity of all countries have but them to look to with prayerful hope. Their promises alone represent humanity's guaranty of a better future, and the form in which these promises are kept will be the justification or futility of the present conflict. Just as reliance on these official statements can raise hopes of subjected people to sublime heights, so would disillusionment lead to utter despair, blackest cynicism and contemptuous rejection of political leadership for generations to come.

Since we in America are known as an idealistic people, easily swayed to noble causes, and quickly disgusted when convinced of the insincerity of crusaders, the spoken words and promises of our leaders are even more important than those of countries that are looked upon as less ideologic.

Others have spoken tonight of the great tragedy of the Jewish people. Full as Jewish history is with tragic incidents, none was ever so great as the systematic campaign of slaughter which the Jewish people are undergoing in our day. One quarter of the Jews of the world are being exterminated.

No act of infamy in all the pages of history, from the beginning of time, to now, can compare with the savage campaign of wholesale martyrdom and murder now being conducted against the Jewish people. To withdraw, or to evade under such conditions from our commitments and responsibility to provide a promised homeland to these people, is to me, unthinkable. To avoid this measure of assistance in human misery by the great Allied Powers, would mean the establishment of a new low in international morality.

Perhaps I can best contribute to this cause by leaving to others the proof of the moral untenability and political short-sightedness that such a course would portray, and myself stress the fatal part which such an unpardonable attitude is bound to play in testing the worth of any of the promises which are being lavishly poured forth, and out of which mankind takes courage to go on with this struggle. Woe unto the world if its people become convinced that they can judge their leaders only by their words and not by their deeds.

There are those who will say that the question of Palestine—the closing of its doors to the Jews—is an issue between Great Britain and the Jewish people, in which the United States of America has no right to interfere. To any who think thus, I would remind them of the historic declarations of our Government with respect to this question, going back to the early twenties. Speaking of the mandated areas in which Palestine is included, our Secretary of State wrote a note to Great Britain on November 20, 1920, as follows:

"Such powers as the Allied and Associated Nations may enjoy or wield in the determination of the governmental status of the mandated areas, accrued to them as a direct result of the war against the Central Powers. The United States, as a participant in that conflict and as a contributor to its successful issue, cannot consider any of the Associated Powers, the smallest not less than itself, debarred from the discussion of any of its consequences, or from participation in the rights and privileges secured under the mandates provided for in the treaties of peace * * *. The United States is undoubtedly one of the powers directly interested in the terms of the mandates, and I therefore request that the draft mandate forms be communicated to this Government for its consideration before their submission to the Council of the League."

Subsequently, and as a result of the foregoing, the United States in a further note to Great Britain insisted that: "The consent of the United States should be obtained before any alteration is made in the text of the mandate.

The British Government agreed to give a separate undertaking to this effect and the United States, on April 5, 1922, consented that such an undertaking be embodied in a special convention. According to the official communique issued at Washington on May 14, 1922, the treaty was to incorporate the text of the Palestine mandate and to provide that no change should be made in that text without the concurrence of the United States. One June 20, the British Foreign Office forwarded to the American Ambassador at London the draft of the treaty.

These excerpts from our diplomatic correspondence explain the purport of Article 7 of the Anglo-American Convention of December 3, 1924, as follows:

"Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited above, unless such modification shall have been assented to by the United States."

This article, which clearly and unequivocally establishes the right of the United States to give or to refuse its assent to any modification in the mandatory status of Palestine, was the guiding principle of American policy with regard to Palestine for nearly 13 years after the conclusion of the convention of December 1924. In 1937, when the second partition of Palestine was proposed, this American right was the subject of an important and illuminating discussion between the American and British Governments. And what was the stand taken by our Government? Our Government insisted (and I am quoting from the official correspondence of our Ambassador to London, Robert W. Bigham) that it adhere to the "principle established in 1921 that the approval of the United States is essential to the validity of any determination which may be reached regarding mandated territories."

This, my friends, is the record which clearly establishes our right to intervene at this hour when the mandate to which we have given our concurrence is being nullified in practice, without our consent, and without even following the procedure laid down in the mandate, itself.

This is the basis of our right. But I believe that unless our good faith is to be made the victim of contempt it is also our duty to be heard. It has been said in the recent past, and it is being said with regard to the future, that any war anywhere, any breach of international law anywhere, is a concern of ours; that we may not dissociate ourselves from it at the risk of having the whole structure of world peace shattered.

As to this I can only say that I believe that when we put our signature to a document it is up to us to see that commitments to us are not nullified. Otherwise what is the sense of putting our signatures to international documents? Our consent is not being asked to a most far-reaching and a most unfair change in the status of Palestine despite the fact that a convention to which we are a party stipulates that our consent is essential. The consent of the League of Nations, which, according to the mandate incorporated in our convention, is also essential, is equally dispensed with. Are we to stand mute and silent and acquiescent? Or are we asked why such things are possible?

Our own citizens, under the white paper, have been made victims of discrimination in that land of Palestine if they have the misfortune to belong to the Jewish faith. They are excluded from entering Palestine as a matter of policy. They are forbidden to purchase land in most of Palestine as a matter of policy. We did not stand for it when Czarist Russia tried to do it decades ago. We did not stand for it when Hitlerite Germany tried to do it a short decade ago. Why should we silently acquiesce in such a course now?

Ultimately the protest of all decent Americans is directed against the cruel gesture of closing the gates of Palestine to the Jewish people; the gates of a country which has been entrusted to British guardianship for the explicit purposes of facilitating Jewish settlement therein; and in doing so at the most tragic time in Jewish history—when Jews stand in need of a homeland as never before; and in doing so in violation of solemn pledges both to the League of Nations and to us.

Our immediate protest is directed against that inept, unwise, and unworthy policy which makes our own Government stand idly by watching this moral error; a legal misdeed being perpetrated without us exercising our right to cry out against it; without us discharging our duty to cry "Halt!"

I am particularly glad to attend this New Zionist meeting because my belief in the aims and aspirations of Zionism are in accord with my American patriotism and my Catholic faith. I believe that the establishment of a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine will be of benefit not only to Jews but to non-Jews as well. To Jews it will provide some place in this world which they will be able to call their own. A race, like an individual, feels lonesome and destitute without a roof over its head.

ADDRESS BY WILLIAM C. BULLITT

Ladies and gentlemen, this evening's gathering is called a twentieth anniversary dinner, but to me it represents the twenty-fifth anniversary of a tragic event. Twenty-five years ago, in the spring of the peace conference, a British plane flying from London to Paris plunged into the Channel. On it was the leader of the Zionists of Palestine—Aaron Aaronsohn. He was a great agronomist, the discoverer of the wild wheat, parent of all the wheats of the world. He was also a very great man, and he was my own close friend.

In the volume which was published in his memory, I wrote, in 1920:

"Aaron, to me, was not merely the flaming embodiment of the determination of the Jewish race to have a home and to be again a nation, but rather, a captain in the foremost company of that small army of humanity which marches ever against ignorance, superstition, and hatred. If he had lived, I believe that he would have been a world leader through the years of travail which are now upon mankind.

"Nothing in the nature of man was strange to him or beyond the range of his quick sympathy. The Jewish race has many brilliant leaders, but when Aaron died I believe that it lost the man who, before all others, could kindle the minds and hearts of men of other nations to active sympathy; and not Zion alone will suffer for his loss, the world is poorer."

Since Aaron Aaronsohn's death I have often felt that I was in a minority of one on the question of Palestine. His opinions were my opinions, and for a long time there seemed to be few, if any, who shared them. Aaron had lived most of his life at Zikron Jacob, a little Jewish colony in the hills, and he had got along well with the Arabs. He felt neither hatred nor contempt for them. He was fond of them. But he believed profoundly that not only the fate of the Jews in Palestine but also the fate of all the Jews in all the world demanded that Palestine should become a Jewish state, free and independent, with its own flag and its own citizenship. He foresaw endless difficulties and hatreds, and even massacres, if Jewish immigrants should merely be poured into Palestine as a mandated area, against the will of the Arab majority. Indeed, he went so far as to say that it would be better for the Jews of Palestine to remain under the rule of the Turks, rather than to become a hated minority surrounded by the masses of Mohammedans who inhabit the Near East. He sought an agreed solution.

Many times during the Peace Conference in Paris, I sat with him and Dr. Weizmann while they thought out together policies and plans. Aaron's proposal was that, while Palestine should become a Jewish state, the vast valley of Iraq, watered by the Tigris and the Euphrates, should be turned once more by irrigation into the garden of the world—which it once had been—and that the Arabs of Palestine should be offered there lands far richer than the lands they owned in Palestine, and that as many as possible of them should be persuaded to emigrate to Iraq. He foresaw no insuperable difficulties if some should choose to remain in the Jewish state. And he recognized fully that Jerusalem was a holy place not only for the Jews but also for the Mohammedans and the Christians. He proposed that Jerusalem and Bethlehem should be set apart as a sort of Vatican City to be administered jointly by representatives of the three great religions under international guarantees.

These, briefly and roughly, were Aaronsohn's ideas. They seemed to me to offer a possible solution of the problem of Palestine. It was obvious that the utmost diplomatic skill and energy, and large sums of money, would be required to put them into effect. Nevertheless, in 1919, they seemed to be within the realm of practical politics. At that time there was little hatred between the Jews and the Arabs in Palestine. And the combined power of the British, French, and American Governments to carry out policies they might agree upon was almost unlimited.

After Aaronsohn's death his ideas were forgotten, and Palestine under British mandate entered upon the splendid course of material development with which we are all familiar—but at the same time upon the course of growing race hatred which Aaronsohn had foreseen.

Today, the question of Palestine remains as unsolved as it was in 1919. It is, indeed, more difficult to solve than it was in 1919—so difficult that in spite of the terrible need of the Jews of Europe for a land of refuge, the only visible policy toward Palestine is the policy of preserving the status quo until the end of the war.

Under these circumstances, I wonder if it may not be wise to consider now, seriously, the proposals which Aaron Aaronsohn made in 1919. Conditions, to be sure, have changed. There are many new factors in the situation. Some favorable, many unfavorable. One of them is so important that it is worthy of special attention.

The petroleum reserves beneath the soil of the United States have been drained and are being drained at such a rate that our Government estimates that in less than 20 years they will be exhausted. For reasons of national defense, our Government is vitally concerned that they should not be exhausted and that reserves of overseas oil should be assured for the United States. Our Government, therefore, is now taking a direct interest in the petroleum reserves of Saudi Arabia. A long step in American foreign policy is involved in this decision. The Near East is remote from our shores. It lies in a British sphere of influence, and may become an area of conflict between Great Britain and Russia. Our future need for oil, however, has seemed so important that our Government has decided to involve the United States directly in the affairs of the Near East.

If the United States has a major national interest in the Near East, the Government of the United States cannot be indifferent to the settlement of questions which affect the tranquillity of the area. And the unsettled question of Palestine does affect the tranquillity of the area.

This new policy of the American Government may influence our official attitude toward Palestine in either of two ways. It may cause our Government to become increasingly apprehensive about making any proposal which might irritate the Arabs—just as British policy with regard to Palestine has been influenced by British interests in Mohammedan areas. On the other hand, it may be made the starting point for a truly constructive policy with regard to the whole Near East, including Palestine.

Since 1940, when America was unprepared for war and Great Britain stood heroically, alone against the Nazis, there have been few Americans who have not realized that there can be no peace and little decency in the world unless there is the closest cooperation between the United States and Great Britain. That cooperation exists today and should become ever closer. In view of the present coordination of American and British efforts in so many vital fields of world affairs, it is not impossible to imagine that the American and British Governments might work out now with each other and with the rulers of the various Mohammedan states in the Near East a policy for the development of the whole area not only in respect of oil but also with regard to the irrigation of the great valley of Iraq and the settlement of the question of Palestine.

Thus, once more the proposals which Aaron Aaronsohn made in 1919 may come into the realm of practical politics. I do not say that they will but that they may. It is easy for politicians to evade the issue, and settle the question of Palestine so far as their own careers are concerned by expressing great sympathy for the Jews. There is no Arab vote in the United States.

Kind words are pleasant but acts are needed and, in this case, wisdom, energy, and human understanding of no common order.

The case is genuinely difficult. The facts are hard. And nothing but disappointment and disillusionment is to be gained by pretending that the question is easy of solution or by belittling the Arabs.

There has been greatness in their past. There may be greatness in their future. New life is stirring in all the Arab world from Syria to Morocco. In Arabia, Ibn-Saud has created greater unity than any man since Mohammed. The religion of the Arabs is a noble one which, in its pure form, produces men of profound courage, courtesy, and loyalty. And any act which can be construed as an attack on their religion creates among the Arabs a unified will to fight. And they still outnumber the Jews in Palestine by approximately two to one.

The striking economic progress in Palestine since 1919 is, of course, attributable to the Jews; but the Arabs have participated in the advance, and even today 50 percent of the vast orange groves that beautify the plain along the sea are owned by Arabs.

Such magnificent creations as the great new hospital in Jerusalem and the Hebrew university splendid tokens of the ability of the Jews to bring western civilization to the Near East. But the case of the Arabs is far from weak, and the overriding argument for a Jewish State in Palestine is not to be found in local conditions but in a world-wide need. Anti-Semitism has not disappeared, and will not disappear even with the death of Hitler and the destruction of his criminal accomplices. The Jews, like all other peoples, need a land; and it is right and fitting that their land should be the promised land of their fathers. To reach that promised land I know no better way than the path proposed by Aaron Aaronsohn. And I think the American and British Governments should follow it.

It is not on easy path. Determination, energy, wisdom, diplomatic skill and the closest cooperation between the American and British Governments will be needed in full measure if it is to be followed successfully to the end. Unless it is followed as a major policy in foreign affairs it will be too hard for the politicians. But there is no easy, short cut to a lasting settlement of the question of Palestine and those who propose short cuts by force, whether they be Arabs or Jews, prepare only disaster. If the Arabs of Palestine and the neighboring states should attempt to drive the Jews out of Palestine by force, they would be crushed by the overwhelming strength of the British added to that of the Jewish population. If the Jews of Palestine should attempt to impose their rule on the Arab majority by force, they would face the forces of the neighboring Arab states as well and would achieve only their own destruction.

The question cannot be settled except by an agreed solution. Why should we despair of such a solution? Constructive statesmanship is still possible in this world. Only 20 years ago, great statesmen—Venizelos, of Greece, and Ataturk, of Turkey—settled the ancient blood feud between the Greeks and the Turks by an exchange of populations which finally included 1,500,000 souls—an exchange of huge dimensions compared to the resources of their states. It was an enormous effort, but a constructive one; and it settled the question. For the first time in history Greece and Turkey became close friends.

Are the great powers incapable of constructive statesmanship? Are their leaders incompetent, or is the will to act wanting?

After Aaron Aaronsohn's death, as I said to you, I felt often that I was in a minority of one. I may still be. But I continue to have faith in his proposals. I believe that it is possible for the British and American Governments to work out with the rulers of the Arab states, and with the Jews and Arabs of Palestine, an agreed solution which will bring vast benefits to the Mohammedans of the Near East as well as to the Jews.

The blood of the tortured Jews of Europe cries out to all humanity for a Jewish state in Palestine. The American Government is embarking on a new policy toward the Near East. It is the part of men of good will of all faiths to see to it that policies are pursued which will produce an agreed solution between the Jews and the Arabs and permit at last the creation of a free Palestine in a free world.

The 3d of May—Anniversary of the Charter of Polish Liberties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, today the Poles throughout the world are celebrating their national holiday—the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the constitution which marked their nation's spiritual rebirth. This is the fifth year in succession when Poles within their home territory have been compelled to observe their national holiday under the tyrant's heel, intimidated and brutally treated by the satraps of foreign dictator carpetbaggers.

The 1791 Constitution of Poland was the first democratic charter of liberties of any European country and was inspired by Anglo-Saxon liberal thought. That constitution decreed a great reform, revolutionary in effect. It improved the existing regime and inspired the people of all of Europe. It gave expression to the grim determination of Poland to throw off foreign invaders and domination. It eloquently underwrote Poland's hostility to tyranny and unwillingness to submit to international immorality.

The Poles were the first to fight the Germans. There is no Quisling in Poland. Her people have made incredible sacrifices and have been subjected to uncivilized, barbarous, and savage treatment, virtually unparalleled in history. Unfortunately, the reforms provided in the constitution were prevented from going into effect and were held in abeyance by the combined action of foreign nations, but the national spirit of Poland has ever remained alive, while the people have bided their time.

Today I pay tribute to the heroic peoples of Poland, unintimidated and uncowed in their zeal for independence. Their friends in the United States may take pride justifiably in the contribution made to world civilization by Polish culture.

In the field of music alone, Polish composers have set a standard for the world to emulate. In literature, painting, and sculpture, Poland's sons and daughters have been outstanding.

I join with my colleagues today in congratulating Poland on the anniversary of her constitution. God speed the day when Poland will be liberated and will rise again.

International Organization

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and statement:

THE COMMISSION ON A JUST AND DURABLE PEACE,
New York, N. Y., April 21, 1944.

The Honorable WALTER H. JUDD,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN JUDD: I am enclosing herewith a statement signed by more than 1,000 churchmen, lay and clerical, urging that steps be taken to initiate now the nucleus of a general world organization such as that envisaged by the Moscow Declaration and the Connally resolution.

I do not believe I am overstating the case when I say that the preponderant majority of the church people of America, of all denominations and faiths, support the proposals embodied in this statement. They look to you to do everything within your power to achieve the ends therein set forth.

May I respectfully suggest that you give this statement your careful study.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER W. VAN KIRK,
Secretary.

AN APPEAL TO THE PRESIDENT, THE CONGRESS, AND THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES

We, the undersigned, believe that the time is at hand when a concrete beginning should be made to realize the Moscow declaration and Connally resolution which recognized "the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organization * * *." We need now at least the nucleus of such a general international organization in order to promote unity of political and diplomatic decision by the principal United Nations and consistency with such aspects of the moral law as have been proclaimed by the Atlantic Charter and other declarations of the United Nations.

If, however, international organization is to serve its purpose of achieving just and durable peace, it must from the beginning be planned to become universal in membership and curative and creative in purpose.

We subscribe wholeheartedly to the affirmation ("Six Pillars of Peace") of the Commission on a Just and Durable Peace, instituted by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, that not only must there be "the political framework for a continuing collaboration of the United Nations," but that "such collaboration should, as quickly as possible, be universal." We also believe, with that Commission, that the international organization which is established should have not merely the task of seeking physical security but responsibility to deal regularly with conditions which contain the seeds of future war. It should be designed to seek the change of treaty conditions which may develop to be unjust and provocative of war; to bring within the scope of international agreement those economic and financial acts of nations which have widespread international repercussions; to promote the attainment of autonomy as a genuine goal for dependent peoples; and to assure for people everywhere a regime of religions and intellectual liberty.

We appeal to the President, the Congress, and the people of the United States to work vigorously for practical steps which will initiate such an organization.

The Liquor Shortage

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, some people in Washington appear hell bent on driving the people of the United States headlong into the evils of prohibition whether the people want it or not.

The latest attempt in this direction comes from the Chemicals Division of the War Production Board, which after 6 weeks and more of dilly-dallying, double-talk, and coy excuses has failed to promulgate a policy giving relief to American liquor dealers who have traded with Cuba and other Latin-American countries.

I know 6 weeks is only a second in the existence of bureaucratic rule and ruin but when the little-business man has funds tied up for 6 weeks it means a lot to him. I wouldn't expect it to mean anything to cushion-seated procastinating bureaucrats here in the "District of Confusion."

For 6 weeks I have been trying to get a ruling from the Chemicals Division of the War Production Board and for 6 weeks all I have gotten has been conversation and promises which could be accepted for any conclusion I choose to arrive.

We have but to look around us to realize, if we look the facts in the face, that because of the liquor shortage, all the old prohibition evils are coming back—bootlegging, hijacking, black-market price gouges, bad liquor and so on.

The people of this country do not want a return to prohibition and the evils which followed in the wake of the so-called noble experiment but if these bureaus are allowed to run hog-wild under the guise of the war effort we are going to have prohibition and all its attendant evils in fact if not in theory.

There is a liquor shortage in this country because distilleries have not been allowed to manufacture alcohol over a long period because the alcohol was necessary in explosives. Nobody complained about that. Winning the war is our first object, and if it is necessary to stop manufacturing liquor to get sufficient alcohol, then stop manufacturing whisky in this country.

With the shortage of liquor, however, came the black market, which has become a public scandal and which is now the subject of investigation by a congressional committee.

Many well-meaning persons have advocated a 3-week vacation for the distillers from war alcohol to blend 100,000,000 gallons or a 2-year Nation-wide supply of 86-proof whisky. Or a lot of alcohol sugar could be procured from Cuba to substitute for grain alcohol used in explosives. Alcohol is obtainable, too, from sulfite by products of paper manufacture.

Driven through necessity by lack of marketable drinking spirits in this country, liquor dealers turned toward the Latin-America countries for relief and imported a huge quantity of rum from Cuba and other Latin-American countries. A quota import was slapped against Cuba, and then to appease Cuba for the ban, the W. P. B. also ordered a ban on other Latin-American countries, including Mexico, which was and is one of our large suppliers.

Again I say, if this was necessary in the war effort, then let us do it by all means, but let us be fair about the thing.

Without warning and without advance notice the War Production Board issued an order banning the importation of all liquor with a sugarcane base.

Some dealers learned of the order only through accident. I may say that the order was issued almost in secrecy and to only a favored few who even now seem to have a knowledge of what is going to happen before either the public or Members of Congress know anything about it.

At any rate on March 9 the order was issued by the War Production Board, becoming effective on March 15.

What was the effect of the order, particularly on the little liquor dealers? Unaware that such an order was contemplated these dealers had already issued letters of credit, or otherwise contracted for the shipment of merchandise which was either in transit or being prepared for shipment.

Although that order became effective on March 15 and letters of credit have been outstanding since that time, impairing the credit of the little dealer, the War Production Board to this date has not publicly issued any policy granting relief to these little dealers who have been caught "holding the bag."

Mind you, the only request which has been made has been to allow the importation of that merchandise which was contracted prior to March 15. Is that asking too much? Is it asking too much to have a ruling made in 6 weeks?

It took the War Production Board 6 days to make the ban effective but in 6 weeks the War Production Board has failed to grant relief from the ban to those injured by the order.

Not only has no relief been granted but severing the Gordian knot becomes an easy matter compared to getting some intelligent information from the War Production Board as to when relief can be expected.

Nero is said to have fiddled while Rome burned. These bureaucrats fumble while American small business becomes slowly strangulated in a mesh of indecisiveness and procrastination.

But the door of information is not closed to everybody in the liquor industry and others as far as the Chemicals Division of the War Production Board is concerned as evidenced by this series of events.

Shortly after the order was issued I learned through a certain source in the liquor industry that the W. P. B. would remove the ban on all 3-year-old rum. This was a logical exemption since such rum was already produced and would obviously have no effect on future production of alcohol. That seemed to be a matter for early and immediate determination. It seemed to an ordinary layman with an ordinary mind to be an easy solution but I failed to conjure with that which makes the minds of these bureaucrats. function

It was on March 21 that I received this information and relayed it to Mr. John Boyer, head of the Chemicals Division of the War Production Board, who should know what was going on since he is the head of the division.

In substance Mr. Boyer told me there was nothing to the report and that no "Technique of policy" had been determined and that "anything could happen."

On April 12, 3 weeks later, it was announced over the radio and in the press that the ban on 3-year-old rum would be removed.

When I contacted Mr. Boyer to have the report confirmed or denied I was informed by him that such a statement was "unauthorized" and reasonably came away with the impression that the radio and press reports were in error.

On April 27, 2 weeks later, such an order was "officially" released, according to Mr. Boyer.

Pressed by the reason of his reply to me on April 12, Mr. Boyer adroitly pointed out that he had not denied such an order was in the making but specifically said it was "unauthorized."

Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, what conclusion would any of you had come to if given such information? That's an example of the double-talk the public and Members of Congress get. It is the old run-around at its zenith. The facts as stated by me indicate somebody knew as far back as March 27 that such an order was contemplated. The press and radio found it out on April 12 but the little fellows down at the bottom of the ladder did not know anything about it until April 27 and inquiring Members of Congress heard about it at an even later date.

I cannot but wonder who did profit by the advance information on the subsequent policy. Surely it was of advantage to somebody to be on the "in" on such information.

I wonder who now has knowledge of what the "technique of policy" will be relative to those unfortunate dealers who have been caught in the predicament which I have described.

It is possible that the "technique of policy" has been decided upon but its announcement has not been "authorized" as was the case relative to lifting the ban on 3-year rum. The "authorized" announcement will probably be forthcoming after the "technique of policy" has been passed along to favored parties without benefit of "authorized announcement" but just as effective for all intent and purposes.

Very frankly, I am not optimistic that any relief will be granted to the little liquor dealers. The big fellows can handle themselves and are doing it pretty well. I am not interested in them. I am interested in those folks who need a friend at court, where there is so much confusion, indecision and chaos.

Somebody has observed that the most outstanding shortage in Washington is a shortage of old-fashioned common horse sense.

The application of a little such common horse sense where the public is concerned would be rather refreshing. It is too much to hope for, however, in the light of previous occurrences and rulings by some governmental bureaus. Or perhaps the apparent lack of use of common horse sense is only a subterfuge for more double talk and run-around.

Somebody has got somebody bluffed in connection with this liquor situation. Just yelling out "war effort" does not answer the problem. Enough crimes are being committed under the cry of aiding the war effort. It is about time somebody got to the bottom of the whole thing and a good place to start would be in the Chemicals Division of the War Production Board to determine why they cannot make up their minds after a lapse of more than 6 weeks and why information is accessible to some persons and not to a Member of Congress.

I am persuaded there is something rotten and it is not in Denmark this time.

Poland Redivivus

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of a memorable occasion, a day in the world's history never to be forgotten.

One hundred and fifty-three years ago today the Polish Parliament adopted the first written democratic constitution to establish the rights of people and peasants, to secure liberty, freedom, and equality for all under law. The constitution of the 3d of May was of import beyond purely Polish bounds. It was an event of general human significance, as Edmund Burke truly remarked. It possessed a value of no mean importance to the progress of mankind. The immediate consequences of its adoption were tragic, its lasting significance great.

We Vermonters, imbued with the same spirit, whose fathers established and maintained an independent republic for 14 years before joining the United States on March 4, 1791, pay our tribute to the same kind of indomitable courage and imperishable spirit which has dominated Poland over the years. As our allies they have fought as have we for freedom from oppression whenever and wherever the flag which marches ahead of blood brothers for liberty has been flung to the breeze and led the way. The record of Polish patriots is a bright spot in the dark shadows that have enveloped the world through the years. We salute them.

This people have come from the four corners of the earth to fight for freedom and to exemplify what love of liberty means, no matter how great the sacrifice involved to make their dreams come true. They have paid a terrible price to maintain their rights.

I say to the Polish people that we deeply sympathize with your struggle to keep your liberties alive. We believe with you in the absolute right of small nations and freemen to enjoy such freedom and liberty as that for which you and we are fighting. To live without them is to die. We congratulate you on this your aniversary of your declaration of independence.

Dictatorial Practices of the New Deal Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the exercise of dictatorial powers by the President and the Attorney General in the seizure of a nonwar plant in Chicago last week, I wish to call the attention of the House to another White House directive of sabotaging the Constitution.

The undisputed facts to which I invite your attention disclose the President of the United States using his powers in an attempt to conceal the activities and records of 30 Federal employees who have been accused of disloyalty to the Government. Here, again, we find Mr. Biddle, the Attorney General, justifying the President's action with one of his celebrated opinions.

As a member of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, I am disturbed and alarmed over this situation, and I feel that the House should be equally concerned.

In December of last year the Special Committee on Un-American Activities authorized an investigation into the investigative procedures in loyalty cases of the Civil Service Commission. This action was prompted by a directive issued in November 1943 by the Commission instructing its field agents not to ask applicants or Government employees questions concerning their affiliations with certain Communist-front organizations.

On February 18, 1944, the Special Committee on Un-American Activities served a subpena on the President of the Civil Service Commission calling upon him to produce the files and records of 10 persons employed in the Federal Government, and again on February 25 the committee issued a subpena for the files in 20 other cases. On February 18, and again on February 26, Harry S. Mitchell, President of the Commission, replied to the subpena in the form of a letter in which he stated:

> The Commission has therefore concluded that it would not be in the public interest to disclose these documents to the committee.

He concludes the letter in the following language:

> You can be assured that it is the desire of the Commission to cooperate with your committee in every way and that the Commission now declines, with the approval and at the direction of the President of the United States, to comply with certain of your requests only because it is believed that it must do so if it is to properly perform its statutory duties.

The well-worn phrase "not in the public interest" has again been employed by the administration to conceal evidence which, by no possible stretch of the imagination, can affect the prosecution of the war. A Senate subcommittee when similarly defied by an aide to the President, took steps to hale him before the bar of the Senate for contempt and only then was given the information which it desired. The House should not be reluctant to protect its authority in the same manner.

Why should the President take such extraordinary precautions to keep the Congress and the public in ignorance of the records of 30 persons in key positions of the Government whose loyalty to our American system has been questioned? What information or evidence could there be in the files of a Federal employee which would be against the public interest? I can easily understand that certain information in these files would probably be against the public interest of the New Deal but certainly not against the public interest of the Nation.

The President of the Commission also informed the committee that they are relying upon an opinion given by the Attorney General dated April 30, 1941, which held that the investigative reports of the Federal Bureau of Investigation are confidential documents of the Executive Department and that congressional or public access thereto would not be in the public interest. I am sure that every Member will agree with me that there is a vast difference between the confidential records of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the records of a Government employee.

The Civil Service Commission has delivered to our committee, since the service of the subpenas on them, skeleton files with considerable deletions, and I am of the opinion that our investigation cannot be properly carried out without the full records and facts. I feel that the Congress should insist on having the full and complete files on the background and employment record of these Government employees whose loyalty is in question.

While on the subject, I should also like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Department of Justice has utterly failed to properly carry out its statutory duties in protecting and defending the dignity and power of the Congress of the United States. On April 8, 1940, the House adopted House Resolution 457, which referred to the United States attorney of the District of Columbia the case of Philip Frankfeld, Communist official in Boston, Mass., who had been held in contempt by the Special Committee on un-American Activities. Similar action was taken by the House on the same date under House Resolution 458 in the case of Dr. Albert Blumberg, head of the Communist Party for the State of Maryland. Similar action was also taken under House Resolution 459 in the case of Communist official Thomas F. P. O'Dea, of Boston, Mass. Similar action was also taken under House Resolution 452 in the case of George Powers, Communist official of Pittsburgh, Pa., and under House Resolution 446, James H. Dolsen, Pennsylvania Communist official, was also cited for contempt.

Mr. Speaker, it has now been approximately 4 years since these five Communist officials were cited for contempt by the House of Representatives and to date not a one of these defendants has been brought to trial. From such action it appears that the Communists are not the only ones who have contempt for the Congress.

I urge the Judiciary Committee of this body to investigate this matter and determine why the Communists in this country enjoy such a privileged status with the Department of Justice.

Anniversary of Adoption of Polish Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish today to commemorate the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the adoption of the Polish Constitution of 1791. This anniversary is important not only to those among us of Polish descent, but to every true American who is fighting today for liberty and justice.

The Polish Nation, as is well known, has been the pawn many times in its long and tragic history on the European chessboard, being submerged time and again by the various militaristic governments in Europe. But the spirit of the Polish people did not die. On November 11, 1918, when the armistice was declared between the Allied and the Central Powers, out of the ashes of World War No. 1, modern Poland was born as a nation and less than 3 years later, on March 17, 1921, 130 years after the adoption of the first Polish Constitution, a new constitution was adopted by the Polish Parliament.

America knows well the Polish apostles of liberation, typified by that glorious patriot, Thaddeus Kosciuszko, who gave his services to 13 loosely connected colonies on our eastern seaboard in their struggle against tyranny and oppression. The United States of those days offered no opportunity for gain to a recognized military strategist, but Kosciuszko, the liberator, had no thought of material gain. His only wish was to see men free and for his deeds of valor he was recognized in his own lifetime by a vote of gratitude by the Congress and by receiving the rank of brigadier general in our Army. But America gave him—and through him gave to his beloved Poland—more than gratitude and more than military honors. Through Kosciuszko, America gave to Poland the spirit and letter of our own Declaration of Independence, to be embodied in the Polish Constitution of 1791.

During the years immediately after the rebirth of Poland in Europe in 1918, there was enthusiastic support from the Allied Nations but as was to be expected, extreme coolness from Germany and other Central Powers. As the years passed, the enemies of Poland became stronger and rumors swept through the world that this reborn democracy would not last long as a nation. These harbingers of gloom emphasized the differences between the long-submerged Polish peoples; they spoke of their economic and political troubles; they played up the supposed rightful claims of neighboring nations. It is not too much to say that it was in the 1920's that many of the seeds of this present war were sown by men who hoped secretly to see Poland again submerged beneath its predatory neighbors, with whom it had tried to live at peace. And so, on September 1, 1939, rather than compromise with Hitler and his evil powers, Poland again became the battleground of Europe.

This brief recital of part of the history of Poland is important today as we commemorate the adoption of the Polish Constitution of May 3, 1791. Many attempts are being made to becloud the Polish issue and it behooves us today—as always—to review the facts and to keep them clearly in mind. The Polish Nation, through its Army, Navy, and air force, side by side with our own gallant men and women, is fighting openly against Germany and through the "underground," many millions of Poles are playing a courageous and vital part in the war. Throughout the years the Polish people have been our brothers in liberty and the United States must not forget them at the peace table.

In 1791 Poland, with America, was in the vanguard of the free and enlightened nations of the world. Today, a century and a half later, the world again needs Polish courage and Polish independence of thought if the wounds caused by this frightful conflict are to be healed. The United States to be true to its many loyal citizens of Polish descent, aye to be true to its very self, must encourage and aid Poland in keeping bright the fires of liberty and democracy which burn so fiercely in every Polish heart, brave lovers of truth and freedom.

Polish Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK L. SUNDSTROM

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. SUNDSTROM. Mr. Speaker, on this anniversary of the Polish Constitution of the 3d of May 1791, I would like to pay a brief tribute to the first of the United Nations to accept the German challenge and to fight for her own freedom and that of the whole world. Poland, our gallant ally, once the largest and most democratic country in Europe, was crushed and partitioned by her neighbors. And this brings me to a point that is too often overlooked. It is the fact that Poland, a purely Slav nation, has for a thousand years been most closely allied with western culture, that she is saturated with western ideals, that in Europe's hour of religious intolerance Poland was a haven to the oppressed of all races and of all creeds. And even after Poland had suffered national extinction, when there was no longer a Polish state, Poland, true to her Christian ideals, fought all over the world and right here in the United States "for our freedom and for yours." Yes; Pulaski gave his life; Kosciusko fought for our independence. Shall we not in our turn see that Poland's independence is restored? Let us join here today in a solemn pledge that when victory has been achieved by the United Nations over Germany and her partners in crime, Poland will be retsored to the place that is hers, a strong, free, and independent nation, as ever a loyal friend and ally of our glorious country. May the American eagle and the white eagle of Poland fly wing to wing over a world of peace.

Anniversary of Adoption of the Polish Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. D. McWILLIAMS

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. McWILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, although the Polish Nation is overrun with foreign invaders and her cities have suffered the extreme and most cruel ravages of modern warfare the spirit of her people remains undaunted.

Today the Polish people are observing another anniversary of their great Constitution adopted May 3, 1791. This Constitution, extending greater freedom to the people of this grand and gallant country was inspired by the ideals of our Declaration of Independence and the French Declaration of the Rights of Men.

It was the first written democratic constitution in Europe establishing the rights of the middle classes and of the peasants. And down through the trying years of Poland's subsequent history this famous document has given the people of Poland added strength in their continued fight for freedom and against aggression.

Today our own Nation is again engaged in a great fight for freedom and Poland is our ally. It is therefore fitting that on this memorable Polish anniversary we rededicate ourselves to the cause of freedom for Poland and all the nations of the earth.

To that end, the people of Poland will make any sacrifice and have already emulated over and over again the fortitude of our own founding fathers in their quest for freedom.

May the day soon come when Poland may once again take her rightful place among the nations of the world and enjoy again the freedom for which she so valiantly fights as our ally today.

Poland's Restoration Humanity's Obligation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW C. SCHIFFLER
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker, July 4, 1776, there was proclaimed for the world to know, with a profound and eloquent declaration, the freedom of a subordinated people. They had protested the wrongs to which they had been subjected and petitioned for relief. No consideration had been given to their petition, and with determination these courageous pioneers, upon a virgin continent, declared the birth of a new Republic. With it, a written constitution; unique, sound, humane and visionary, was conceived and adopted. No sooner had it been adopted than a need was observed for the establishment in such magnificent document of a guaranty of certain inalienable rights to the people who were to be governed by it. Thus came the first ten amendments, commonly referred to as the Bill of Rights. It has since been eulogized throughout the world by the leading statesmen and scholars as the greatest document for the government of human society ever to come from the brain and pen of man. Eternal vigilance is essential for its preservation and permanency. Let no man or woman for one moment abandon vigilance in protecting and preserving this document to which we owe all our progress, liberty, and privileges.

May 3, 1791, our great sister republic, Poland, also a pioneer in establishing the fundamental rights of the common man, announced to the world the establishment of a democratic written constitution. A glorious and outstanding period in European history was thus established.

After hundreds of years of persecution, suffering, trials and tribulations filled with sweat, toil and bloodshed, the people of this progressive and advanced nation, courageous and forward-looking, likewise, in their great document for the government of people of that part of the world, proclaimed new and unannounced principles recognizing the fundamental and inalienable rights of the common men.

May 3, 1944, marks the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the Polish Constitution. That 153 years has also been filled with many chapters of interesting history in which these great people have valiantly fought and bled to preserve their native land and all that it symbolizes. Frequently attacked and torn asunder by the great military powers of Europe, having been subject to partition, conquest, and disintegration, with all of the genius with which such people are blessed, never for one moment have they abandoned the torch of liberty and human freedom and the cause to which they dedicated their nation by the establishment of their constitution.

September 1, 1939, the forces of aggression, iniquity and bloody persecution again invaded this land. Within 3 weeks all of this great sister republic was occupied and much of it devastated. Its brave and patriotic people were humiliated, persecuted, and wantonly murdered, and the glorious civilization achieved by a thousand years of terrific struggles was supplanted by this force of wicked aggression and wanton destruction.

The debt to Poland for its achievements in defending the continent of Europe against the aggressors in the past is such that we cannot adequately repay until there has again been established in this land of traditional liberty, progress, and advanced civilization, a free government of the people with security and peace. Can we forget that it was the valor, courage, and sacrifice of Poland that saved western Europe from the Tartar invasion in the Battle of Lignica in 1241? That it was Poland who stopped the first Teutonic thrust for power in the Battle of Grunwald in 1410; that it was Poland, in 1683, that stemmed the invasion of the Turks at Vienna; that it was Poland that saved Europe from the Bolshevik invasion at the Battle of Warsaw in 1920, and that she most courageously, to the utmost of her ability, and at great sacrifice, loss of life, and even country, defended her borders and her national honor and resisted to the utmost of her capacity, the Nazi invasion of 1939.

These are but a few of the heroic contributions that Poland has made to the advancement of civilization in Europe and in America and for the world. Our debt to Poland can only be repaid by keeping in the forefront, and for primary consideration at the peace table, the fundamental rights that Poland possesses to be again established in her homeland as a sovereign democratic nation. I have faith that our Government will insist that the problems that have eternally subjected Poland to persecution, that have caused her to be torn apart from time to time, will be settled once and for all time and that she will be restored to her rightful place in the family of nations, in that the genius of her commonwealth can contribute to the attainment of a higher and better civilization for all mankind. Nothing less will suffice for these noble, heroic, and persecuted people.

On this one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the establishment of this great democratic constitution let us rededicate ourselves to the fulfillment of this sacred obligation.

How Could This Happen in America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL CUNNINGHAM
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter received from Mr. Win. C. Davidson, president, Bowles Livestock Commission Co., of Omaha, Nebr.:

BOWLES LIVESTOCK COMMISSION CO.,
Omaha, Nebr., April 28, 1944.

Hon. PAUL CUNNINGHAM,
Representative of Iowa,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: On April 26 Leroy K. Smith, regional director of A. A. A., called a meeting at the stockyards to explain the new order—"freezing corn on the farm." After his explanation, the meeting was open for discussion. There were about 500 farmers and cattle feeders at the meeting. The questions asked brought out these facts:

1. That all corn had to be sold to the C. C. C. and they are to pay ceiling price, plus 5 cents per bushel for shelling and trucking. This corn could not be sold to anyone, except industrial plants.

2. Where a farmer or cattle feeder needed corn he had to go to A. A. A. and get a certificate for 30 days' supply. He could only pay the farmer ceiling price. Naturally, the farmer could not sell his to the feeder, when he could get ceiling price, plus 5 cents per bushel for shelling and trucking, from the C. C. C.

3. There was to be an official of the A. A. A. visit each farm to determine whether that farmer had more corn than he needed to feed his cattle and hogs.

And, when a farmer or feeder asked for a 30-day supply, there would be an official of A. A. A. go to his farm or feedlot, look at his cattle, and if he decided the cattle were fat enough to ship he could refuse the feeder the corn and tell him to ship. In fact, if the feeder could not get the corn he would be forced to ship whether his cattle were actually ready or not.

4. Where a feeder had contracted for corn for future delivery and a down payment made, or paid in full (before the freeze order was issued), this contract is voided.

In my opinion this is the most drastic order yet issued and one which will wreck the meat industry.

Tuesday of this week, after the order went into effect, we had 12,000 cattle on the Omaha market, where 6,000 had been estimated. Wednesday there were over 10,000 cattle and 26,000 hogs—double the amount we would have had if this order had not been issued.

There was a line of trucks 2 or 3 miles long until noon each day, indicating liquidation of livestock. If this continues the country will be drained of fat livestock.

Mr. Smith informed us that this order for a month's supply of corn was for cattle in feed lots at present time and there would be not certificates issued for new cattle going into lots. You can readily see what effect this will have on the feeding industry for the future. There should be something done and speedily to stop this liquidation of livestock and, also, arrangements made whereby feeders can get corn for replacement cattle.

I understand that this order was framed months ago—and it looks to me like another case of regimentation and more power for the bureaucrats.

The big percent of the farmers are not in favor of continuing A. A. A. It looks to me like it is time for Congress to assert itself and abolish this bureau, also the O. P. A. and their Gestapo methods with their own courts. How could this happen in America?

In abolishing these bureaus it would release thousands of men who the W. M. B. claim are badly needed to win this war.

Very sincerely yours,

WIN C. DAVIDSON.

Anniversary of Adoption of the Polish Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. B. W. (PAT) KEARNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, in honoring Poland on this, her national day, the anniversary of her famous constitution of the 3d of May 1791, let us pay tribute to the sublime fortitude with which its Christian people are withstanding German terror.

It is because their patriotism has been strengthened by faith in God that the Poles have been able to withstand the bloody and relentless persecution that for 56 long months—2 months more than the last war—the German invaders have vented upon her. As has been stated heretofore—2,500,000 Poles murdered—the figure, Mr. Speaker, has now risen to 3½ million—500,000 starved to death by the Germans; 2,000,000 Poles deported to Germany for forced labor; 1,600,000 driven from their homes in the western provinces of Poland and sent to the east; hundreds of thousands confined in concentration camps; the population reduced to human slavery; dissenters who disputed the Nazi philosophy of state absolutism and a master race eliminated without mercy; more than a thousand towns and villages evacuated; 348 villages burned; everything of value confiscated, including farms, factories, workshops, stores, and even household furniture and personal effects; 7 dioceses under total persecution; churches, colleges, and high schools closed, and in some instances churches desecrated; members of religious orders banished; archbishops and bishops deported, imprisoned, and in some instances put to death; thousands of priests and religious students executed; other thousands thrown into concentration camps where large numbers of them died of maltreatment; and the civilian population, especially of the Jews, in many localities subjected to terrible "blood baths."

I have full confidence in the final victory and fulfillment of the obligation of recognition of the full sovereignty and territorial integrity of Poland. Surely after what Poland has been through, the first victim of Hitler's unprovoked aggression, of his mad bid for world dominion; after what Poland has done, how she defended her homeland and then fought in France, in Norway, in Libya, in Italy, on land and sea and in the skies, where the Polish air force helped to win the battle of Britain, our country, our Allies, the United Nations and civilization as a whole cannot stand by and see anything less than full justice done and full restoration of her rights assured to Poland, our gallant ally in this war and be it not forgotten whose sons fought and fell in our own war of independence like Pulaski, or played a notable part in organizing the military forces of our Republic, like Kosciuszko. What Poland did for America, we must do for Poland.

Freedom of Religion, Freedom of Worship—There Is a Difference

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I am extremely jealous of the freedoms enunciated in the first amendment to the Constitution of this Republic.

That article, the first article of the Bill of Rights, says in clear terms:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

Congress can neither establish a religion nor prohibit the free exercise thereof. It will be recalled that Jefferson, Madison, Adams, Franklin, Patrick Henry, and most of the others who provided the bulwark of the freedoms we enjoy in this country today were quite outspoken on the matter of religious freedom.

In his January 6, 1941 message to Congress, President Roosevelt began the "four freedoms" campaign and said, in enumerating them, "the second is freedom of every person to worship God in his own way—everywhere in the world."

It should be especially noted that he said freedom "to worship God in his own way." It is truly religious freedom. Shortly after that the Office of War Information issued a booklet entitled "The United Nations Fight for the Four Freedoms." A chapter in it was labeled "Freedom of religion."

Three years after his original "four freedoms" speech, President Roosevelt sent another message to Congress in which the wording was changed as far as religious freedom is concerned. The contrast is striking.

On this recent occasion, January 11, 1944, Mr. Roosevelt referred to the subject as Free Worship. Pictures of the Four Freedoms now being distributed label one "Freedom of worship."

But, alas, the difference is as great as the space between the earth and the heavens. The state might direct a man's religion and give him "freedom" to worship in accordance with the state plan. We might have freedom of worship as long as we worshiped in a manner prescribed by or in the church set up and approved by the state. But that does not measure up to the first article of the Bill of Rights providing that Congress cannot obstruct the free exercise of religion. Freedom of worship and freedom of religion are two separate things.

In this connection the March 16, 1944, issue of the Baptist Western Recorder views with some alarm, and justifiably so, the present trend. It states:

> Baptists and all other free churchmen should be on their toes these days to guard their liberties. In his January 11 message to the people of the United States, backing up his appeal to the Congress for enactment of some new war measures, President Roosevelt turned from his appeal for freedom of religion and spoke only of freedom of worship. That is exactly what the state church groups of the world want him to do. Freedom of religion means everything; freedom of worship means only that one will be unmolested in his house of worship, but the minute he goes out of that place of worship to teach, preach, circulate printed literature and converts, especially proselytes, to his faith he will go to jail.
> Perhaps the President heard from some of the other countries with respect to his original statement of "Freedom of every person to worship God in his own way—everywhere in the world." Perhaps they thought he was taking in too much territory.
> Be that as it may we have a Republic here in America and under a Republic the rights of minorities are respected. This cannot be said of a democracy. No matter what other countries may do, let us maintain fredom of religion here—freedom of every man to worship God when, where, and how he chooses. Also let us talk more about freedom of religion and quit talking about freedom of worship.

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include therein an editorial from the Greenville Piedmont of South Carolina, of May 1:

PATRIOTIC CONGRESS

Congress, at its worst has some faults, and at its worst is terrible. But it should be given its due.

The way it has supported this war, and the people conducting it, to the almost complete exclusion of politics, is one of the brightest features of these unpleasant times.

The latest example is the passage of the biggest naval appropriations bill in all history, by both houses of Congress, without a dissenting vote.

This is by no means an isolated case. There have been several other notable examples of unanimity in Congress, and the whole handling of the war, on the legislative side, has been surprisingly free from opposition or delay.

Regardless of political complications in an election year, and the inevitable antagonisms of policy and prejudice, first things have been put first, and there has been better cooperation so far than most observers would have thought possible.

One Hundred and Fifty-third Anniversary of the Polish Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH E. TALBOT
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, today marks the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of Polish Constitution Day. For 6 long years Poland has been under the heels of Nazi oppression. For 6 long years the people of Poland have been fighting the tyrannical power of the Axis, both within their country and in aiding the Allies in carrying on the war.

One hundred and fifty-three years ago Poland set up a constitution quite similar to our Constitution, and based upon the dignity of the individual, with liberty and freedom for each of its citizens.

The present conflict began on Polish soil, and history will record the terrific struggle that was put up by Polish patriots. Many of Poland's young men were successful in getting out of the country and in joining the air forces and combat forces in England and in giving their all to defeat the Axis. Many of these brave Polish youths have died for the cause.

It is my hope—and I believe the hope of all of us—that Poland will arise again as a great nation. I am hopeful that following the present conflict we may see a new Poland, with her pre-war boundaries preserved. Poland has never been hesitant in its fight for right and liberty and in its fight against tyranny and oppression.

On this great day in Poland's history, let us pay tribute to the great Polish heroes of yesterday and to the men and women of Poland who are fighting for freedom today.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with my remarks, I insert the following letter:

GMINA NO. 152 ZWIAZKU NAR. POLSKIEGO,
Waterbury, Conn.
Congressman JOSEPH E. TALBOT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On the 3d of May 1791 the Kingdom of Poland, already reduced by the tripartite partitions, unanimously adopted a new constitution which provided for liberty and equal rights for all men. What other nations and people did with bloodshed, Poland with her long tradition of tolerance, accomplished by peaceful means.

In these critical times, when not only Poland but the whole world is fighting against the dark forces of oppression and totalitarianism, it is fitting that this date be commemorated by us in the United States.

The Poles, always ready to support the democratic cause, were again the first to stand against enemy of freedom. Again they followed their motto "for your freedom and for ours."

Could you, sir, on the 3d of May, call this fact to the attention of the American Senate? It is our duty as Americans to remember an ally who though faced with insurmountable obstacles would rather die than surrender. The constitution of the 3d of May is another monument that testifies to the democratic spirit of Poland.

Respectfully submitted.

A. BRZEZINSKI, President.
S. CHMIELINSKI, Secretary.

Poland's National Holiday

HON. JOHN B. BENNETT
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I consider it a pleasure to join with my colleagues in saluting Poland on the celebration this day of the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the adoption of her constitution. Every Polish patriot, no matter where he may be, can well be proud of the Polish Constitution, which is one of the world's greatest documents of freedom. No nation has fought harder or suffered more to maintain and uphold the principles of freedom and justice for its people.

Today Poland finds herself in perhaps the most desperate circumstances of any period of her whole history. She is beset by the cruel armies of the aggressors on either side of her borders and she knows not which way to turn. The people of Poland want peace, as do the people of most of the other nations of the earth and when peace finally comes to them, let us hope that it is upon the basis of international justice and equality and in accordance with the principles for which the boys of our own country are fighting so valiantly.

Poland entered this conflict with overwhelming odds against her upon the assurance of the nations then fighting on our side that all possible aid and cooperation would be given her.

In her peace negotiations with the Soviet Union it is sincerely to be hoped that the principles laid down in the Atlantic Charter will be followed. In her dealings thus far with Poland and the other smaller nations, the Soviet Union has completely ignored and disregarded the Atlantic Charter.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this country should insist that peace negotiations made during the progress of this war should be conducted in accordance with the same rules and regulations and in the same spirit that we hope will obtain when final victory comes. For this war will have been fought in vain unless the freedom and sovereignty of peoples and nations, small and large, are fully respected and protected.

The G. I. Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over Station WOL of the Mutual network, Washington, D. C., May 2, 1944:

It is not my purpose to confine myself to a discussion of what is commonly called the G. I. bill of rights as set forth in the proposed bill, S. 1767, passed by the Senate and awaiting consideration by the House. The scope of my discussion goes far beyond that. Senate 1767 is an indication that Congress is aware that we cannot be haphazard about the future of the boys who have marched fearlessly off to battle. It is more than a debt of gratitude we owe them. No man has yet bought groceries, paid his rent, gone to school or married on a "thank you." We are faced with the solemn obligation to assure them those very things they are fighting for, among them, freedom from want, freedom from fear. It is not a question of sentimental slobbering over their sacrifices; too many pompous phrases have already covered that. It is a question of facing realistically, honestly, without compromise and without flinching what every fighting man and woman in our armed forces is asking now: "Where do we go from here, boys?"

What are some of the specific questions they are asking?

Will I get my job back? What if the firm has been reorganized and my job destroyed? What if it has been combined with another job? Where do I fit in? What if it has gone out of business? What if it is doing another kind of work? These are not remote possibilities.

If I had no job to go back to, what do I do? What provision is made for tiding me over? Whom do I see? Who answers my questions? Selective service in reverse? The United States Employment Service?

Will I be flung headlong into an economy changing from wartime to peacetime pursuits along with 10,000,000 other returning men and women? Will there be a plan of gradual demobilization, feeding manpower into industrial and agricultural life piecemeal? If so, how will selection be made? From point of view of length of service or demands of the labor market?

What of the time I have lost in climbing upward in social and financial progress? Many of those who stayed behind to fill my job have been promoted. Theirs is the added experience and, consequently, higher pay. What compensation, if any, can be given me for time out? A new generation will have grown up and gone into the labor market. These will be my competitors. What equitable adjustment is being planned now?

These and many more questions, I know, buzz around and around in the fighting man's head like so many flies that won't be shooed away.

The story of Capt. Don Gentile is appropriate. It is the pay-off on what the boys who are fighting our fight are thinking about—what they expect from us in the postwar world. He said he had lived on $1.50 a month and had been banking the rest of his allotment to "carry me over the lean, job-hunting days I expect after the war."

A brave lad like Gentile should not be harried in mind by the thought that he might be forestalled from realizing a gainful living. After the war, it would be tragically cruel to present him and any of the boys with only the lack of opportunities to work and serve in peace as they did in war. His story and that of others should have a happy ending. That happy ending means economic security and safety after the last shot has been fired. They are entitled to jobs, homes, freedom from fear, security in a world rid of fascism. The war will have been fought in vain if all we can give them after they return are victory medals and apple-stands. And so I say while the boys are in all the corners of the world intent just now, on carrying you and me forward to victory, strangers to the comforts we enjoy now, strangers to the fireside, to the luxuries, to the freedoms we take so much for granted, we, here, must attempt to find some of the answers. We cannot wait until they are returned to begin then, lest we be confounded by confusion and those we are so proud of now be the sufferers.

The G. I. bill of rights proposes to "provide Federal Government aid for the readjustment in civilian life of returning World War No. 2 veterans." I shall outline the bill briefly and generally.

It calls for the expediting and completion of additional hospital facilities for war veterans. It outlines the establishment of boards of review to pass upon the nature or type of discharge of any officer or enlisted man, except a discharge or dismissal by reason of a sentence of a court martial.

It provides for a director of servicemen's education and training under the direction of the Veterans' Administration, together with an advisory council, consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Federal Security Administration, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, the United States Commissioner of Education, and eight representatives of the public who shall be recognized leaders in the fields of education, labor, agriculture, and industry. Those eligible for education and training shall be entitled to such benefits for a period of 1 year and a further period of education and training is provided for those who have satisfactorily completed the first year. A veteran during the training period will be entitled to $50 per month subsistence, plus $25 per month if there are dependents.

It is no empty provision. A survey conducted by Research Branch of the Morale Service Division indicates that 7 percent of the men think they will actually go back to full-time school or college after the war. It is conceded, however, that married men and those over 25 are least likely to do so.

The condition of the labor market is expected to exert a strong influence on these prospects. Eighty percent of the men say that if they can get no job and Government aid is available they will return to school.

Colleges are preparing to absorb 1,000,000 service men and women at the close of the war as a result of the educational aid to be available to returning veterans.

Colleges are introducing new courses, providing individual-guidance counselors, establishing testing centers, etc.

The University of Michigan is considered to have promulgated the most far-reaching programs. The University of Buffalo has an 11-point plan which covers every field of study and endeavor, including special brush-up and short courses. Other universities have appointed committees to study the problem.

When veterans return to the classroom they will find the curriculum adjusted to their special needs. Study courses will be accelerated in every way consistent with good educational policy.

All types of schools have signified their willingness to go along with the project—elementary, secondary, business, and vocational schools, normal schools, mechanical schools, and professional schools.

While the present Senate bill does not specifically, step by step, provide for definite processes of rehabilitation, there are carryover statutes from the last war which do. These statutes must be strengthened so that there will be absolute assurance that every effort wil be made to restore to good health the wounded and the sick veterans. There will have to be absolute assurance of a convalescent-treatment program. The harrowing experience of men in the air forces, pilots, bombardiers, gunners, parachutists, etc., will need a kind of rehabilitation and convalescent program somewhat different from infantrymen or men of the Navy. All the wisdom and ingenuity of this country will have to be tapped. The experience of foreign governments will have to be considered.

Social adjustments bristle with difficulties. The handicapped will have to be trained for occupations to the end that there not develop again the panhandling, the peanut vending, the leaf raking, and the boondoggling which became such tragically familiar scenes. There will be the difficult adjustment of men who have returned from places so distant that even the land names are unfamiliar and those lads who have experienced ills and diseases we heretofore did not even know existed. In trying to plan for the future none of these must be forgotten.

Subject to certain limitations provision is made in the bill for loans to veterans up to $1,000, which will bear no interest the first year and 3 percent thereafter. Such money can be applied to the purchase or repair of residential property, land, machinery, businesses, and the like.

The bill calls for an effective job-counseling and employment placement service for veterans within the United States Employment Service.

It further calls for a readjustment allowance for each week of unemployment up to 52 weeks. Generally the allowance provided for is $15 per week, plus an additional $5 if there is 1 dependent, $8 if there are 2, and $10 if there are 3 or more dependents.

This, then, generally, is the G. I. bill of rights, which passed the Senate. True, it provides a partial answer to some of the questions that are being debated up and down G. I. fronts—in the Pacific, in England, in Italy, in the United States, in India; in short, wherever our American serviceman sits down to talk or think.

But what does he think about it? It is his future.

Is the bill really adequate? Education, training, hospitalization, loans, job counseling, unemployment insurance, these are well enough in their way, that is, they are excellent provisions if the jobs are to be had, if the economy is ready to absorb new business adventures, new agricultural enterprises. The bill provides for guides, but what if there is nothing to guide to? Of what avail is job counseling, if there is no job, or vocational training if the labor market is glutted, or the readiness to lend money to the veteran for a business venture, if the risk, at best, is a shaky one?

Again, talk will arise of bonuses. The word "bonus" in itself is a bad word. It implies a gratuity or something given for nothing. That is farthest from the truth. You could camouflage it with calling it "adjustment compensation" as we did in the last war. Whatever you call it, payment will have to be made. But ahead of the bonus must come jobs. The so-called bonus is a nice gesture, but definitely limited in character and hardly conducive to maintaining the morale of those whose most earnest desire will be to establish for themselves a suitable place in the new scheme of things.

There are already one and one quarter million discharged soldiers. The problem they present is not so great as that which will be presented when we have 10,000,000 so discharged. The rate of discharge is approximately 35,000 per month. In some communities there has already been felt the impact of this sudden return. But they do constitute a problem here and now, a problem in education, rehabilitation, hospitalization, economic and social adjustment.

We have all seen variations of the ad featuring a serviceman urging "Leave my country the way I left it, please." This caution has as many meanings as there are individuals for the service. To many soldiers, sailors, and marines, home sweet home was not a vine-covered cottage by the side of the road. It might have been a slum on a side street in some metropolis. Many never enjoyed the right of reasonable opportunity—never knew the dignity of a regular job. Many never knew the luxury of even a small-savings account to cushion the blow of a lay-off. Frequently, illness was their lot and economic hardship, their daily problem.

To these, then, it is our responsibility to insure a decent way of life—a home in improved surroundings, a job, world security. It must be a better world, after the blood, toil, and tears. General welfare must prove more than a blanket to toss over the unsightly sores of the body politic.

It's a threefold responsibility, that of management, labor, and government. The demand exists for consumers' goods, but demand without purchasing power does not create a market. In the reconversion from war to peace economy, the soldier has an important stake. Shall present controls be narrowed gradually or suddenly broken off altogether? These are questions we must soon solve for the soldier and ourselves.

However, the picture is not one of despair. Far from it. New industries are waiting to be born. Miracles of invention and discovery, accelerated by war, give promise of wider distribution among the people of the goods of this earth. There are tremendous savings in the hands of the people now in the form of War bonds and at the same time a dearth of civilian goods. This will be a pertinent factor in carrying over the precarious transition from wartime to peacetime pursuits. There are healthy signs everywhere of post-war planning councils, in management, in labor, in government. They are all intent upon preventing what happened after the last war as symbolized by the corner apple stand.

The United States Chamber of Commerce consumer survey states that 35,000,000 families had named one or more major purchases that they will make within 6 months after the war. About 1,540,000 families intend to build or buy new homes; 17,400,000 will acquire automobiles; 24 States and 150 cities with populations of 500,000 are planning some kind of public-works program.

Much of the problem will be solved with the return of prosperity and economic well-being to this land of ours. The demand for civilian goods will be tremendous. There will be a huge backlog of accumulated demand for our goods all over the world, especially where the good will has been developed by lend-lease aid. A vast merchant marine will take the productivity of our farms and factories to the ports of the seven seas. Individuals in this country now have $30,000,000,000 in savings. They are going to buy homes, refrigerators, radios, automobiles, television sets, new furniture, etc. The present economic vacuum that exists here and abroad relative to civilian goods must be filled and will be filled.

After every war history tells us, the tremendous demand for civilian goods causes a prosperity to descend upon the land. This, in turn, creates most of the jobs for G. I. Joe and G. I. Jim after demobilization day.

But that prosperity will not completely solve all difficulties. There will be many maladjustments, frustrations, conflicts, and disappointments. We must prepare the blue print now.

Thus, it is clearly your job and mine to leave no thought unexplored, to dismiss no idea merely because it is new and untried, to leap beyond our prejudices, to keep the mind receptive so that we shall not fail the serviceman as he has not failed us.

Poland Is Not Yet Lost

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. D. EMMERT BRUMBAUGH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, it is a happy privilege on the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the adoption of the Polish Constitution to join with over 5,000,000 American citizens of Polish descent in paying tribute to courageous Poland for her notable contribution to the cause of the Allies in the present titanic struggle against the barbaric forces who seek to extinguish the light of liberty troughout the civilized world.

The history of Poland is replete with sacrifices and a firm determination to exist as a peaceful and liberty-loving nation. From the tenth to the sixteenth century Poland experienced the transition from a vassal state to the full dignity of a kingdom. Destined to become an influential nation, the avarice and greed of the nobility who were the ruling class proved a serious detriment to the progress of the nation. Aided by a Constitution that was vicious and impractical, the nobility abused their power and although they represented about 5 percent of the total population of Poland the remaining 95 percent were powerless to express their will and, as a result, the nation was torn asunder and chaos and confusion prevailed.

During this dark period in the Nation's history, Count Joseph Pulaski, with his three sons and three other patriotic Poles, met on February 29, 1768, at the town of Bar where they signed a secret compact which is known as the famous Confederation of Bar. Bent on saving Poland from complete disintegration, Count Joseph Pulaski began the task of securing recruits and 8,000 Poles responded to the call. Count Casimir Pulaski, who was later to gain undying fame as a member of Washington's army in the fight for American independence, was then only 20 years of age and was placed in charge of a detachment of troops, in which position he distinguished himself by his valor and courage.

Due to the overwhelming superiority in number and armaments of the enemy, the Pulaski forces were finally forced to bow to defeat with the elder Pulaski dying in prison camp, his son, Francis, killed in battle, and Count Casimir Pulaski with 10 survivors seeking refuge in Hungary from where he later migrated to the United States to join Gen. George Washington and to become known as the father of the United States Cavalry through his ability to train troops based upon his military experience in fighting Poland's battle for freedom and liberty. Imbued with the burning zeal of a true patriot, Pulaski fought with the Continental Army and distinguished himself by his rare courage and marked ability of leadership. His colorful military career was ended at the Battle of Savannah when he gave his life in defense of our country.

America owes an undying debt of gratitude not alone to Gen. Casimir Pulaski but also to another great Polish patriot, Kosciuszko, whose statue adorns Lafayette Square near the White House and is a constant reminder of his sterling contribution to the American cause of freedom. General Washington was quick to appreciate the ability of Kosciuszko in training the Continental Army, and when the hard-earned victory was achieved this liberty-loving son of Poland returned to his native land with the assurance of this Nation's gratitude for the heroic services he rendered during that perilous period in our history.

The same spirit of sacrifice and intense love for freedom and liberty has burned in the hearts of patriotic Poles for many centuries. When Hitler began his march through Poland in September 1939, the honor of the nation was at stake, and motivated by the spirit of Pulaski and Kosciuszko the gallant Poles elected to defend their nation against the German aggressor. Hopelessly outnumbered they fought valiantly against the common enemy of mankind and their valiant resistance in the face of overwhelming odds proved a powerful influence and a lasting lesson of patriotic fervor to all nations.

Despite the subjugation of their homeland, the courageous Poles are fighting on with relentless fury. Their nation despoiled and millions of their fellow citizens murdered or placed in concentration camps, the flame of liberty and freedom still burns deeply in their hearts. Various forms of continued resistance to the Nazi hordes have given Hitler grave concern. Despite the enslavement of the Polish people, they continue to fight the oppressor by sabotage at every opportunity. Their dogged determination to oppose Hitler gave France and Great Britain precious weeks in which to mobilize their forces. The underground forces in Poland today are a source of constant worry and annoyance to the Nazi invaders and require a large number of German troops for patrol duty that could be used to advantage elsewhere, while remnants of the Polish Army, Navy, Air Force, and merchant marine are serving valiantly on all battle fronts and aiding the allies in their determination to free the civilized world from the throes of dictatorship.

It is a tragic truth that today Poland is in ruins, with her soil barren, her food confiscated, her people enslaved, her churches and convents desecrated, and institutions of learning abolished. But the invader in his lust for world domination has forgotten an age-old truth that the blood of a nation's martyrs is the seed from which springs the deliverance of free men everywhere.

For 5 years Constitution Day—the greatest national holiday in Poland—has been observed in the dark shadows of war. It is a day comparable to our own celebration of the Fourth of July and the Polish Constitution is but 4 years younger than our own priceless treasure—the Constitution of the United States.

The blood of over 2,000,000 Polish victims of German aggression has irrigated the soil of the small and peace-loving nation of Poland, while thousands of her valiant sons are fighting with the United Nations and many of them laying down their lives on the far-flung battle fronts.

The Polish anthem—"Poland is not yet lost" is echoed by every liberty-loving American on the anniversary of Polish Constitution Day. It is my fervent hope that the full and complete restoration of Poland as a nation will ever remain the aim and objective of not only the American people but of all of the United Nations.

In saluting the indomitable courage of the Polish people on their great national holiday, let us remember Poland's brave past, her tragic and heroic present and the brighter future in store for this courageous nation. In addition, let us add our prayers to the devout exhortations of a brave and unconquered nation, mindful that Poland whose stellar role in the present war has proved an inspiring spectacle and has earned the undying gratitude of freemen throughout the entire world.

Polish Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HARRY L. TOWE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. TOWE. Mr. Speaker, today is Poland's national holiday. It commemorates the signing on May 3, 1791 of the Polish Constitution, one of the world's great documents of freedom.

In Poland today lips will be sealed and church bells will be silent. The Nazis have temporarily destroyed the freedom which the people of Poland gained on this day 153 years ago. This set-back to Polish liberty is only temporary however. Soon the Nazis will be conquered, with the help of thousands of Polish Nationals, and the glorious traditions of Poland will once again be restored. Those of us who have been spared the atrocities of the Nazis salute the valiant and brave sons and daughters of Poland within and without their native land. We assure them that their fight has not been in vain. We pledge them that all in our power will be done to restore their territory and their sacred right to live again as free men and women.

Polish Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, it is most fitting that we who enjoy the liberties, the freedoms, the opportunities that this great land of ours offers, should pay tribute and honor to the valiant people of Poland. We should properly recognize the great contribution to the cause of freedom and the democratic way of life that was embodied in the historic document adopted by the Diet of Poland on May 3, 1791. The principle of that doctrine, namely, "all power in civil society is derived from the will of the people," was 2 years previously adopted by our Constitution. The Constitution of Poland, like our Declaration of Independence and our Constitution, recognized that all men are created equal and that each is endowed by his Creator with the inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The Polish people not only believed in freedom for their fellow Poles, but also for their fellow men. No complete history of the United States fails to record the exploits of brilliant Polish men who came to this country to fight against tyranny, and to help our land gain the freedom in which they so steadfastly believed.

Unfortunately, the freedoms and liberties in which they believed and for which they fought, not only for themselves, but for others, were difficult to maintain for themselves. Though they became embroiled in many wars, the Polish people pressed forward in their quest for freedom. Only a few years ago, the clouds of war gathered over them. They were firmly convinced of the righteousness of the principles of their Constitution, and determined to uphold them. Rather than to compromise these principles, they stood heroically and fought bravely against the forces of aggression. Their material resources were, in many instances, reduced to shambles. Their material losses were insignificant compared to the loss of life, and to the untold mental and physical sufferings that were inflicted upon them. Anguish and agony were endured because the doctrines of their Constitution were not empty words, but rather were principles that were inculcated into their minds and hearts to such a degree that those principles meant more to them than life itself.

While the forces of the United Nations strive for victory—a victory in which Poland is taking its noble part, the principles of the Atlantic Charter, of the "four freedoms," of the Teheran Declaration, should ever remain a vital force in the world, and brave Poland should again take its well deserved and proper place among the nations of the world.

One Hundred and Fifty-third Anniversary of Adoption of the Polish Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE E. HANCOCK
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, today the Polish people are commemorating an event of great historic significance. It is the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the adoption of the Polish Constitution, a liberal document recognizing the rights of the common people and dedicated to the same principles of freedom which inspired our American forefathers.

We in America have been a happy and prosperous nation under our charter of liberties. Poland has suffered dismemberment and persecution. Free people everywhere admire the steadfastness of the Polish people in keeping the ideals of democratic principles alive and vibrant during 123 years of national extinction and they rejoiced when Poland again took her honorable place in the family of nations after the last World War, largely, we like to think, because of the power and influence of the American people at the peace conference.

In 1939, Hitler, with ruthless and barbaric savagery and with overwhelming military strength, occupied Poland. He conquered territory, but not the indomitable spirit of the Polish people. Despite murder, starvation, enslavement, and indescribable suffering, there has been no appeasement, no surrender. The Polish people fight on for their rightful place in the sun, and it is with deep satisfaction that we realize American boys of all ancestries fight with them.

Governor Dewey, of New York, issued a proclamation a few days ago. I include it as a part of my remarks. It expresses my thoughts and sentiments on this historic occasion.

PROCLAMATION

STATE OF NEW YORK,
Executive Chamber, Albany.

For almost 6 years the people of Poland have suffered an appalling matyrdom under the heel of the Nazis. When their country was invaded they resisted against overwhelming odds, with a valor which has compelled the admiration and respect of the entire civilized world.

As part of the United Nations, the fighting men of Poland have fought with their traditional bravery and military skill in the same cause as the armed forces of the United States. On the home front men and women of Polish origin are working hard and making great sacrifices to support the war effort of our country.

On May 3 the Polish people will commemorate a notable event in their history, the adoption of a liberal constitution in 1791. In consideration of all these facts it is fitting that we should join our fellow Americans of Polish blood in doing honor to the great traditions of the people of Poland.

Now, therefore, I, Thomas E. Dewey, Governor of the State of New York, hereby proclaim May 3 as Poland Day, and I urge all the citizens of New York State to display the flag of Poland side by side with our own national emblem to show our sympathy and comradeship.

Given under my hand and the privy seal of the State at the capitol in the city of Albany this 14th day of April A. D. 1944.

By the Governor:

PAUL E. LOCKWOOD,
Secretary to the Governor.

What 3d of May Means to Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER G. ANDREWS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I know of no written or spoken word which more clearly commemorates the significance of this day in Poland's history and the militant spirit of a truly great people than the following statement:

WHAT "THIRD OF MAY" MEANS TO POLAND

(By Joseph P. Junosza, Director, Polish Government Information Center)

Poles the world over are celebrating their national holiday, the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the 3d of May Constitution that marked their nation's spiritual rebirth. Since 1939, for close on 5 years, Poland has observed her national holiday under the yoke of foreign aggression that has utterly failed to crush her free spirit.

When, in 1791, the Polish Diet adopted the 3d of May Constitution, it was the most democratic in Europe. Anglo-Saxon liberal thought and British political custom inspired its framers, proof of the spiritual ties Poland had with the most advanced nations of the west. This democratic relationship, rooted in the traditional tolerance of the Polish people, endured through the tragic years of Poland's bondage and became an inspiration for future generations of Poles. These ties are still alive and can never be broken.

The 3d of May Constitution brought about a great reform, peaceful in method, revolutionary in effect, and carried out according to law. Its purpose was to preserve the existing regime by improving it, to concentrate the moral forces of the nation, and draw the people into the task of building up Poland's national strength. What better national day could we celebrate?

The constitution, saturated with the spirit of well-ordered freedom and tolerance, with respect for the rights of man, overthrew foreign domination striking at the very core of Poland's existence and independence.

Poland will always fight tyranny and immoral international agreements. Poland will always support every lawful expression of international morality, such as the Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms" and demand that they be strictly adhered to and implemented.

Closely linked with the defense of law, freedom, and morality in international affairs, is the question of Poland's independence.

In defense of Poland's freedom and independence, all Poles are united and of a single mind. Nothing can loosen the close unity of the government and the people. It is impossible to detach the underground movement from the Polish Government in London, the only lawful and constitutional government. All attempts to impose upon Poland a government or a regime from outside, to meddle in her internal affairs—political or social—to violate her territorial integrity, or to control her foreign policy, will always and everywhere meet with unanimous resistance from the government and people of Poland, at home and abroad.

Poland's gallant and unswerving fight against German aggression, Poland's immaculate moral and ideological record, give her the undenible right to full justice, and to compensation for the incredible sacrifices made by the Polish people in their fight for world freedom.

The Poles were the first to fight the Germans. Poland has produced no Quisling. The sacrifices of the Polish Nation are greater than those of any of her allies. More than one-tenth of the entire Polish Nation have laid down their lives in the fight for freedom.

Our immediate aim is victory over the Germans, a victory that will free Europe and the whole world from any new aggression. Poland will demand material guaranties against any new German attack. Poland will demand strict adherence to articles 6 and 8 of the Atlantic Charter, which provide for a system of collective security and for permanent disarmament, as well as for rendering harmless states that are a potential threat to peace.

In reborn Poland, the complete unanimity existing between the Government and the people will find immediate expression in far-reaching political and social reforms, which, however, like the great reform of the 3d of May will not be imposed by force, but enacted by a free parliament elected by democratic universal suffrage. These reforms will seek first of all to raise the standard of living and productive strength of Poland to the level of the western democracies, and to improve the lot of the working classes which—as the 3d of May constitution said—are the best part of any nation. The declaration of policy of the Polish Government in London—a government of national unity—issued on February 24, 1942, rejecting all dictatorship, emphasizing devotion to democratic principles, guaranteeing equal rights to all minorities, promising full employment at fair wages, also provided for the completion of agrarian reform to increase in Poland the number of medium-size homesteads. Poland believes in the victory of right over might, justice over violence, and the reign of freedom in this world. Poland in a spirit of democracy looks to the world for the realization of her hopes, for Poland is really a test case. Without justice to Poland, there can be no better world.

Polish Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, today, as we mark the anniversary of the adoption of a constitution in Poland in 1791, I should like to express the hope of every one of us, I am sure, that Poland and Polish people may once more enjoy the liberty and freedom for which they have dared so much and endured so much. As we enter upon the days of our own greatest trials and final victory, it should not be forgotten that we are also charged with a great mission to restore the imprisoned and oppressed peoples of Europe who have already paid so dearly for their share in the triumph and in the better world to follow.

Freedom Through Free Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House, I am herewith, including as a part of the RECORD, an interesting and informative address delivered in this city late in April by Clarence K. Streit, author of Union Now and proponent of a proposed pattern of international cooperation called Federal Union.

Whether you agree with Mr. Streit's proposals as many do or whether, like me, you remain open-minded as to the optimum method to be used by the United States in making its influence felt for good in the post-war world, I believe you will find considerable food for thought in the accompanying address by Mr. Streit. His reasoning is the more challenging because it has the virtue of leading to specific suggestions and I am sure that it is the fervent hope of many Americans today that more and more we can replace the glittering phrases descriptive of general goals by definite proposals as to possible policies to be pursued in approaching the objectives which are so universally desired.

It is only as we get down to procedures and policies that we can really discover the size and scope of the area of agreement existing in the world today as to what can be done and what should be done to provide for a permanent peace and an orderly and prospering world in which a fair chance for a free people may become the right of the many instead of the privilege of a select few.

I do not know how to express my appreciation of the honor you have heaped upon me; it touches me too deeply. I feel the need of support, and when I really need support I always turn to my wife here. We have been a team now, and loved it, longer than either of us have lived alone.

My wife is French, you know, and I can express best in French how much I owe to her. The French have a word for it that we lack, or rather don't use any longer. I mean the second person singular. The French say vous to all the world as we say you, but in the family they use the more intimate tu and toi, our thou and thee, without the religious significance that has almost monopolized that form of address in English.

The first book I ever got published I dedicated to my wife. The dedication was in French, and one critic said it was the best thing in the book. It was simply this: Pas sans toi Jeanne Defrance. (Not without thee, Jeanne Defrance.) And that's the way I feel about her tonight.

I would try, next, to thank those of you who, like my friend Governor Landon, do not agree with me in favoring union now—what am I saying?—who do not yet agree with me in favoring union. I honor highly the friendship of these men who carry the principle of free discussion to such a height, who not only agree with—was it Pitt?—that if the opposition did not exist it would have to be created, but join in honoring the opposition with a dinner.

I think they embody one of the highest American traditions, I confess I hope that they will end by following the example of one of the greatest of our neglected heroes. I mean Melancton Smith, the chief orator of the majority opposing Federal Union when the Constitution was up for ratification in New York State in 1788. When he finally became convinced—partly by the urbane logic of Hamilton and partly by the harsh logic of events—that he was on the wrong side, this remarkable Mr. Smith went over to the other side and brought with him enough others to give the Constitution a majority of three votes, enough to ratify it * * * for luckily the Constitution did not have to pass the Senate to go into force.

If my opposition friends who have done me so much honor tonight do not follow Melancton Smith's road, they are still in the great line that Peter Porcupine embellished. Peter Porcupine—his real name was William Cobbett—was, as his pseudonym implies, the sharpest-quilled of the British pamphleteers opposed to Tom Paine. But when Paine died in America, neglected by the people whose independence he had been the first to champion, Peter Porcupine so resented this indifference that he had the remains of Tom Paine dug up and brought back to an honorable tomb in England, to rest among the Englishmen whose Empire he had cut in two, but whose rights as men he had so immeasurably advanced. It seems to me this should encourage us all to look on our opposition with a more mellow eye. After all, without opposition none of us could discuss anything at all, and freedom of speech would be an empty right.

But though I am a great believer in thinking things out and discussing them freely, I must say that my primary aim has never been simply to stimulate thought and discussion. I am for them as the best means to sound action, but I would never divorce them from action, timely action. And so I hope you will pardon me if I express even warmer appreciation, if possible, to all those friends of mine who have agreed with me enough to work for Union Now. I wish I could thank each in person, or at least those whose devotion has touched me most, but there are too many of you. It is your unrecognized work that has brought me here and given the union idea what strength and life it has.

No matter what power a book may seem to have, no matter how much thought it may stimulate, its power is dissipated and lost unless some of its readers band themselves together to achieve its ends, and thus provide the only democratic means of achieving them, as these friends of mine have done in Federal Union organization (some of them, such as Howard Ford and Brice Toole there, continuously now for 4 or 5 years), and in the Student Federalists.

I know that many of these friends of mine agree with me only on balance. And I honor them the more for working for a program that is perhaps only 60 percent, or even only 51 percent, to their liking, and working as devotedly as though they approved it 100 percent. They are playing anew the part of Alexander Hamilton, who, though many of his ideas were rejected by the Convention, championed the Constitution as ardently as if it were his own creation.

It is true that 51-percent swings the balance against 49 as decisively as does 100 percent against 0, but it takes a high type of citizenship to champion the reality of 51 percent right as firmly as the fanatical followers of dictators and demagogues champion the illusion of 100-percent perfection.

I confess I feel deeply on this problem of translating thought into action. It is the great problem of democracy in general and of our Republic in particular. For the wise checks and balances which our Constitution contains give a greater guarantee of free discussion than do other systems, but this greater freedom to find fault, and this greater difficulty to act, combine to expose us to the grave danger of too much thought and too little action.

"And thus the native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought,
And enterprises of great pith and moment
With this regard their currents turn awry,
And lose the name of action."

By its very nature our Republic is always in much more immediate danger from its Hamlets than its Caesars; the dictator can rise only after prolonged indecision has delivered us to anarchy.

We Americans, it seems to me, have gone much farther than we realize on the road to anarchy. We say we are fighting in this war for freedom, period. Well, to advocate freedom without government is to advocate ungoverned freedom, or anarchy. We always stood before for freedom through free government, or for free government as the way to freedom, for the combination of these two that Webster phrased so well when he said: "Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable."

In our first great war we Americans fought behind the great declaration that proclaimed that all men equally have certain inalienable rights and that "to secure these rights governments are instituted among men," and that "when any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government." How far we have wandered from that inspiring realism.

We were even more clear-headed in the Constitution when we announced that "We the people * * * in order to form a more perfect Union * * * and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity do ordain and establish this Constitution."

The issue in our next great war was to advance freedom by preserving the Union or, as Lincoln phrased it at Gettysburg, in the great language that is the hallmark of the true American tradition, "that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

Then Woodrow Wilson led us into our third great war * * * "for the things"—as he put it—"which we have always carried nearest our hearts, for democracy * * * for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free." Confusion had already put the accent on the rights of nations instead of the rights of men, on "dominions" and "concerts of free peoples" instead of on government, and union. Even so, President Wilson never treated freedom as a thing that could be divorced from human organization, never made the mistake of letting the people perish from lack of vision of the inseparable relation of freedom and government.

That mistake was never made in all our great wars until the present one. This time we have gone to war for freedom, indeed, for "four freedoms," but the leader who put the greatest accent on freedom has passed mutely over the primary American principle, that freedom can be had only by instituting free government. There is no hint of this principle in the Atlantic Charter or in the Declaration of the United Nations or in the Teheran communique.

The wishful tongue may find some taste of it in the statements of Secretary Hull, or in the Connally and Fulbright resolutions, but how their formulas suffer from the confusion of national sovereignty with human sovereignty which frustrated Woodrow Wilson. How much weaker are these formulas than his league, which failed because it was too feeble, because it did not form a government but what Alexander Hamilton called a political monster—a collectivity of governments.

The best that our leaders have yet given us—how blurred or blind it is compared to the vision in the Gettysburg address, the Constitution's preamble, the declaration of 1776—the clear vision of "liberty and union, now and forever, one and inseparable."

For lack of this vision the people perish, and, first of all, our sons. We stand on the brink of the most difficult and dangerous of military enterprises—the invasion of Europe. We stand with millions of men armed with billions of dollars of material weapons, but not armed with the most powerful force on earth—a great idea capable of arousing fresh hope and faith and enthusiasm among the people. There has not been and there cannot be enthusiasm anywhere for reviving the big-power system of the quadruple alliance, the holy alliance. There has not been and there cannot be any enthusiasm for restoring national sovereignty or for a redictated Versailles treaty or a reconditioned League of Nations. The idea that freedom can be had without government has not aroused and cannot arouse faith or hope; the people know, as do their leaders, that ungoverned freedom is only anarchy in sheep's clothing.

The old American idea, the idea of freedom through free government, of liberty and union, now and forever, one and inseparable, that idea has never failed to rouse hope and faith and enthusiasm. Look at the support the great principles of the declaration drew us from Europe when the Colonies had no material power, nothing but an idea. Look at the way this idea undermined George III even at home. Consider, too, how the confused Wilsonian dilution of this idea of freedom through union fired our men and weakened the enemy, and brought victory sooner, and saved so many lives in 1918.

Now, for the first time in our history we are sending our sons to battle unarmed with a powerful idea, unarmed with the great idea that made America powerful, unarmed with the moral force that could save so many lives.

Who is responsible for this tragedy?

The President has a heavy responsibility for it. He has shouldered the responsibility for arming us on the material side and discharged that responsibility better, I believe, than any President ever did. But whereas the President can delegate his authority on the material side, he cannot delegate it on the moral side. This moral responsibility came first with Wilson and with Lincoln, and I wish the President had followed their great example. I pray he still may do so.

The candidates for his high office have their responsibility, too, for the country's lack of moral preparation, lack of bold, honest, straightforward leadership in the highest American tradition, for the neglect in this crisis of our primary principle of freedom through free government.

The Members of Congress, too, have their responsibility for this neglect. For 20 years the standing excuse for not trying to extend this basic principle beyond our shores has been that "you can't get it through Congress." Had the Executive defaulted on the material instead of on the moral side, had the boys been sent to invade Europe, armed only with a great idea, would Congress have merely washed its hands? A Congress that could override the President on the tax bill could have assumed the moral leadership that he neglected, instead of passing milk-and-water resolutions on world organization.

After all, the first great enunciation of the American principle of freedom through free government did not come from any President or from any single leader; it came from Congress itself in the Declaration of 1776. Before there was a White House, there was Congress; it has never lost the right to lead; and from the Senate itself first came the great formula, "Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable."

But before there was the Congress, there was the people. It was the people, acting in informal committees outside the regular machinery of government, who established the governments of the 13 States and the Congress. And it was again the people, acting through special conventions outside the regular governmental machinery, who established the Constitution, not only proclaimed therein the principle of freedom through free government, but set up the first Federal Union, the only form of interstate government that ever solved the problem we face today.

That first generation carefully secured the right of every succeeding American generation to be as great as they were. They expected us not to do less than they, but more. Since we have never lost the rights they had, it is no use our trying now to put on the President and Congress all the blame for our failure to arm our sons with the most powerful of principles. We the people, who made the Congress, and the Presidency, and the Constitution, have the ultimate responsibility for the tragic fact that our sons must now dash their lives against the walls of Europe without a single attempt to save them or to help them by first trumpeting forth a call that could shatter those walls as the walls of Pericho were shattered, the old American call of "Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable."

It is no use our saying, "I'm only one individual in 130,000,000; what's the use—I'll never get the others to do what they should do." To make that excuse is worse than useless, for it is to deny the basic principle of this Republic—that "all men are created equal," equal in their right to freedom, equal in their responsibility for the Union of the free through which freedom comes.

The deep distinctive thing about our Republic is that it did not hitch its hopes—as so many regimes did before and do today—on great material power, but on great moral principles, not on the men in power, not on hereditary kings and lords, not on passing Presidents and plutocrats, not on fuehrers and dictators and members of a self-perpetuating ruling party, but on the least of men, on the humblest citizen—and on the only unmaterial, intangible thing in him, on his conscience.

The hopes of our Republic have never been hitched before our time on combining the greatest armed powers, on bringing heads of states together in a clubby threesome or a foursome, and leaving everything to them, but bread and circuses. The hopes of our Republic have always been centered on uniting the common garden variety of citizen, the man with the hoe—on uniting the humble, man to man, equally and freely, first by the millions and then by the tens of millions and later * * * now * * * by hundreds of millions, and eventually by billions.

The hopes of our Republic have always been centered before our time on uniting more and more of these microscopic, invisible drops of conscience which the Almighty gave equally to every individual of our species, uniting them in a Niagara of ever greater majesty, and beauty, and power for good. So it has been for generations, and so it must be now or we shall have a river of drops of blood, flooding devastation through the Valley of the Shadow.

You have been kind enough to make this a personal dinner, and I have told you now what I personally believe from the bottom of my heart, for what less could I say in thanking you? Perhaps you will not mind if I conclude with a little personal experience which brought light to me on the whole problem we face today and taught me unforgettably that no community can live without conscience, and that the more directly we hitch the community to the conscience of the humblest, the safer and happier and freer we shall be.

The unforgettable experience I would tell you about came when I was in the Army, going over on a transport, the Saxonia, in 1917.

The transport was jammed deep in the hold with my regiment, the Eighteenth Engineers Railway. The hold was divided in sections as protection against torpedoes, mines, and fire. Bulkhead doors connected these sections. To improve the ventilation they were left open, under guard.

One night, I was stationed on guard duty at one of them, at the foot of a gangway. On either side I could see nothing but sleeping soldiers, in narrow bunks two tiers high. My orders were to close that bulkhead door instantly in case of explosion or fire on either side, and shoot to kill if necessary to maintain order on the other side, so that all the men on that side, at least, might get up the gangway.

I was only 21 and had never faced such a responsibility. One can think very far in a couple of hours, standing guard alone among hundreds of sleeping men, below the waterline, with only the hull over there between them and lurking death, standing with a loaded rifle and nothing to do but wait for God knows what, and ponder.

These men around me were not enemies. They were my own outfit. There was Dick Jones, Bud Martin, McWilliams, all asleep. And if anything happened on their side, I had to slam the door against them, condemn them all, perhaps, to death, and maybe shoot some of these fellows on the other side. And if I faltered, failed, I would be condemning even more men to death. They were all sleeping in an implicit faith not only in their own lucky star but in the guard—in me. They didn't know who was standing at the bulkhead door, but every man on board was counting on the guard doing his duty at the showdown, counting on me.

I still wonder whether I would have been man enough to meet that test. I thank God I never had to meet it, but that I was forced to think it through.

For it taught me many things. It taught me there are situations when men must dispose of the lives of others, even kill the innocent. Where they inflict the most suffering and death by doing nothing, by indecision and inaction. Where they can hope to save life only by prompt and drastic action, life-taking action.

If I stayed at my post and did my duty, who would know, I wondered. Who but I? And I would probably go down with the ship and be forgotten. We might all go down no matter what I did.

Why not drop the rifle if we were hit, leave the bulkhead door, slip up the gankway in the jam, get in a lifeboat? Who would remember me at such a time, in such confusion? The officer of the guard might not even live. The records would go down with the ship. How could anyone trace any responsibility to me? If I quit my post and ran, who would know? Who but I?

I was not the colonel, not the captain. I was just one buck private, one insignificant individual in the thousands on this ship, in the millions in the war. Who was I to think the universe depended on my doing this or that? What difference would it make in the end what I did? Either way no one would know but I—no one but I and a spirit in me whose good opinion I respected most.

And so it came home to me that a man is never really alone, that he has within him an all-knowing, ever-present companion who stands guard over him, for him and for other men. A guard who never leaves that bulkhead door deep in every man. A force that holds him fast when all men sleep and nature tempts. A friend who loves him most, yet can destroy him to save men he does not even know. A conscience that will not let him live ignobly, and die in peace. A soul for whom he, and all mankind, can thank God the most.

There I began to learn that Shakespeare was right when he told how the pale cast of thought can sickly o'er the native hue of resolution until it destroys action, but that Shakespeare was wrong when he said that "Conscience doth make cowards of us all." Conscience never made any man afraid to do anything, except the thing that does not become a man.

There in the hold of the transport Saxonia I was taught that our species does really depend on the soul of individual man, at every danger point, that conscience is the creator and the maintainer of organized human society, and the greatest power we have.

There I began to appreciate, too, how deeply our daily personal security and liberty depend on individuals who are prepared to do more than risk their lives. And I began to see that whereas men need risk only their own lives to confer on men the benefits of scientific discovery and engineering invention, they must pay more dearly for the peace and freedom that political science seeks to provide. For to have peace and freedom men must have government, law and order and justice, and to have these they must have judges and policemen, and agents of all kinds from President to sentinel who are prepared not only to risk their lives, but also to take the lives of others, for the general good, if that horrible need should face them.

If we must pay in this coin to maintain government, we must also pay in it to establish government where it does not yet exist. Whether we are establishing government between tribes, states, or nations, the process is the same, the basic unit is still individual man; the government, to be effective, must operate on him individually, by him and for him, and the more directly it depends upon him, and upon his conscience, the more realistic and effective it will be.

If we cannot now escape the mass slaughter of war, we can still seek to lessen that slaughter and make it result in the establishment of a government that will save men from having to go through this again. And if we are to succeed in that great undertaking, we must be practical and begin where we are, it seems to me, and preserve the governments that now respect human life and liberty and the conscience of the humble, strengthen them by uniting all their citizens man to man and conscience to conscience behind this common principle, and seek steadily to extend the number of human beings governed by it.

Idealistic? When a man confronts his God he is facing the ideal. He has nothing left but the ideal. Only the ideal is realistic then.

In conclusion I have only this to say: Peace is a personal thing, and it must be founded on individual persons, not on nations. Freedom is a personal thing. It is a right of individual persons, not of their governments. Union is a personal thing. It is a government of, by, and for individual persons, not a collection of collectivities. And the greatest hope we have today to advance these ancient aspirations is that this war is not what we pretend it is, an impersonal drama played by collective nouns—nations, armies, task forces, assembly lines—but a thing that keeps facing each of us, and all of us together, with the most personal mysteries of life and death.

This war has forced millions of our young to grapple with the problems we let them think they could safely leave to preachers. It has multiplied Job by the million, put him in uniform instead of sackcloth, and left him facing the mightiest of mysteries.

War is no less personal to the woman in love; nor to the one whose name is called first from the cradle and most often after the battle. Job can be a woman, too.

No, this war is not less personal when one is far from action, waiting, waiting, in the lonely dread that broken even the mighty warrior who slew Goliath. And if we choose to assault the walls of Europe now without the trumpet blast of freedom through free government, how many hearts will echo the vain lament of David: "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son!"

They are not dying for us, my friends, they are dying for our mistakes; for our lack of faith, hope, charity, courage, vision, for our failure to think things through and act in time.

The least that we can do is to live henceforth for them, live determined to bring now from all this suffering the great good that conscience bids us each to bring.

A Tribute to Polish People Everywhere on Polish Constitution Day

OF

HON. ROBERT L. RODGERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. RODGERS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, as we observe the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the adoption of the Polish Constitution on May 3, 1791, thoughts of liberty-loving people everywhere turn once again to the brave people of Poland with their indomitable spirit. It is with a sense of humble pride that I join today in honoring the Poles throughout the world in tribute to a nation that will never die, be it crushed and ground beneath the heel of the vilest oppressor.

Five million Americans of Polish origin know the depth of pride which comes from noble descent. Theirs is a history of the truest faithfulness to ideals. The freedom that burned in the hearts of Polish heroes helped to establish the United States of America. Poles everywhere have fought for universal liberty—not for themselves alone, but for all.

Who is there who does not recall the heartening aid of Pulaski and Kosciuszko to the struggling American Colonies at a time when the only hope of reward lay in the principles they defended so magnificently? Count Pulaski, at the age of 25 the acknowledged leader and hero of his own countrymen, commended to General Washington by Benjamin Franklin as "an officer famous throughout Europe for his bravery and conduct in defense of the liberties of his country against the three great invading powers of Russia, Austria, and Prussia," came to America at the age of 29 to aid in the American cause. Not even waiting for the Congress to act upon his commission, the distinguished Polish officer joined the ranks of Washington's army as it marched through the streets of Philadelphia, a humble private in the ranks. Within 2 months after his arrival, the Congress on September 15, 1777, had elected him "commander of the horse with the rank of brigadier." Already he had performed in brilliant fashion in the defense of the city of Philadelphia. During the following March, Count Pulaski obtained permission to organize his own independent corps, later to be famous throughout the Colonies as the Polish Legion. Pulaski himself was acknowledged as the most expert horseman in the American cavalry. His leadership was such that it is entirely possible to envisage defeat for the American cause without his invaluable contribution. He died a patriot's death at the age of 31, wounded on the field of battle.

Kosciuszko, another great Polish leader who came to America to fight for 6 years with the Continental Army and become one of the greatest heroes of the Revolutionary War, bears a name familiar to every proud American of Polish descent. Washington recognized his abilty immediately and appointed him aide on his own staff. Soon he was commissioned Chief Engineer in the Colonial Army with the rank of colonel, carrying a modest pay of $60 a month. He was a young man of 30 at the time. His subsequent record as builder of splendid fortifications against Burgoyne established him as one of the truly great leaders of the war. The present site of the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., owes it choice in large part to the recommendation of Kosciuszko.

In the city of Washington statues have been raised to commemorate the contributions of these two great Polish heroes who helped to establish American freedom. They were not the only Poles who came to this country to fight for her liberty; dozens of others stood our among the leaders of the Revolution. But their spirit was the spirit of those who followed the lead of the American Colonies and fashioned for Poland the first written constitution on the continent of Europe.

If not in all, then at least in many ways, the Polish Constitution resembled the American Constitution. It acknowledged the principle that "all power in civil society is derived from the will of the people." It accepted the doctrine of religious toleration. It adopted the system of separation of powers into the executive, legislative, and judicial branches. It was not so revolutionary as the American Constitution, but it was a far step forward in European history. It established a hereditary monarchy where the king was the servant of the people. It was the forerunner of later European constitutions which had to be fought for, but the Polish Constitution was different, in that it was established without recourse to bloody upheaval.

The history of the Poles is brilliant with sacrifice to the cause of liberty. Through every fight for freedom, the sons of Poland have come forth in proportion and spirit that far outrank the size of the nation. A free land from 1918 to 1939 when her people were the first to resist the war-mad Axis dogs, Poland will rise again to resume her birthright of liberty.

Not alone in the respect of the democratic world is she held for her deep traditional will to fight for freedom, but even greater perhaps are her people admired for their peaceful industry, their steady application to the doctrine of neighborly living.

Five million loyal Americans of Polish extraction—quiet, hard-working citizens devoted to highest principles of living in war and peace alike—will live to see their homeland freed again from the yoke of Axis barbarism. The spirit of the Poles who helped to free America a century and a half ago is the spirit of those who will free the world today from Axis aggression. This Nation is proud of her citizens who bear the name of Poland.

Also, I wish to pay tribute to the many thousands of Polish people and those of Polish descent who reside in my congressional district. They have successfully entered into all industrial, business, and professional life and have contributed greatly to the upbuilding of the communities in which they reside.

I considered it an honor last year to nominate one of their sons, from the city of Erie, Peter C. Kochis, 518 East Avenue, as a candidate for the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis. He successfully passed the requirements of the entrance board and is proving himself a worthy midshipman. I fell safe to predict that in the years to come he will distinguish himself as an officer in the United States Navy.

The Polish Constitution

OF

HON. EVAN HOWELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, today, May 3, is the anniversary of the Constitution of Poland, which was adopted on May 3, 1791.

This constitution, which was adopted unanimously, provided liberty and equal rights for all men, and through its adoption, Poland was able to accomplish by peaceful means what other nations were required to purchase by death and bloodshed.

In the words of the membership of the Springfield (Ill.) community of the Polish National Alliance:

In these critical times, when not only Poland but the whole world is fighting against the dark forces of oppression and totalitarism, it is fitting that this date be commemorated by us in the United States.

I give my whole-hearted support to this timely suggestion, because the heroic Poles, always ready to support the cause of democracies, in World War II were the first to stand against the enemies of freedom. Again they followed their motto: "for your freedom and ours."

As Americans, it is our duty to remember an ally who would rather die than surrender, despite insurmountable obstacles.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, Poland is a symbol of freedom and liberty to all liberty-loving people throughout the world. Poland chose to maintain her honor by resistance rather than live in subjugation by a policy of appeasement. Poland refused to compromise with treachery and barbarism. In the ruthless onslaught of the powerful Nazi juggernaut, industries and railroads were destroyed, dams bombed, homes, churches, and institutions shattered, and thousands of men, women, and children maimed and killed—but the spirit of Poland lives on. As President Franklin D. Roosevelt recently said:

> The heroic and determined manner in which the Polish people have struggled and sacrificed in the face of tremendous hardships and deprivations has been an inspiration not only to the people of the United States but to liberty-loving people everywhere.

Today Poles the world over are celebrating their one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the 3d of May constitution that marked Poland's spiritual rebirth. Since 1939—nearly 5 years—Poland has observed her national holiday under the yoke of foreign aggression that has utterly failed to crush her free spirit.

When in 1791 the Polish Diet adopted the 3d of May constitution it was the most democratic in Europe. Anglo-Saxon liberal thought and British political custom inspired its framers—proof of the spiritual ties Poland had with the most advanced nations of the west. This democratic relationship, rooted in the traditional tolerance of the Polish people, endured through the tragic years of Poland's bondage and became an inspiration for future generations of Poles. Those ties are still alive and can never be broken.

No better commentary on the principles of the Polish Constitution of the 3d of May can be given than in the eloquent words of Burke, the great English statesman and orator:

We have seen anarchy and servitude at once removed; a throne strengthened for the protection of the people without trenching on their liberties * * * not one man incurred loss or suffered degradation. All, from the king to the day laborer, were improved in their condition. Everything was kept in its place and order, but in that place and order everything was bettered. To add to this happy wonder, this unheard of conjunction of wisdom and fortune—not one drop of blood was spilled; no treachery; no outrage; no system of slander more cruel than the sword; no studied insults on religion, morals, or manners; no spaces; no confiscation; no citizen beggared; none imprisoned; none exiled; all of the people, by the people, and for the people.

That was the document praised throughout the world.

A. Pogadin, outstanding professor and historian at Kharkov University, 1911, had this to say of the May 3 constitution:

Poland's best sons fought to save their country. The constitution of the 3d of May, 1791, created an order of things guaranteeing the rebirth of Poland. Had these reforms been put into effect, Poland would have become a sufficiently strong state. But her neighbors did not permit the Polish commonwealth to strengthen itself in this way. Russia and Prussia, but recently enemies, clasped hands across Poland. The constitution supporters guarded by their ardent desire to save their country, knew they were subscribing to it "in an hour fraught with danger to the commonwealth."

From that day to this the spirit of Poland is the same. Polish sons have fought and died for liberty and freedom.

Kosciuszko and Pulaski, great Polish military leaders, led Polish troops in the Revolution side by side with Washington to help establish this great country of ours.

Thousands of Polish sons fought in World War No. 1 to crush German imperialism.

Today we find millions of Poles here and abroad fighting and dying for the same principles, democracy and freedom.

The Poles will never forget the 3d of May constitution. German treachery will not permit them to forget, and while Poland itself is under German yoke and somewhat broken, I heartily agree with the famous utterance of that great Polish leader, the late Ignatz Paderewski, loved by all America, when he said "Polska powstanie"—Poland will live.

One Hundred and Fifty-third Anniversary of Adoption of Polish Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. W. (RUNT) BISHOP

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, today the Polish Nation throughout the world is celebrating the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the enactment of Poland's Constitution—the establishment of the first constitutional form of government on the continent of Europe.

Poland—our ally—the first European country to take up arms against our common enemy, will be silent today. May the words of this House ring a glowing tribute to that heroic nation.

Aftermath of the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 4 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "What Happens After the War," by Mr. Chester Bowles, Price Administrator. The address has been published by the International Latex Corporation, Dover, Del., as a public service. In my opinion the address is well worthy of publication.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT HAPPENS AFTER THE WAR?

(By Chester Bowles, Price Administrator)

Today our industrial production stands 125 percent above the levels of 1939. Today our farm production stands at the highest levels of history. Today jobs go begging and anyone can sell anything that he can produce.

But let's not forget that this unprecedented level of business activity is built directly upon war demand, for directly or indirectly Government is now providing half the jobs and half the pay rolls of the country.

When the war is over and when our huge war expenditures disappear, what happens then? Will there be a market for all the goods we can produce? Will there be a job then for everybody who seeks one? Will we sustain the present high level of production, employment, and national income in building an economy of abundance? Or will we again return to the unemployment, the artificial scarcities, and the low standard of living which plagued so many millions of our citizens before the war broke out?

No one man or any group of men can begin to have all the answers. But we know it will take expert management and a firm hand to bring us through the reconversion period with a whole skin. War contract termination settlements will have to be made, and they will have to be made on a basis of fairness and speed. Millions of war workers will have to be placed in new jobs. Millions more will be returning from the armed services.

These adjustments will all be difficult. But no one should doubt our ability to make them successfully provided that the national buying power can be sustained and markets found for all the goods we can produce. Can we find these markets? I think the answer is "yes."

The demands of a vigorous, expanding America can fill the void that will be left when Government war expenditures are tapered off. They can keep our economy running indefinitely at peak capacity. But we must remember that these are only potential demands. Whether they will materialize in actual orders on the books will depend, first of all, upon how effectively we plan the job of unwinding our wartime economy. The job will not be an easy one and a slip may well spell disaster.

THE HEART OF POST-WAR COLLAPSE

If when the war is over we fail to take full and immediate advantage of our export opportunities, if we are not prepared to throw in public works when they are needed, business activity will slow down. If that happens, employment, pay rolls, and prices will begin to fall and the vast potential demand of 132,000,000 consumers and of 3,000,000 businesses will dry up and disappear.

Men who have lost their jobs don't buy that new refrigerator and they don't buy that new car, nor do they make a first payment on a new home. Permit employment levels to shrink and fear will hold most of the hundred billion dollars of wartime savings off the market.

Businessmen don't invest in a falling market. When prices are dropping, there won't be much replacing of equipment and building of new plants. To a large extent the $25,000,000 of reserves that business has accumulated will remain right where they are—in reserve.

What I am saying is that if we permit the economy to sag immediately after the war, we face a tail spin. We face the menace of deflation feeding upon itself, with no one knowing how fast the economy will fall or how far. It seems to me imperative that we see to it now that this will not be permitted to happen.

PROGRAM FOR THE RECONVERSION PERIOD

Full advantage must be taken of our export markets. The world will need vast quantities of our goods. If we are to have this business—and have it we must—we shall have to provide broad export credits. We must make the decision now that these credits will be extended.

Further, we must determine now that needed public works—Federal, State, and local—will be thrown into the breach at precisely the time and in whatever quantity is necessary to keep the wheels of industry running and to keep men at their jobs. Public works must be planned today and the programs at all levels of Government must be coordinated so that they may be instantly available if the need arises.

And, finally, we must determine now that any broad deflation of our present price and wage structure will not be permitted. We have placed ceilings over prices and wages to prevent wartime inflation. In the reconversion period we must protect prices and wages to prevent equally disastrous deflation.

WHAT HAPPENS AFTER RECONVERSION?

I think all reasonable men will agree that only wise management on the part of Government and business can bring us through the reconversion period with our economy still sound.

What deeply troubles many of us is the question, When does the Government step out? Do we have to reconcile ourselves to a regulated economy indefinitely? For my part I am convinced that if extensive Government regulation is long continued the springs of our vitality will dry up and our present free society will gradually decay.

It may be that for other peoples other systems may work effectively. But free enterprise is the system with which we in this country have converted a wilderness into the greatest industrial civilization ever built. In the past free enterprise has served us magnificently. It can continue to do so, but very frankly I have no patience with those who can see only its virtues and are blind to its past defects or unwilling to take steps to correct them.

As our free-enterprise system has worked in the past, it has periodically yielded us many years of depression. During the years of the upsurge of the business cycle, we took giant steps forward only to lose, in the years of depression, a valuable portion of the ground we had gained.

It has meant that we have periodically condemned the Nation, every part of it, to idleness and poverty, to foreclosures and bankruptcies, to insecurity and despair. And this was the more galling because men went idle and mouths went improperly fed in a country that was recognized to be the richest and most plentifully endowed on this earth.

There was a time when these periodic break-downs of our economy could be tolerated. It was not so long ago when no American was more tha none generation from the farm. Forty years ago, when depressions hit, when plants closed down, the industrial worker could often return to his family farm and find there a living for himself and his family.

That time was passed. Today, the industrial workers of Detroit cannot retreat to the farms. It is here—on the assembly line of your own Detroit—that they must make their living and find their security.

There was a time when we believed that the business cycle was a disease of our system for which there was no cure. It was bitter medicine. But knowing no alternative, we accepted it.

Today we know better. With good planning, with close cooperation between Government and business, we know that the level of business activity can be sustained. We know that resulting jobs can be provided.

DEPRESSIONS CAN BE PREVENTED

In my opinion, the Nation will never again accept poverty in the midst of plenty. No longer will our people accept insecurity in peacetime, when the power of our economy to create abundance has been so vividly proven in time of war.

It has been claimed that economic security is incompatible with the free-enterprise system. That in my judgment is nonsense. It is nonsense because it fails to distinguish between the risks of competition, which are and must be part of our system, and the risks of depression, which no man, however efficient, however enterprising, can overcome.

During the periods of depression it is not the inefficient business alone that goes under, but the efficient as well. In depression it is not the inefficient or the lazy worker alone who cannot find a job, but the efficient and the industrious one as well.

Americans are overwhelmingly in favor of a system in which the efficient will thrive and the productive and the resourceful can find rewards commensurate with the contribution they can make to our society. To attain this goal, it is imperative that markets be maintained for all who can produce and that resulting job opportunities be provided for all who are able and willing to work. The free-enterprise system can never fulfill its promise unless this is done.

Let me state most emphatically that this does not mean Government competition with industry or Government control of industry. It means a government that encourages, that stimulates, that supports free enterprise and the initiative of the individual. The essential role of Government in our economic future, backed by the will of all of our people, must be to underwrite a high level of business activity and thereby to release the full energies of all our people under our democratic free-enterprise system.

And let us never forget that we are the Government. The Government responds to our will and our direction. That point will bear constant repetition because fear of Government may be the most dangerous single stumbling block in the path of a vigorous, dynamic, expanding free-enterprise economy in the years following the war.

Operations and Methods of O. P. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 4 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from the president of the Minnesota Municipal Judges' Association dealing with the difficulty the people have in complying with the directives and regulations of the O. P. A., and protesting against the arbitrary acts of the administrators of that bureau of the Government.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MUNICIPAL COURT, CITY OF AUSTIN,
Austin, Minn., April 5, 1944.

Hon. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Now that the O. P. A. is asking for a new lease, perhaps it is a good time to have an understanding about a few things that have been causing trouble.

There are some of us who have felt that the O. P. A. has had an important function to perform, but that many of its methods have been so arrogant and arbitrary as to drive the people into a spirit of revolt against its entire program.

When we have offered criticism, we are met by a general blanket indictment against our patriotism—and a scorching generality about our being unwilling to sacrifice for the war effort.

Such accusations against the people of the Midwest are unfair. Our people do little complaining and always carry their full share of the burden. Recently the O. P. A. cut the gasoline allotment here, which cut was evidently made to quench the thirst of the black markets in the East. If you will check the black market spot maps, you will note that we are relatively free from it, while the New York counterfeiters are growing fat on wholesale operations in illicit gasoline trade.

There is little mention of that, because we know it is a difficult problem, and may be one of those things that must happen in war, like shooting down one of our own planes, or dropping a grenade into the wrong fox hole. But we do feel somewhat sensitive about this, because it is these Eastern States who have bedeviled us for not knowing of the war.

We know it was a Minnesota lad who was the first United States soldier to set foot on European soil in this war. We know the length of Minnesota casualty lists when a new beach head is established. We know that the leading aces of the air force come from our neighbors in Sioux Falls, S. Dak., and Poplar, Wis. We know what befell the five brothers from Iowa. We know what happened to the company from Brainerd. We know of the war. It is not here that the O. P. A. is frustrated by noncooperation, and maybe our turn has come to ask whether these people from the swanky Fifth Avenues in the East know there is a war on?

We have a right to ask the O. P. A. to stay within the law, and we should be permitted to make this request without having the patrons of the black market in Hoboken point at us with the finger of isolationism.

We are expected to cooperate with the rules of the O. P. A., and Minnesota has one of the best records in the United States in doing so. But how can we maintain a respect for this bureau if it in turn has no respect for the people, and no regard for the law?

The O. P. A. is the most consistent law breaker in the State of Minnesota. I find daily examples of its flagrant violations of American principles, and these violations are openly flouted and boasted of by the employees of the bureau.

I am referring specifically to an inquisition court which is being operated by a number of these self-important fellows, who are feeling their oats because of having a little authority to which they are evidently not accustomed.

That these courts are illegal is the frank opinion of every eminent legal authority I can find who has expressed himself on the subject.

Our Constitution cannot be repealed by the theoretical logic of a bureaucrat, no matter how good his intentions.

The most vicious aspect of this situation is the fact that these courts are deriving their jurisdiction from a duress on the accused, and operate in the style and arrogance of a blackmailer.

That such black-market courts are permitted to exist is creating a general feeling of distrust to all judicial process.

As president of the Minnesota Municipal Judges Association, I feel it has become necessary to protest, in vigorous and certain terms, to this unnecessary undermining of the judicial branch of our Government.

We have a court structure in every community, presided over by judges selected by the people. The qualifications of these judges are passed on by the voters, and they are well able to exact such penalties and corrective measures as may be necessary in each case. I feel it is unnecessary to have an O. P. A. court to supplement the penalties of the peoples' courts. For example, where revocation of driving privileges is necessary, the existing courts are competent and willing to perform that function, as may be verified by records in the driver's license division of our State highway department.

As a judge, I have been finding it increasingly difficult to discern that which is law, from that which is the whim of an experimenting bureaucrat. It is becoming cruel to punish the workingman for violation of rules and directives so complex that the lawyers and bar associations are groaning under a nebulous ambiguity which defies interpretation.

Since rationing and price control is important to our national interests, the O. P. A., as now constituted, is the greatest evil and danger to our economic structure. The people have no respect or confidence in this ogre of bureaucracy, and the necessary cooperation is collapsing.

We need a rationing structure which understands the American people, and knows how to work with them. The O. P. A. is a disgrace to our American history, ranking along with the witchcraft in the days of Cotton Mather. It should be expelled with a resounding slap, so that no more will Americans try to hex one another with bureaucratic directives. In its place should be created a board authorized to act in legally prescribed bounds, consisting of a personnel maintaining some degree of respect for the laws and people of this Nation.

The people are entitled to know that only such restrictions are enacted as may be necessary and definitely not created for the purpose of teaching Americans to come to the Government for all and every detail that may suit the fancy of bureaucracy to dole out.

The people are entitled to know the law by reading that which is enacted by their authorized representatives. The people are entitled to their day in court.

And where teeth are necessary in the law, the judges of Minnesota are ready to perform their duty, of that I am certain.

Let's have abolished this abominable black-market justice in which the O. P. A. is revelling, and return some sanity to America. The best way to lose our fight is to first lose our heads.

Respectfully,

CLIFFORD E. ENGER,
President, Minnesota Municipal Judges Association.

Avery's Private War

OF
HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 4 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article in this morning's Washington Post by Mr. Marquis Childs, entitled "Avery's Private War."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AVERY'S PRIVATE WAR

(By Marquis Childs)

The men who fought on the Government side in the battle of Montgomery Ward & Co. have a healthy respect for Sewell Avery, their adversary. They recognize that he is 100-percent sincere.

The beliefs of this $100,000-a-year corporation executive are more than sincere. They are fanatical. Sewell Avery believes passionately that the Roosevelt administration has brought the Nation to socialist dictatorship.

In spite of all the evidence to the contrary—the substantial war profits, the real influence business exerts, the right of businessmen to damn the Government up and down—he believes just that. Consequently he regards himself as a martyr and a hero.

It makes it all the harder, of course, to work out anything like a reasonable truce so this little private war can be suspended at least long enough to get the bigger war across the Atlantic ended. Three years ago Chairman William H. Davis, of the War Labor Board, wanted to sit down with Avery and talk the whole thing out.

That was at the beginning of Avery's private war. The trouble then was not in Montgomery Ward but in the United States Gypsum Co., of which he is also the head.

Avery refused to meet Davis either in Washington or in Chicago. Thereupon Davis persuaded his personal friend, Owen D. Young, to go as a kind of unofficial mediator and to try with all the weight of his national and international prestige to iron out the difficulties.

Young had lunch with Avery in Chicago. They talked all afternoon. They talked until 9 o'clock in the evening. Young really thought he was getting somewhere. Finally Avery said:

"You know you've made the best presentation of an indefensible case I've heard yet."

I must say the basic contention of the War Labor Board seems to me sound. You can't unscramble war from nonwar when it's on the scale of Montgomery Ward. To compare a concern with 78,000 employees, including complicated manufacturing industries, with a corner grocery isn't logical or fair.

Davis and the members of his Board know that the balance they've been able to hold between peace and chaos on the labor front is as delicate as a watch spring. To allow a big strike to go on in Chicago would have been to risk a prairie fire of strikes spreading across the country.

Just this week, James C. Petrillo, czar of the musicians' union, came before the Labor Board to argue that radio broadcasting wasn't a war industry, and that, therefore, his musicians weren't bound by the no-strike pledge. That's the practical situation confronting the Board. By unanimous decision, Petrillo was turned down.

People ask why John L. Lewis, when he directed the coal strike of a year ago, didn't get the same treatment as Avery. Why wasn't he carried out by the soldiers?

The answer seems fairly obvious. John L. wasn't sitting down in a coal mine. He was sitting down in his union office, and for the Government to have taken over that office wouldn't have helped the war effort one single bit.

Congress is going into this dispute, but I wonder if they'll really get to the root of it. There is an attitude of contempt toward the Government in both the Lewis and the Avery cases.

It goes back to our pioneering past. We're anarchists of a sort—free-wheeling independents. It's been our strength and our weakness. Sewell Avery is a tremendously effective business head—hard working, imaginative, conscientious. His success has been outstanding. Similarly, John L.'s success in building his union to wealth and power has been outstanding.

But in wartime you can't make your own rules. In a complicated industrial society the umpire has to have authority.

I suppose many people think of Avery as a martyr. As for me, I felt sorry for the two soldiers who had to carry him out. Think of getting set to fight Hitler and Hirohito and then finding yourself in a battle with the boss of Montgomery Ward & Co.

The Cloakroom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, big league foul lines being guarded by IV–F's, while one-eyed men are drafted for the front lines, helps my golf.

It must be mightier than the Mississippi of today or the Amazon to take 16 years for that horse to get across.

The new tax bill before us today is principally to simplify. Emerson said, "We learn geology the morning after the earthquake."

Henry the Morgue's mathematics is as versatile as the opinions of the Attorney General when the Chief wants to swing a deal.

We wonder if the debts they owe us from World War No. 1 are being liquidated by lend-lease money for World War No. 2.

If points are not necessary now, then they never have been. The wasted O. P. A. manpower and the unnecessary sweat of merchants should be a part of our new "lest we forget."

B. Baruch loves to sit in Lafayette Park in front of the White House. While feeding the squirrels and pigeons, he transacts official business hours at a time.

A common racket in the Federal bureaus is to reclassify one's job, under rules laid down by the Civil Service, to get an increase in salary. By this method they outwit Congress.

At the turn of the century, Montgomery Ward fought for years to preserve their riparian rights to keep the lakefront clear from buildings east of Michigan Avenue and they won. The tenacity of this set-up goes away back.

When Jimmie Byrnes appeared before the deficiency subcommittee, we were reminded that never before had there been a witness who had served in House, Senate, on the Supreme Court, and in the executive branch—all three departments of Government.

It was my first visit to the Pentagon yesterday. I was most impressed with the huge innercourt strewn with big red, white, and blue umbrellas around the liquid center tent—it was Coney Island on the green—it had atmosphere and sunbaths.

Praise for Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 7, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

MAY 4, 1944.

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH,
Librarian of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MACLEISH: I wish to express my admiration for the splendid work done by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress.

I have found it at all times courteous, efficient, prompt, and thorough. Its immediate and intelligent response to my inquiries have been most gratifying. Oftimes, at a moment's notice, it has furnished me with urgently needed information.

It deserves the highest commendation for the services it performs, and I for one wish to note my sincere appreciation of the quality and manner of performance.

Sincerely yours,

EMANUEL CELLER.

Haters of the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 4 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "They Hate the President Worse Than Hitler—No. 1," from the Philadelphia Record of April 25, 1944; also an editorial entitled "They Hate the President Worse Than Hitler—No. 2," from the same newspaper of May 2, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of April 25, 1944]

THEY HATE THE PRESIDENT WORSE THAN HITLER: NO. 1

The above is not written in perfect English, but we think you get the idea.

Our first portrait in America's gallery of Roosevelt-haters is that of Sewell L. Avery, president of Montgomery Ward & Co., big Chicago mail-order house.

Avery is in the news just now through his second wartime defiance of Uncle Sam. In refusing to obey a War Labor Board order to extend his union contract, pending negotiations, Avery has compelled the President to interrupt his sorely needed vacation and take a personal hand in the dispute. It repeats Avery's performance when he defied the W. L. B. last June.

Now it's a good thing to have some healthy hate in wartime—if it's hate for the enemy.

Avery hates Roosevelt. We've carefully culled our files. We can find no instance where Avery publicly expressed so much as dislike of Hitler, or Tojo, or even Mussolini.

Why does Avery seem to hate Roosevelt more than Hitler?

Sewell Avery doesn't like to take orders from anybody. That includes his own stockholders, whom he cursed out when they questioned his $100,000 a year salary.

Avery is one of our successful businessmen who got to thinking he also was a self-made god. He started life with a silver spoon in his mouth and has had it there ever since. He became a lawyer but switched over to business when he got a job, in 1901, as eastern sales manager of the United States Gypsum Co. Four years later at 31, he was elected president.

Sewell Avery likes to boast that never since has he held any job anywhere beneath the rank of president.

When Sewell Avery took over as president of Montgomery Ward, at the pit of the depression, he remained as president of U. S. Gypsum, doing most of his work for Gypsum, he told stockholders, on golf courses.

Avery started hating the New Deal as soon as the recovery it engendered began pulling Montgomery Ward back on its feet. In 1938 Avery told Montgomery Ward stockholders the New Deal was destroying the "confidence of business to proceed." He carried on his tirade—

After which he revealed that his firm had upped the earnings per common share from 33 cents a share the first quarter in 1937 to 70 cents a share same period in 1938. In the first 4 years of the New Deal, he revealed, sales of Montgomery Ward increased 76 percent.

In 1935 the firm earned $1.72 per share; in 1941—$4.14.

Why does Avery let his hate for the President and the New Deal drive him into making an utter ass of himself?

For one reason: The New Deal, for his own good, had to discipline his power over his employees. It not only helped Avery and his firm, it also helped the men who worked for them.

Thanks to wide distribution of stock, Avery has a firm grip on his Ward job. He does not have the same influence on his employees, or on his Government (as he used to when Hoover consulted him). He doesn't like unions. They challenge his power. He doesn't like the New Deal, for the same reason. He doesn't like Roosevelt, ditto.

Even Business Week magazine bawled out Avery for his asinine attitude in defying the President last summer. Since then, he has behaved more and more like one of industry's spoiled children.

Someone once called him the "John L. Lewis of business." Of course, he could say he hasn't bushy eyebrows. But his motto is: "To hell with you."

[From the Philadelphia Record of May 2, 1944]

THEY HATE THE PRESIDENT WORSE THAN HITLER: NO. 2

The above is not written in perfect English, but we think you get the idea.

Second portrait in our gallery of Roosevelt haters is that of Frank Gannett, of Rochester, N. Y., head of the third largest newspaper chain in the country.

Mrs. Gannett once told an amusing story. She was about to give a dinner party and couldn't find flowers in the colors she wanted. So she took what flowers she had in her garden and dusted them with colored chalk powder until the blooms were in the exact hue desired.

This is how Gannett handles news and information. He takes a fact or an idea, dusts it with the powder of prejudice against the President, and lo, the result is colored precisely as he wants it.

By this device he managed to portray proposed expansion of social security as a New Deal plot to get "itching hands" on the $30,000,000,000 assets of United States life insurance companies. With the same device he argued that the President was "dragging" the country into war, and he now uses it to claim the President laggard in the war effort.

No matter what Roosevelt does, Frank Gannett gets out his editorial flit gun, sprays prejudice powder, and proves F. D. R. wrong.

Gannett knows all about war. He is waging one. Against the President, of course.

Right now he is in the news for two engagements on this Gannett "second front": (a) His sponsorship of the millionaires amendment to the income-tax law, which would limit rich men's income taxes to 25 percent, and boost the taxes of small wage earners to make up for lost revenue;

(b) His attempt to suppress John Roy Carlson's famous book, Under Cover, a campaign in which the publishers, E. P. Dutton & Co., charged intimidation, and which has had the effect of keeping Carlson's volume No. 2 in the nonfiction popularity list.

But the Gannett hatred of Roosevelt goes way back. It was a hate set deep, like a toad in its hole. In 1939 Gannett charged the President with creating unemployment, and causing hundreds of thousands to lose their homes and businesses. A few months later, with a perfectly straight face, Gannett announced that the year had been so profitable for his papers that all employees of more than a year's service would be paid a bonus.

It was during the Supreme Court fight that Gannett set up his committee for constitutional government, which ever since has whanged the tom-toms of reaction and hate.

It is this outfit which is now waging Gannett's fight to help the war effort by cutting income taxes. A new publication, Needed Now, tells of its various fights to wrap reactionary greed in the Constitution, of its war against the third term, of its campaign for a $400,000 fund, and its boasts that since 1937 the Gannett propaganda organization has sent out:

Eighty-two million pieces of literature; 760,000 books; more than 10,000 radio transcriptions, 350,000 telegrams, full page ads in 536 newspapers, and "thousands of weekly releases to newspapers."

Gannett, in addition, has sent "countless" letters to private individuals, urging them to bigger and better hatred of the President.

We have looked through them for hatred of Hitler. But mention of the Nazi seldom appears—except for one purpose:

To argue that Roosevelt is imitating Hitler.

What ails Gannett?

Some of his friends say it is astigmatism.

As a Presidential candidate in 1940, he could not see the link between democracy—the will of the people—and the reelection of Roosevelt. As a businessman, he could not see the connection between New Deal recovery and the fact that his own business made $600,000 more in 1938 than it had made in the last G. O. P. year of 1932.

As a citizen, he now cannot see why it is atrocious taste and worse patriotism to be doing his fighting against the President and for a cut in income taxes of the rich—at a time when Americans are dying on the battlefield that the right of the Gannetts to gripe shall be preserved.

Somebody once pointed out that Gannett was a Democrat until he paid off the first quarter of a million dollars he owed. Then he became a Republican.

Simplification of Income Tax

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the learned and distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and his associates for bringing in this measure at this time. Since the enactment of the last tax bill, it has been apparent to everyone that scarcely a taxpayer in this Nation has escaped the heavy burden of technicality, confusion, and bewilderment that the requirements of that measure imposed.

It is enough that our citizens and taxpayers should be called upon to pay such a large share of their current incomes in taxes to the Federal Government. That there is hardly a prospect that these levies will be diminished, but, on the contrary, may well be increased in the future, is beyond contradiction. Therefore, sincere efforts to alleviate these onerous conditions such as are manifest in this legislation are praiseworthy and commendable and will undoubtedly have the wholehearted support of the membership of this House.

Its asserted objectives are desirable and sound. If it can in any substantial way relieve the great majority of taxpayers from the necessity of computing their income tax, reduce the number of tax computations, simplify the return form, decrease the number of persons required to file declarations of estimated tax, and eliminate some of the difficulties and uncertainties in the making of estimates required for declarations, as is suggested by the committee, then it will be indeed a most welcome relief to practically the whole American people.

These onerous conditions I describe, and which are so well known to the Members of this body, are not confined to large business alone. They affect, impair, and frequently penalize the conduct of all our small businesses, and have become a source not only of heavy drainage of income but also of the very greatest annoyance to almost every person in the United States who is gainfully employed or has any source of revenue.

By all means, let us promptly enact this measure and send it along to the Treasury Department with the intention and in the hope that that agency will move speedily to lay the groundwork through a process of education and publicity and the issuance of new regulations for the clarification and simplification of all present tax forms and methods.

And while we perform this much needed task, let us also give our attention at as early a date as possible to the matter of repealing the so-called iniquitous "cabaret tax" of 30 percent. Whether intentionally or not, this tax is imposed under a misnomer because it affects not only cabarets, but practically every place in the country where our servicemen, our faithful war workers and their friends and families seek well-earned entertainment and recreation.

The tax levied under this provision has already caused unemployment, loss of business, diminished revenue to the Government, and also has struck a particular blow at the morale of our people. It is, in every sense of the word, a repressive tax entailing serious and steadily increasing diminishing returns. We can correct the situation it has created by reducing the percentum of the tax from 30 percent to 5 percent. This would permit certain, substantial revenues, the continuance of employment and the operation of many small businesses and a restored morale to the American servicemen and people. I hope that this House will not further delay action looking to the correction of this unwholesome situation which in this time of stress and anxiety is closing down very many places throughout the Nation to which our people turn for relaxation, rest, and relief from the stresses and strains of over-all war. Apart from any question of assisting private business, the repeal of this unfair and onerous tax which has worked to the great disadvantage of our servicemen and women, will be a contribution to them and their families during this critical period that will not go without appreciation.

OF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to thank the Speaker of the House, the majority and minority floor leaders, and all of the Members of the House of Representatives who participated in the celebration of the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the adoption of the Polish Constitution yesterday, May 3, 1944. May the Stars and Stripes and the White Eagle of Poland be united in victory.

I was particularly impressed last night while listening to the radio program, Report to the Nation, by the remarks of Quentin Reynolds when he stated that although Poland had lost over 5,000,000 people in this desperate struggle, she had not produced a Quisling, and that the Polish people had remained steadfast and faithful to the cause of the United Nations and would rather die than to betray their faith in that cause.

Another commentator in his report of the national news brought out the matter of Reverend Orlemanski's trip to Moscow—he said that friends of the father in New York stated that both the high officials in Washington and the high officials of the church knew about that trip. Now, just who could his friends in New York be? Well this morning I received a postal card from New York which warned me "to leave Reverend Orlemanski alone as he is trying to pull Poland out of the seventeenth century." It was signed, "A Brooklyn Catholic." There is some doubt in my mind as to whether the writer of this card has ever been inside a Catholic church. He is nothing but a Communist, and, therefore, communistic tactics are the only ones he knows. Having 52 nationalistic groups in my congressional district, I know the underhanded methods of the Communist. They even go to the extent of joining the churches, the civic organizations, and the patriotic societies—they then start their boring from within. They even attend church services although they do not believe in it—but only so that they may perform their dirty task of undermining. A lie does not mean anything to a Communist or the misrepresentation of a true fact just so long as he is able to gain his point and attain his ultimate goal. It matters not to a Communist how long it will take him or by what means he will have to travel to reach his goal or the expense he may incur—the result is what counts with him.

I repeat what I have said before—it is time for those in authority in the United States to quit quibbling about diplomacy and worrying whether or not we might embarrass one of our allies, and stand four-square behind their oath of office to uphold the Constitution and the American form of government, and get to the bottom of these communistic agitations and the other efforts of the Communists to indoctrinate Americans with their ideologies.

You hear so many stories in regard to Reverend Orlemanski's trip to Europe—well, here is one that is based on fact: When New York newspapermen went to Springfield, Mass., to ascertain from the chief of police there the basis of the clearance for the visa that was issued to Reverend Orlemanski, they were informed by the chief of police that he did not know very much about how Reverend Orlemanski got his visa—he was simply instructed by the State Department to fingerprint him, and during the process of that fingerprinting, Reverend Orlemanski remarked that a copy of his fingerprints had better be kept because he might not ever return from Russia. It would be interesting to know by what means Reverend Orlemanski really reached the Kremlin or how long he has been planning this trip and just what information he has been collecting here in America. Reverend Orlemanski is even being protected by our State Department—our own State Department has failed to explain to the American people the reasons behind his visit to Russia. They have on the statute books a provision that requires foreign agents to register—many people are wondering whether Reverend Orlemanski and Professor Lange, well-known Russian sympathizers, are really foreign agents of Russia, and if they are the agents of Stalin, and there appears that there is some connection for he journeyed to the Kremlin to report to his master—why have the names of Reverend Orlemanski and Professor Lange not appeared on the published list of registered foreign agents residing in America?

Well, if it is so easy for a Catholic priest indoctrinated with communistic idealogies to get to Russia, I believe we should make it as easy for the rest of the communistic sympathizers and agitators residing in the United States to go there. Let us just load them all on a boat and send them back; in fact, I am so eager to see them leave that I am in favor of furnishing them transportation by air. Stalin, no doubt, can use them to good advantage. Certainly, the people of America, with true American ideals, have no use for them.

Treat Them Alike

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, here are two editorials written in connection with the seizure of Montgomery Ward, which express widely held views. One is from the Detroit Times of April 28; the other is from the San Francisco Examiner of April 27:

[From the Detroit Times of April 28, 1944]

WILL THE PRESIDENT NOW SEIZE DEFIANT UNIONS?

The Montgomery Ward seizure, affecting an organization supplying solely civilian goods and services, is at worst a gestapo proceeding and at best a high-handed misuse of wartime powers. But for the moment let that issue be waived.

If the President can justify his action in the Montgomery Ward case, what about the machinists' unions in the San Francisco Bay area?

If the mere refusal of a civilian business to sign a contract with a C. I. O. union is sufficient cause for sending the Army to take forcible possession of the premises and manhandle the head of that business, what is the President going to do about union bosses who, almost from the first day of war, have defied every process of the New Deal's own laws, have called 13 strikes, have held up vital ships and goods—ranging through warships to transports to munitions—and who are at this moment in defiance of a War Labor Board order.

These union bosses have caused incalculable loss to the war effort.

Will the President send troops to seize the union's books and determine what happens to the huge sums received by the union in dues and initiation fees?

Will the President order all members of the union under 45 to be drafted for the Army?

When John L. Lewis defied the Government no troops were sent to eject him forcibly from his office and take over the union.

What is the President going to do now about the men who are willing to jeopardize our Army and our Navy in the Pacific?

[From the San Francisco Examiner of April 27, 1944]

HERE IS RECORD OF MACHINIST UNIONS—13 STRIKES CALLED SINCE PEARL HARBOR

A. F. of L. and C. I. O. machinist unions of the San Francisco Bay region, currently holding up vital war work, have pulled 18 strikes since 1940.

They have called 13 strikes since Pearl Harbor, despite their no strike pledges.

They have been condemned by President Roosevelt, the War Labor Board, military leaders, and other unions; but they continue to call strikes on the slightest or no provocation.

Here is the record:

October 1940: A. F. of L. Lodge 68 struck at the Jack-Heintz, Ltd., airplane parts plant at Palo Alto, demanding a closed shop. The plant moved to Cleveland, Ohio, where it grew into a huge enterprise. It had war contracts at the time of the strike.

January 1941: A. F. of L. Lodge 68 struck for 1 day at the Bethlehem shipyard, building Navy ships, in a dispute over the presence of five nonunion men in the plant.

April 1941: A. F. of L. Lodge 68 struck for 3 weeks against 57 downtown San Francisco machine shops with $27,500,000 in defense contracts. Won compromise contract demands.

April 1941: A. F. of L. Oakland machinists struck for 10 days against Caterpillar Tractor Corporation, San Leandro, building parts for Diesel engines under defense contract. Won contract demands.

May 1941: A. F. of L. Lodge 68 and C. I. O. Local 1304 struck for 5 weeks against 11 shipyards and repair shops, forcing 20,000 men out of work on $650,000,000 worth of war and merchant ship construction.

They had agreed to the Pacific coast shipbuilding stabilization agreement, but nevertheless demanded 3 cents an hour more and double time for overtime.

This became the most serious strike in the Nation. It was condemned by the President, by the Navy, the United States Senate, Admiral Land of the Maritime Commission, and other unions. The strikers defied orders to return to work from national presidents of their unions.

The strike collapsed after other unions walked through the picket lines and the Navy began employing machinists under civil service.

December 1942: C. I. O. Local 1304 called its men off ship construction in Oakland over the Christmas holiday weekend, holding up a convoy vital to the Pacific war. The union demanded overtime pay for Saturday and Sunday regardless of whether the days were the sixth and seventh worked. A. F. of L. Lodge 68 worked closely with the C. I. O. union. The President condemned both unions in curt telegrams ordering them to live up to agreements. They did not win demands.

January 1943: The War Labor Board accused A. F. of L. Lodge 68 Business Agents Harry Hook and E. F. Dillon of engaging in a "completely, unresponsible act" when the union leaders threatened to strike at the Joshua Hendy Iron Works, Sunnyvale, to force a quick decision from W. L. B.

March 1943: C. I. O. Local 1304 struck at General Engineering & Drydock, Oakland, to force out one man who had worked over the Christmas holidays in defiance of the union business agent. The strikers returned the next day when the man quit.

May 1943: A. F. of L. Lodge 68 struck at the Redwood City plant of the National Motor Bearing Co., building airplane parts. The union demanded a closed shop. Hook and Dillon refused to obey a W. L. B. back-to-work order, saying no strike was in progress. W. L. B. then ordered strikers individually to return to jobs.

The strike lasted 9 weeks. When 24 machinists defied union leaders and returned to jobs, union trials were ordered for them. The machinists transferred to Lodge 504, San Jose, and signed a contract with the plant, restoring peace.

June 1943: A. F. of L. Lodge 68 struck at the Joshua Hendy plant, building engines for ships, when the company attempted to change hours and place men on 10-hour shifts. W. L. B. settled the strike after 2 weeks.

December 4, 1943: A. F. of L. Lodge 824 called out 3,700 machinists at Richmond shipyards in jurisdictional dispute with A. F. of L. operating engineers. It was called a "continuing union meeting." Returned to work next day.

December 9, 1943:C. I. O. Local 1304 struck at Moore Drydock in Oakland, refusing to work on a new Navy tender because the company would not pay the premium repair rate. Sailors finished the work.

February 1, 1944: 400 A. F. of L. Lodge 68 machinists called a 45-minute "quickie" strike at Joshua Hendy in protest against a lay-off of men occasioned by a change in shifts.

March 5, 1944: C. I. O. Local 1304 struck at Moore Drydock because machinists were refused the premium repair rate for the job of finishing two new Navy vessels built at Richmond and placed in a Moore drydock. Idle for 2 days were 1,700 men.

March 11, 1944: Work on the same vessels was halted again briefly by a jurisdictional dispute between C. I. O. Local 1304 and A. F. of L. Lodge 824 over which was entitled to the work.

March 28, 1944: A quickie strike of 60 A. F. of L. Lodge 68 machinists was called at the San Francisco plant of General Engineering & Drydock Co. and ended when Admiral C. H. Wright warned them that war work was being impeded.

April 14, 1944: A. F. of L. Lodge 68 refused to work more than 48 hours in 104 downtown San Francisco shops as pressure move to force new contract. W. L. B. ordered union back to overtime hours.

April 16, 1944: A. F. of L. Lodge 68 struck at plants of J. D. Christian Engineers and Industrial Gear Co., both with war contracts. Cause given was jurisdictional dispute with another A. F. of L. union. Strike lasted 3 days.

April 18, 1944: The series of C. I. O. shipyard stoppages caused by the repair-rate dispute was condemned at a public hearing in San Francisco by high officers of the Navy, Army, and Maritime Commission.

April 25, 1944: C. I. O. Local 1304 again struck, refusing to work on a new Navy vessel at United Engineering & Drydock Co., Alameda, unless given the premium repair rate.

Fight Pay for Fighting Men

REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the American people overwhelmingly favor fight pay for fighting men. The idea originated with Ernie Pyle, one of the world's outstanding journalists and war correspondents and recent Pulitzer Prize winner—a real champion for the cause of the G. I. The combat troops love Ernie. He has lived with them ever since the invasion of November 7, 1942, and his column and opinions reflect the temper and sentiments of your boys overseas.

Provision was made for the boys in the Air Corps to receive 50 percent extra flight pay, which is fine; but, as Ernie Pyle says:

> Fifty percent flight pay for airmen is fine, and as it should be, but the idea I would suggest is why not give your genuine combat ground soldier something corresponding to flight pay? Maybe a good phrase for it would be "fight pay."

Of approximately 2,000,000 men overseas probably no more than 100,000 are in actual combat with the enemy. But as it is now, there is no official distinction between the "dog face" lying for days and nights under constant mortar fire on an Italian hill and the headquarters clerk living comfortably in a hotel in Rio de Janeiro. Their two worlds are so far apart the human mind can barely grasp the magnitude of the difference. One lives like a beast and dies in great numbers. The other is merely working away from home. Both are doing necessary jobs but it seems to me the actual warrior deserves something to set him apart. Medals are not enough.

To quote Ernie Pyle further:

> When I was at the front the last time several infantry officers brought up this same suggestion. They say "combat pay" would mean a lot to the fighting man. It would put him into a proud category and make him feel that somebody appreciates what he endures.

Obviously no soldier would ever get into combat just to get the extra fight pay. And that is not the point. There is not sufficient money in this world to pay any single individual his due for battle suffering. But it would put a mark of distinction on him, a recognition that his miserable job was a royal one and that the rest of us were aware of it.

Congress was fully aware of this deserving recognition to our gallant youngsters in the Army Air Corps when on June 16, 1942, it enacted into law a 50 percent increase of their pay when these boys participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights.

On March 8, 1944, I introduced an amendment to this act which extends this same recognition to the grand soldier—the ordinary regular G. I. infantryman, to the fighting sailors and marines, and to the nurses and others in the service who engage in actual combat fighting. The introduction of this measure was hailed by the millions of fighting men on all the battle fronts of the world. The introduction of this measure was headlined in Stars and Stripes, Yank, the Guinea Gold, and the Dragon in China. I have received hundreds of letters from boys everywhere urging its passage. Here are a few brief excerpts from letters from boys overseas:

Read your article of fight pay in British paper and we in our company are happy they are thinking of us at home. It's not the money, it's the principle of treating the Army, Navy, and Air Corps alike. (From a private (first class) in Italy.)

Congratulations on Ernie Pyle's fight-pay bill you sponsored. More talk about it than the fighting last few days. All the boys are for it. Not the money but the recognition, and I hope the war ends quickly so we never collect a cent. (From a technical sergeant in Italy.)

When Ernie Pyle came out with his column he summarized in a simple, clear proposal what had been in our minds for some time. When we later read about your bill there was more discussion on it than on that night's bombing. I'm not in a position to speak of how all combat troops feel about the proposal, but the boys in this outfit, an infantry regiment on the front lines, congratulate you and say God bless you. (Lieutenant, One Hundred and Eightieth Infantry in Italy.)

Congratulations, Sammy. Glad you introduced Ernie Pyle bill. It's been the best morale stimulant I've witnessed here for over a year. (Major, Field Artillery Battalion.)

All boys in this outfit tickled to death over your 50 percent pay increase for troops in combat. You're doing a wonderful thing, and will certainly spur our boys on. It's not the money, but the thoughtfulness of the folks back home. (Sergeant, Twenty-second Field Artillery Battalion.)

Glad a Pennsylvania Congressman has introduced Ernie Pyle's suggestion about combat pay for combat soldiers. It's not the question of money but is just the distinction as Pyle says that means so much to us boys on the front lines. For the war's sake I hope it passes. (Lieutenant, Six Hundred and Thirty-sixth T. D. Battalion, Italy.)

Sammy, you made a ten-strike in introducing that bill—extra pay for the ground soldier here. We live for days in mud holes—with rats and insects and no money could ever pay me for doing this in peacetime, but your bill was like a tonic and made us think that, "Well, after all, it's worth fighting for the folks back home." All my pals in New Guinea are for it 100 percent. (Staff Sergeant, Headquarters Three Hundred and Eighth Bomb Wing.)

The very same sentiment is reflected by the people of this country as is evidenced by the report of the Gallup Poll of April 20, 1944, when 70 percent of the people in a national poll favored "extra combat pay for front-line soldiers." A typical example of this public sentiment is carried out in a letter sent me by Prof. Charles F. Young, superintendent of schools, of East Pittsburgh, Pa., a splendid educator and a distinguished veteran of World War No. 1, when on March 31, 1944, he wrote:

This communication is written as a measure of appreciation and also to congratulate you upon the presentation of your bill for equalization of pay for men doing the actual fighting. To my way of thinking this is a long-needed measure. I never could see any justification for the wide range of pay given to men in the different branches of service. Your bill will boost soldier morale and should be promptly passed.

A majority of the membership on the Committee on Military Affairs favor the Ernie Pyle proposal and I hope that Chairman ANDREW MAY will find time to consider this simple amendment consisting of only five lines and which provides for "fight pay" for fighting men.

Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, history, with its so-called lessons, has proved to be a poor teacher, particularly in the matter of inflation control by price-fixing, because it has told us only what we cannot do, when what we need to know is what we can do. We cannot stop eating because the proof of the pudding has been indigestion. Yet there are so many ingredients in a political pudding that random trial-and-error cannot be viewed as a wise way of changing the recipe. When devising new methods, the scientist invariably resorts to theory. His selection of new methods is a matter of principle, not of expedient; for by the use of intelligent analysis results can, without actual trial, be foreseen with more or less certainty.

It would seem accordingly, that the first step in a scientific approach must be to arrive at a correct definition of the problem. A beginning toward such a definition of inflation is made when we find out what it is not. Let me quote Prof. Lewis Haney on this, from a recent article in the Commercial and Financial Chronicle:

The chief point in defining inflation is to understand that it most emphatically is not a rise in prices—or at least commodity prices. Prices can rise without any inflation. Inflation can exist without prices rising. By "prices" one ordinarily means commodity prices as measured by price indexes. Anyone who really "lives" today knows that the cost-of-living index does not really measure commodity prices. Moreover, it is not true that all prices are represented by commodity prices, and inflation may find expression in prices other than the prices of commodities. My main point in emphasizing the lack of necessary relationship between prices and inflation is that it follows that inflation cannot be stopped by holding prices down—not even if all prices could be held down, which is never the case.

In another contribution to this excellent series of articles gathered by the Chronicle, Dr. Melchior Palyi points out that "price control and rationing tend to accomplish the opposite of their aim" insofar as they are alleged to be a control for inflation. There may be in war a momentary occasion for preventing speculation against sudden inadequacy of supplies in specific commodity markets upset by war measures. But when extended to the point of attempting to prevent spending of excessive cash balances, price control becomes an attempt at "freezing" the civilian economy which is worse than futile because it does not allow for the shift from pre-war to war-time distortions of a normal economy, particularly from underemployment to overemployment. It thus interferes with price and wage adjustments that are essential to production, particularly in agriculture.

This policy of relying on saving to prevent monetary depreciation actually interferes with fiscal dependence on taxation of income to finance the war. It merely puts off the evil day of reckoning with an "inflationary gap" in current money incomes, thus creating an untaxable pool of buying power. As the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HAWKES] has observed in the Senate committee, it is better to keep all money in active circulation, with higher prices, profits, and wages, and to rely on taxation to reconstruct a balance between a higher level of money incomes and what should be a lower level in wartime living standards. Present procedure is producing higher, not lower, civilian levels of expenditure and consumption.

True, "there is no mechanical relationship between the increase in the amount of money and the level to which prices may rise, no law that would tie them together in terms of definable or predictable ratios, or in timing," as Dr. Palyi points out. Bank-credit expansion and its concomitant of printing-press money is linked to the breadbasket by "psychology." Dr. Palyi continues:

Prices rise if and when the excessive volume of money is disbursed, and it is disbursed if and when the public, or part of it, is convinced that its liquid holdings are excessive—that prices will rise. This is obvious, but the elusiveness common in arguments on the "psychological" level invites more or less subtle reasonings to prove that inflation need not occur in the presence or absence of this or that element, which is supposedly relevant to mass attitude. Such arguments, typical of every inflationary scene, merely confuse the psychological and the mechanical; they serve to assure the gullible after the reasonings of a purely quantitative nature have been exhausted. Pseudopsychology is as good a method of "kidding" one's self as is the pseudomathematical approach to monetary problems. The two "methods" are of about the same age, too.

WHY WE "CAN'T HAVE" INFLATION

Quite a few such "psychological" reasons are current to convince us that we cannot have inflation, because our situation is "different" from others. The Germans lost a war, and had to transfer reparations, which, incidentally, they did not "transfer." The French parliamentary system was corrupt, and much of their country had been devastated; in Italy, the Syndicalists and Fascists played havoc with the political set-up, etc. Much comfort seems to be derived from the fact, too, that foreign trade is of lesser importance to this country than to most others. There are, of course, special circumstances present in each and every case. But each time, the reason price inflation takes place is the preceding and continuing monetary inflation. Whether purchasing power is being poured out on account of reparation payments or on behalf of lend-lease; for the benefit of reconstruction problems abroad or of public works at home; to finance war or to finance revolution, or what have you, is as irrelevant to its effect as the cause of a death is to the estate tax on the fortune of the deceased. What matters is the amount of money that has been and will be created, without an equivalent rise in the flow of goods at the consumers' disposal.

More effective, or more insidious, are arguments of this kind—that price inflations are not threatening so long as the country has a large gold reserve, or so long as it maintains its exchanges at gold par (and its money "stays at home"), or so long as it maintains "effective" price controls. The underlying assumption in each case is that it is not the vast volume of money per se that upsets the equilibrium of the markets. The unbalanced situation arises only if and when some external circumstance brings about a buyers' panic. All we have to do then is to control those external circumstances. The burden of the inflation problem is thus shifted from the consideration of supply-demand forces to that of administrative powers—to the maintenance of a large gold reserve, to the stabilization of exchange rates, and to price controls.

GOLD RESERVE AND PRICE INFLATION

The least valid of all such "psychological" arguments is the one which uses the size of the gold reserve as a means to convey the impression that no danger of price inflation exists or needs to exist. In reality, the significance of the gold reserve, psychological or otherwise, is twofold: To limit the amount of available purchasing power at home; and to protect the value of the currency abroad. In a paper inflation, the first function is gone with the wind. As to the second, it is valid only so far as it creates the presumption that a country with a large gold reserve is likely to be able to maintain the gold content of its currency unit. What matters, however, in this respect, is not the absolute volume of gold on hand, but the relative one; in relation to the potential demand for international payments.

At the time the United States went off the gold standard in 1933, its gold reserve of some $4,500,000,000 was the largest of the world, but the loss of a bare quarter billion, due to the withdrawal of foreign funds and to the fight of American money into foreign currencies, drove the Administration into panicky measures. At that time, the total "current liabilities" of the Nation—that is, the foreign and American owned money that could be withdrawn on short notice—consisting of bank deposits and of cash in circulation, was covered by gold in the ratio of about 9 percent. Presently, the huge gold reserve of almost $22,000,000,000 represents only about 12 percent of the total "quick liabilities" of the country (including the short-term Government bonds outside the banks and those redeemable on short notice). If we proceed with a deficit of about $60,000,000,000 per annum, most of which takes the form of legal tender and bank deposits, or short-term paper, the gold coverage of the national purchasing power volume will soon be as low as it was in 1933. The same problem of maintaining the exchange rates at par may arise as it did then, even if the gold reserve remains untouched.

But will it remain untouched? We have lost since Pearl Harbor over $1,000,000,000 of gold. After the war our position will be very strong on the international market, indeed, but comparatively few outlets for exports—other than Latin America, India, etc.—will be open unless financed by short and long credits or by lend-lease. The balance between paid-for imports and largely unpaid-for exports is not likely to net gold and with the revival of tourist traffic substantial gold losses may be in the offing. What is more, very little of our outstanding credits can be mobilized while our total indebtedness to foreign countries is estimated lately as high as $13,000,000,0000—not counting the earmarked gold—of which at least $5,000,000,000 are "hot money" that might be promptly withdrawn. On top of it the vast expansion of currency at home, coupled with severe taxation and the prospect of rising prices, is likely to invite American capitalists to seek foreign investments and "hedging" outlets. All of which adds up to the prospect that after the war our gold reserve may decline substantially while the monetary volume is bound to be much larger than now and may continue to rise further.

EXCHANGE STABILITY VERSUS INFLATION

What, then, of the prospects of exchange stability? Presently, the United States dollar sells in the open markets of the world at a 45 to 55 percent discount, indicating a depreciation against gold approximately equal to that under which the mark labored at the time of the Armistice. At that time the Germans knew as much about it as Americans know now about the actual "gold content" of their money. Of course, this decline may be corrected by an early return to the free export of gold—that is, de facto suspended by the method of freezing foreign claims. But how long can the convertibility into gold—for export—be maintained under such post-war conditions as outlined above?

Nor is it even correct that the depreciation or devaluation of the dollar has to precede the rise of prices. Historically, decline of the currency's purchasing power at home often precedes the decay of its value on the foreign exchange markets. Theoretically, the two symptoms—rising prices and rising foreign exchange rates—are correlate; the one may be the cause as well as the consequence of the other. From the psychological angle, rising prices create the expectation of currency depreciation, just as the latter brings about the anticipation of the former.

Of course, a nominal gold parity can be maintained by foreign-exchange regulations, by "freezing" the dollar in relation to other currencies. This is the German system of the 1930's that has been widely adopted during this war. Regulated foreign exchanges amount to concealing the actual depreciation, driving it into black markets, and presaging a future devaluation. They eliminate, for a while, panicky fluctuations which could be eliminated anyway (by open-market operations in gold, etc.). But the price to be paid for regulating foreign exchanges consists of the necessity of putting everything that may affect them into strait jackets, exports and imports, capital movements, and even tourist traffic. Freezing foreign exchange transactions is temporarily "helpful" to a debtor country that uses the technique instead of an open default on foreign obligations; or to a creditor country to stop lending abroad. But in either case, it spells the ruin of international trade and credit, and presupposes a managed economy at home.

REGIMENTATION VERSUS INFLATION

The final word of every approach that pretends to combat inflation by psychology is regimentation. Indeed, the only way to stabilize a price level in the midst of, or after, a saturnalia of governmental spending, and to keep the public from converting the paper proceeds into real goods, is by not permitting the consumer to freely consume and business to invest. Consumption and business investment have to be strictly regulated so as to keep the demand within the potentialities of supply. All psychological cures of inflation amount to curing by strait jackets.

Let's be clear about the underlying fundamentals. The average American will command three or four, or maybe five and six times more purchasing power—currency, and paper readily convertible, at face value, into currency—than he used to possess. Unless a price inflation is permitted to run amuck, due to the disbursement of excess purchasing power (over and above the disbursement of currently earned incomes), one of three policies, or their combination, has to be adopted:

(a) Deflation of the excessive volume of purchasing power by default on the promise to redeem at par;

(b) Absorption of the same excessive volume by taxation;

(c) Reduction of its velocity of circulation by persuading or forcing the owner to restrain from spending—the psychological approach.

THE MEANING OF PRICE CONTROL

Few people believe that persuasion would work under post-war conditions: That the appeal to patriotism, or even the offer of much higher interest rates, could keep the consumer from spending, and business from investing, when a vast accumulation of purchasing power will coincide with a similar accumulation of unsatisfied demand for durable goods. The medicine of European doctors is to force self-restraint down the throats of individuals and corporations. They may keep their money, provided they don't buy more than what the authorities permit. The way to accomplish this is rationing, which in turn permits control of prices. This is the way most belligerent governments actually plan to dispose of their post-war inflation worries, by letting the consumer keep his money but keeping him from spending it. The same solution is being propagandized by American economists who get their cue from German, Russian, or English intellectual headquarters. They claim that since price control works—allegedly—in wartime, there is no reason why it shouldn't be enforced in peacetime; and they assume that people will regard their money as good even if it cannot buy, provided the loss of its purchasing power is due to administrative constraint and not to rising prices.

The answer is, briefly, that—

1. Rationing and price control are so far only successful under wartime conditions when the consumer is willing to cooperate for patriotic reasons—when his economic motivation is dulled, so to speak.

2. Even in war their success is temporary and limited. Luxury goods skyrocket even in Russia and in Germany, and black markets develop everywhere.

3. Post-war enforcement would necessitate an over-all control of economic activities, and a vast bureaucratic set-up, scarcely compatible with American standards of individual freedom.

4. The physical impossibility to enforce an all around price control necessitates the use of subsidies, direct and indirect, which in turn add to the volume of purchasing power and enhance the upward pressure on the price level, making control more and more difficult.

5. Especially so, in view of the fact that an inflated monetary volume combined with price control means that the broad masses will feel secure in the possession of their vastly increased purchasing power. The psychological consequence is more spending.

6. Lastly, under those conditions, full employment is likely to prevail, with the consequent shortage of labor; if so, wages are bound to rise, in turn raising costs and prices.

PSYCHOLOGY OF INFLATION

The psychology of inflation has little to do with foreign exchanges and still less with gold reserves. Rising exchange rates and declining gold reserves may stimulate the buying spree; their absence does not hold it up. Price control and rationing tend to accomplish the opposite of their aim. What makes the consumer disgorge his liquid holdings and induces him to accept higher prices—the change in attitude from the hoarding propensity to the preference for spending—is a matter of economic reason, not of administrative tricks.

The average American—man, woman and child—will have this year an income of $1,100 or more, as against less than half as much 5 years ago. By the end of the year, he or she will have in liquid assets (cash, deposits, and other paper at its cash surrender value) at least $1,500, or about three times more than what used to be in prosperous times the per capita liquid holdings in this country. An over-all prohibition to stop the use of comparatively high incomes and of disproportionately high savings, will create misgivings and fears rather than confidence; the attempt to enforce it by a policeman in front of every retail shop and another one behind every consumer is bound to bring about chaotic market conditions.

What determines, under such circumstances, the consumers' and investors' attitude is their expectation; that their incomes will or will not stay high, and rise further. If they expect the maintenance of the same or similar incomes, the incentive to reduce current saving and raise current spending is bound to prevail. Unless the American people have changed their psychology to such an extent as to become primarily interested in counting dollars rather than in enjoying things which dollars buy, it is most unlikely that either the saving of 35 to 40 percent of the national income, as last year, or the hoarding of the already accumulated liquidity should continue much longer.

Nor is it necessary that all people should act simultaneously and in the same fashion. A substantial fraction of the population dishoarding its liquid reserves can start the ball rolling. Once it rolls, once prices start to rise, without the excuse of wartime shortages and without the inhibitions of wartime restraint, the dishoarding is bound to progress in a cumulative fashion.

For all practical purposes, it makes little or no difference in what form the cash holdings are being accumulated; in which way we classify them (as Professor Schlichter does) as hot, warm, and cold savings; nor even does their distribution among savers matter. Few people ignore the real status of their "liquidity" because a greater or smaller part of it is in one cash form or another. What part of one's savings is hot or warm or cold, to use this new academic jargon, depends on temporary preferences, and is irrelevant to the problem. They may all turn "hot" as soon as the disbursement of a minor part has started raising prices, which in turn causes more income inflation and more dishoarding of savings. It is this vicious circle from excess spending to rising prices to more spending, etc., that constitutes the psychological essence of a run-away inflation. It can be prevented only by stopping its material and psychological source—the expectation of a continued monetary inflation.

Writer Sees Seizure of Ward Plant as Administration Double Dealing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, one of the most lucid and clarifying articles on the seizure of Montgomery Ward & Co., of Chicago, appeared in the Washington Evening Star of yesterday, written by Frank R. Kent. Mr. Kent tells the story briefly but completely. I offer it for the RECORD:

WRITER SEES SEIZURE OF WARD PLANT AS ADMINISTRATION DOUBLE DEALING

(By Frank R. Kent)

The big thing about the President's seizure of the Montgomery Ward Chicago plant is the clarity with which it is revealed that this administration has one policy for dealing with one group of citizens, the employers, and quite a different policy for dealing with another group, the labor leaders and their unions.

Toward the first it is ruthless and hostile; toward the second servile and partial. This is not news to those who have followed the Roosevelt record in labor matters. But it has now been made so plain that the conviction which informed men have had over a period of years seems likely to become much more widely held—so widely, in fact, that the political reaction may be important.

For this time there has been no pretense of "equality of treatment"; no show of "even-handed justice." This time, with the President approving from his vacation retreat, and with no national crisis threatened, the full weight of the Government was thrown on the side of the unions. The Attorney General, Mr. Francis Biddle, flying from Washington, personally directed the soldiers who took over the property and physically ejected the protesting head of the firm from his building.

NOT INTENT OF CONGRESS

It is contended by the authors of the law under which this action was taken that the seizure is in violation of the intent of Congress. And, it is asserted by others that it is without moral or legal justification; that if this kind of thing can be done to one business it can be done to any business; that this is an instance of Federal strong-arming sharply at variance with any conception of freedom.

But aside from the merits of these contentions, and centering upon the conflicting administration attitudes in dealing with controversies between businessmen and labor leaders, the facts as presented by Senator BYRD in a notable speech and by Mr. Mark Sullivan in recent articles leave little room for defense.

They point out that the Ward case parallels almost exactly that of Mr. John L. Lewis and the coal miners last year. The same contract issue was involved with the same Government board which appealed to the President when Mr. Lewis refused to sign.

The Lewis refusal differed only from the Ward refusal in that it was flagrantly defiant and denunciatory, whereas the Ward refusal, while firm, was neither arrogant nor bellicose. Another difference, of course, was that the Ward refusal did not threaten to tie up a basic industry upon which the conduct of the war and the life of the Nation depend.

Mr. Roosevelt's method of meeting the appeal of the War Labor Board over the Lewis refusal was to do nothing. Nothing happened to Mr. Lewis. He was not compelled to sign. He was not even denounced from the White House. He was not proceeded against under the Smith-Connally War Labor Disputes Act, though Senator BYRD appealed to the Attorney General for action under that act. Nothing was done to Mr. Lewis and in the end he got more for his union than he had asked.

The contrast to the Ward case is complete. In that case, acting with great speed the Government took over the plant, ejected its head, and gave the union a victory.

POLITICAL ALLIANCE

In considering these things, it is impossible not to recall (1) that this is election year and the President (unless all signs fail) will seek a fourth term; (2) that the C. I. O., which is the organization concerned in the Ward case, is the chief, earliest, and most ardent group urging a fourth term; that Mr. Sidney Hillman, head of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, has an admitted campaign fund of $700,000 and is vociferously demanding the Roosevelt reelection; that Attorney General Biddle is the official who, in March 1942, urged a gathering of radicals to "hold the political trench," declaring that "the New Deal is a political party tied up with the labor movement under an able political leader."

It may be, as his friends contend, that the President has no thought of politics and is concentrating wholly upon the war. But these are the facts. Nor does the known hostility of Mr. Lewis to the President affect them. Mr. Lewis and Mr. Murray, of the C. I. O., are not friends either, but that did not prevent Mr. Murray from standing with Mr. Lewis when the test came 2 years ago.

It may be that before this case is over the great mass of unattached voters will understand the degree to which Mr. Roosevelt and his administration are "tied up" to the labor bosses. And that might make it worth while.

Poland's National Holiday

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a very interesting and enlightening editorial that appeared in the publication of the Lynn Daily Item, Lynn, Mass., on May 2, 1944:

POLAND'S NATIONAL HOLIDAY

Tomorrow, May 3, is Poland's national holiday. It commemorates the signature on May 3, 1791, of the Polish Constitution, one of the world's greatest documents of freedom, like the Magna Carta, the declaration of the rights of man, and the American Declaration of Independence.

Poland was less fortunate than the United States in maintaining her independence. The new constitution, recognizing the equality of all men and extending religious liberty to all, was more than Catherine the Great of Russia could stand. In 1793 Poland was again dismembered, and on October 24, 1795, Poland ceased to exist as an independent state until the day dawned in 1918, when she again resumed the place that was hers among the nations of the earth. Her brief period of freedom was interrupted on September 1, 1939, by Hitler's unprovoked aggression which began the present war.

Poland has never ceased to resist the Nazis. The Polish Army, Navy, and Air Force have fought in France, Norway, and Libya. Polish flyers took part in the Battle of Britain and are in action every day over Germany. Polish divisions are now fighting side by side with their American and British allies on the Italian front. The Polish Navy is doing its full share in the Battle of the Seven Seas. Poland has never had a Quisling. Her underground carries on a relentless struggle against the German invaders.

The large population of Polish descent in Lynn will celebrate tomorrow with mingled emotions—sorrow at Poland's present plight and joy in the knowledge that Poland still fights on and that her new day of liberation is not far off.

Polish Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I am happy on this significant occasion to join in tribute to the people of Poland and the indomitable spirit which they have shown throughout the centuries.

Non one can turn the pages of history without realizing the brilliant contribution which the Polish people have made to mankind in the field of literature, in the field of music, in the field of science, in the military and other fields.

No one can travel throughout Poland, meeting some of its outstanding leaders as it was my privilege to do in days gone by, without sensing the genius of the people.

We in America know many whose forebears lived in Poland. We are fortunate in having in America over 3,000,000 people of Polish descent. They have contributed greatly to the life of the Nation in time of peace and today on the home front and on the fighting fronts overseas, are playing their part in the worldwide struggle by the United States for freedom and independence.

America and Poland have had much in common in their love of liberty, justice, and peace.

America and Poland have evidenced their friendship in experience shared and in mutual assistance rendered in time of need.

During the Revolutionary War it was General Kosciuszko and General Pulaski who came to the assistance of America.

During and after the First World War it was our own national leaders who contributed so greatly to the rebirth and rebuilding of Poland.

Today the two nations again stand shoulder to shoulder in the struggle throughout the world for liberty.

The soldiers of Poland have been fighting for almost 5 years. They have fought brilliantly in many theaters of the war. They have fought on land. They have fought in the air. Their aviators have won especial renown. The have fought on despite unbelievable suffering inflicted upon those at home.

The spirit of Poland which proved indomitable, despite 150 years of occupation and partition by the forces of three empires, is again proving itself indomitable today. May that spirit find its reward, with the overwhelming victory of the United Nations, in the reconstruction of a free and independent Poland, worthy of the ideals and courage of its people, playing a useful role in the family of nations.

Resolution of Supreme Council, Order Sons of Italy in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I have asked permission to insert a resolution unanimously adopted by the Supreme Council of the Order Sons of Italy in America at its meeting on April 1, 1944. At this meeting the Supreme Council appointed a committee consisting of the following persons:

Hon. Edward Corsi, of New York City—a member of the cabinet of Governor Dewey—chairman; Judge Felix Forte, Supreme Venerable; Judge Eugene Alessondrone, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Judge Francis X. Mancuso, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; Hon. Joseph Gorrasi, of Massachusetts; Dr. Louis Luigi Scala, of Providence, R. I.; Hon. Frank Pallaria, of New Jersey; Hon. Charles Cultrone, of Los Angeles, Calif.; Attorney S. M. LoPresti—assistant to the Supreme Venerable—of Cleveland, Ohio; Attorney George Spatuzza, of Chicago, Ill.; Hon. Frank J. Carbone, of Tacoma, Wash.; Attorney John Musacchio, of Baltimore, Md.; Antonio Guidice of Charleston, W. Va.; Dr. Frank Gigliotti, of LaMesa, Calif.; Leonard H. Pasqualicchio, of Washington, D. C.; Attorney Anthony Tapogana, of Connecticut; Salvatore Parisi, Supreme Secretary.

This committee represents practically all of the exponents of the 6,000,000 Americans of Italian extraction who contributed in a large measure for the persuasion of the Italian regime to accept the American invasion.

The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas conditions in liberated Italy call for urgent and immediate measures of relief, all reports from that unfortunate country indicating that poverty is widespread, the means of bare subsistence facing the entire population, and confidence in the United Nations waning because of our failure to act; and

Whereas millions of friends of the Italian people in this country are ready and able to assist the Italian people with funds, food, clothing, and other necessities of life by generous voluntary contributions; and

Whereas until now, because of the refusal of the Federal Government to authorize the formation of an Italian relief committee, similar to the committees of other oppressed peoples of Europe already operating in the field, the friends of Italy in America have been estopped from aiding that unfortunate country; and

Whereas we feel that this failure of the Federal authorities to authorize the formation of an appropriate committee is extremely unfair to the friendly people of Italy;

We, the Supreme Council of the Order of the Sons of Italy in America, representing the largest organization of Americans of Italian origin throughout the country, call upon the President of the United States and the War Relief Board to extend approval to an Italian relief committee to be formed by the Order of the Sons of Italy in America with power to conduct a Nation-wide relief campaign among friends of Italy in the United States, and that this committee be included as a member agency in the forthcoming drive of the national war fund.

The Late Reverend Stanislaw A. Iciek

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. B. J. MONKIEWICZ

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. MONKIEWICZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include therein the following:

On Sunday, April 30, 1944, in St. Joseph's Church at Norwich, Conn., it was my privilege to be present and participate at a posthumous presentation of the officer's cross of the Order of Polonia Restituta to the late Reverend Stanislaw A. Iciek, former pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Norwich. The presentation was made by the Honorable Sylvin Strakacz, consul general of Poland, in the presence of the entire parish and many guests from all parts of the State of Connecticut and the United States. Later, the congregation and the visitors attended exercises in Reverend Iciek's honor at the Pulaski Hall in Norwich. These exercises were attended by the officials of the city and town of Norwich, including the mayor and the first selectman and also State officials which included a representative of Gov. Raymond E. Baldwin and the Honorable JOHN MCWILLIAMS, United States Representative from the Second District of Connecticut. This was an honor that Father Iciek indeed deserved. Those who are not acquainted with his work may ask, "Who was Father Iciek?". In order to answer this query, I feel honored to relate the following facts about him:

THE LIFE OF THE LATE REV. STANISLAW A. ICIEK

was born on October 30, 1882, in Hilliards, Mich. He attended a local parochial school, the Polish Seminary, in Detroit, Mich., and the Theological Seminary at St. Paul, Minn. He was ordained to the holy priesthood in 1905. Later he served as pastor of several parishes in the Duluth diocese.

During World War No. 1 he was very active in many patriotic movements, particularly in the Liberty Loan campaigns and Red Cross activities. He offered his services to the armed forces of the United States, but was rejected. He thereupon volunteered as chaplain in the Polish Army then being recruited in America, and served with them overseas. Later he volunteered his services and worked with the Hoover food mission in Europe and was the first Polish-American to enter reborn Poland, where he spent several months in humanitarian activities.

Upon his return to the United States, always an ardent patriot, he devoted his life to acquaint his fellow countrymen, particularly the Polish immigrant, with the greatness and glory of the United States.

He was a writer of outstanding ability, and for nearly 40 years constantly contributed countless articles to the Polish and American press on various topics, particularly on the history of the United States, of which he was a great student.

A traveler of great experience, he covered the entire country from one end to the other numerous times, later publishing a three-volume book, America, the Beautiful, in which he depicted every phase of American progress, history, natural resources, geographical advantages, and so forth, with the ultimate motive of acquainting the Americans of Polish descent and the Poles in Europe with the beauty and development of the United States.

He was also the author of several other Polish books dealing mostly with our American way of life. He was chief editor of the Polish homiletic monthly, The Pulpit, which, since the outbreak of the war, was the only Polish publication of its kind in the world. His column in the Pittsburczanin, a Polish daily newspaper, was read widely.

The last 2 years of his life were devoted to his last literary work. Their Grandson, of which the renowned writer, historian, soldier, and philosopher, Rupert Hughes says:

He who would know the soul of Poland and its people, past, present, and future, could hardly do better than read Their Grandson, by S. A. Iciek. It is fascinating, human, and rich in information. From the most ancient times to the present the Polish ideal has been the same, through periods of triumph, as of prolonged and tragic oppression; proud, indomitable, unchangeable. Even in the times of its monarchy, the kings were elected. The ideal of the individual right and of democratic purposes brought forth documents and laws centuries before the United States put them in practice and gave them power. The Polish rule that the kings could make no laws without the consent of the gentry long preceded Magna Carta. "Give me liberty or give me death" was the Polish cry long before Patrick Henry voiced it. There were Poles in Virginia with Capt. John Smith before the Puritans reached New England. In our Revolutionary War, the Poles Kosciusko and Pulaski were of immense help. Polish immigrants have flocked to the United States in great numbers, bringing with them no ideologies foreign to our own and contributing nobly to our best citizenry.

Though predominantly a Catholic country, it was a Catholic Pole, John Zamoyski, who said: "I would like all Poles to become Papists, but I will lay down my life to protect from persecution those who do not."

The author of this book became a priest and served as chaplain with the Polish troops sent from America in World War No. 1. His heart is imbued with the American spirit of religious freedom and equality. He was born of Polish immigrants and grew up with them as they built themselves homes in the wilderness. He knows America and is a true American without being the less a lover of the Polish traditions and ideals.

He was one of the first Americans to visit Poland and other countries of Europe immediately after World War No. 1. He returned to Poland and saw the miracle the young republic had wrought just before Hitler overwhelmed the Nation.

He gives most vivid pictures not only of Poland as she was, but as she might have been. He knew many of the great leaders—Paderewski, Haller, and others. He published a book describing America for the Poles as a result of travels throughout our land. In this book he gives an astounding account of both the great and the humble Poles who have become as good Americans as our best. He tells in detail of Poland's recent relations with Russia, of the effort of Russia to overwhelm Poland, and of the devastating defeat administered to the Bolsheviki. He recounts the treaties Russia made with Poland at a time when Russia was overwhelmed with disaster and needed Polish help—those treaties which Russia is speaking of with contempt now that she is on the crest of the returning tide.

The book is filled with captivating pictures of Polish life in all its phases, from the peasantry at home to the pioneers in America. It is filled with information and inspiration. It is a noble work splendidly accomplished.

Unfortunately, Reverend Iciek did not see his book published, having suddenly dropped dead in New York on March 17 while on his way to the publishers.

Reverend Iciek's willingness to sacrifice was of course, shown very early in his life when he adopted the rigorous obligations that the Catholic priesthood imposes. His special mental capacities made him all the more valuable as a priest, because he was able to delve into the mysteries of eternity and marshal naked truths together for the relief of suffering, discouraged, and wrecked souls. To this we might add that his wholesome personal character was an attribute that very few possess.

As one of the Catholic Church, I shall always be happy and proud to preserve in my memory this minister of God. As an American of Polish descent, I am grieved, and I know that I am only one of thousands upon thousands who will experience the vast emptiness in our lives occasioned by his departure.

Perhaps it was his anxiety to give to us the results of the fullness of his life that made him gear all his energies in order to benefit the people that he served and those to whom he wanted to be useful. His abilities of course, were quite evident in the fluent expression of thought in two languages—English and Polish—which he commanded masterfully. Whether it was at the dinner table, in the pulpit or on the public platform, or through the medium of the pen, his genius was apparent. He was rugged and pioneering and commanded confidence and respect. He was strong but merciful and generous and these qualities made him lovable. He was comfortable in any company and his manner never changed whether he was in the presence of the lowliest or the most dignified.

The parish of St. Joseph in Norwich has really lost a dear, devoted, and a most adored guiding pastor. The community of Norwich has been bereaved of its most distinguished citizen. The State of Connecticut will miss his strong contributions to its life.

We in America who have been wont to follow his activities and his life, to seek his counsel and hear his speeches and read his books will not be able to replace him for a long, long time. His friends mourn for him. Those who disagreed with him also bow with reverent respect to his memory.

The present important world problems, of course, received his most devoted attention. He was a good, loyal American patriot, but he also loved the land of his forefathers. His interest in both made him a student of history. His analyses of and his contribution to these problems will be missed. He did leave for us, however, the fruits of his productive mind. From these we might derive much sustenance for strength for the future. They will also preserve him in our memories, and in the memories of those who will come after us, as a guiding light for the tired and worn and as an inspiration to strive for those accomplishments which make our lives useful to God and man.

The world has lost a devoted servant of God, a philosopher, and a statesman.

Do We Want Facts About Liquor?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED ROWE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks and include a certain article, I want to say if the Congress seriously wants facts about the illicit, vicious, flagrant, law-violating practices in the traffic of whisky almost within the shadows of the Capitol dome, here is a newspaper correspondent who offers figures, facts, names, and addresses. His article here printed is indeed an enlightening commentary on the Department of Justice, the F. B. I., and our Capital's reputed fine Police Department.

The article follows:

A CURB-SERVICE BOOTLEGGER NOT FAR FROM WHITE HOUSE

(By Earl Wilson)

WASHINGTON, April 17.—I just left a cab driver who said: "My, my, some people surely do get drunk." I observed that I also had noticed this.

"Yes," he said, "I just had a couple that was so drunk, the man gave me $5 to carry the woman in the house. I just folded her up and put her on my back and carried her in." Inasmuch as he told me all this practically in the shadow of the White House, I blushed furiously for several seconds, then decided to tell you something I found at 3:30 o'clock Sunday morning, about a dozen blocks from the White House.

A curb-service bootlegger. Just what we've been waiting for. A bootlegger who makes drinking easy. Takes the hardship out of it.

He was lean and sinister-looking, with a pulled-down hat, and he came right out into the dark street to take my order for a bottle of scotch. "Service" is his motto; he gives southern hospitality with a smile. He should go far and don't ask me to what jail. He has an office. In fact, he was waiting in it. It was a Buick roadster parked in the driveway of a tire service station at Fourteenth and P Streets NW.

He uncoiled from it, hustled the booze from a small brick house, then slid back into the car to wait for other patrons who are his fans.

At least I was one till he told me the price of his dynamite; later when I got a look at the bottle in the light, my confidence flagged further. I now suspect him of ignoble ethics.

I came here to watch some of the swell comedians now appearing in Congress. But I went to the night clubs for a story because of the post-Easter lull. From my room across from the National Press Building I can see, with the naked eye, the Washington correspondents yawning. No wonder; the Senate in two sessions last week met for 39 minutes. This drove me to the curb-service bootlegger—and please get this straight; just anybody can't buy from him. You've got to know somebody influential like, say, a cab driver.

We met our gabby cabby while exploring some of the chartered "private clubs," which take care of the tipplers who want to go on guzzling after the curfew, which is midnight Saturday and 2 a. m. weekdays.

These private clubs are as private as the Yankee Stadium. The members bring guests. Hang on till we look at the Spotlight Guild, at Seventeenth and M.

At 2:45 a. m. it's dark and lonely as we come up to the big building with the sign that says, "Harry's Parking." It seems empty of life. But we knock on a wooden door. A doorman peeks out and lets us in. Here's a big room with low lights, some drinkers at tables, a soldier passed out in a chair. The big excitement's downstairs. A couple of girls are arguing on the stairs.

"Course I'm drunk," one says. "Everybody's drunk."

It's a lie. I'm not. Many aren't. A naval captain makes a few passes at gals. A small orchestra blares against the uproar of 200 to 300 voices. It's noisy, dark, and close.

You have to bring your own bottle here unless you want only a cola drink or ginger-ale. A show's coming up at 3:30 a. m. We leave, go to the Club Lamplighters, also a private club where you bring your own bottle. A doorman studies you through a glass panel.

We are leaving here when the gabby cabby loads us in and begins bragging he's taken 15 or 20 into that private club tonight.

I asked him how.

"Just knocked on the door," he said. "It's for anybody's got a buck." He looked at me and noticed my unmistakably sober countenance and said, "Whats wrong; ain't you happy?"

"Oh, we just haven't any bottle."

"You want a bottle?" He almost shouted. He could see now that we were real people worthy of his friendship. I'm not saying he was a steerer; I'm not even mentioning it.

To be truthful with you, I didn't want a bottle * * * but this, in the National Capital, which doesn't permit sale of liquor at all on Sunday, sounded interesting. "Where do you go—to a kitchen or cellar or something?"

"Nah—just to a parked car. They make it easy for you in Washington."

It was just a block away. Two men sat in the Buick. As we pulled up the lean one came to the cab; his pal, a lookout, sat there. The curb service bootlegger made me begin the conversation.

What did he have?

"Johnny Walker Red Label." "O. K.," I said. He headed up P Street, crossed to a brick house, came out in a minute, looked up and down the street, then walked to us, holding the bottle, which was in a brown paper sack, in his coat pocket. I magnanimously handed him a $10 bill.

"Twelve," he said.

"Twelve," I spluttered. That made it about $6 or $7 above retail. I left, with all the license numbers, house numbers, and everything, in case anybody wants to investigate, and when I got my little bundle of joy home I looked at it lovingly and—the Government stamp had been broken. It had been opened and cut, obviously; I wonder if with Potomac River water? To think I'd done it when I wasn't stinkin'.

A Brave and Heroic People

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, I was greatly impressed by the tributes that were paid to Poland on the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the adoption of the Polish Constitution. We in America, after passing through our colonial stage, realized fully the value of a written constitution, which was to be the law of the land and the beacon light for future generations.

Poland adopted its constitution just 2 years after our Constitution had been adopted and Washington had become the first President of the United States. We have long felt an admiration for the brave and heroic people of Poland, who through their years of suffering and tribulation, have a continuing determination that their Poland shall once again assume its full and proper place in the history of the world.

They are a brave people, an intellectual people, a religious people; and by their strong determination manifested through their many years of turmoil and trouble will definitely restore Poland to its proper place. The Polish people of today and their descendants everywhere are joining with the other liberty-loving nations of the world in order to establish governments of the people and by the people throughout the world.

During the years of Poland's continued struggle for liberty, her people have never lost sight of their goal of freedom. Wherever the sons of Poland have wandered from their mother country, they have always been among the leaders of those advocating freedom and self-government of the people.

It is perfectly fitting and proper that the great Polish Nation should be commended for her zeal and efforts for a full restoration of their Poland. The Polish people of my home town of Flint and my district have a right to be proud of their native land and have a further right to be proud of the splendid contributions which the people of Poland have made toward world civilization and progress.

The O. W. I. Handbook

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, there has just come to my attention a tribute from Great Britain to the O. W. I.'s Handbook of the United States of America, which has been the subject of a good deal of uninformed discussion in this country. Members will recall that this fact book, prepared by our Office of War Information for its overseas staff, was republished by a private British publisher because it contributed to a better understanding of us among the British people. The handbook has now been reviewed in flattering terms in the April 14 issue of the Spectator, one of the oldest and most distinguished of British weeklies. The author of the review is Prof. Denis W. Brogan, of Cambridge University, an editor of the British Dictionary of National Biography and one of the foremost authorities on the United States in Great Britain today. The following is the text of his article:

FACTS ABOUT AMERICA

(By D. W. Brogan)

"In this catalog of books which are no books—biblia abiblia—I reckon court calendars, directories * * * the works of Hume, Gibbon, Robertson, Beattie, Soame Jenyns and, generally, all those volumes which 'no gentleman's library should be without.'" It is pretty certain that Charles Lamb would have classed a Handbook of the United States of America, Pertinent Information About the United States and the War Effort (Hutchinson, 10s. 6d.), as a specimen of the biblia abiblia that he detested. But there are tougher souls for whom this mass of information will be nourishment and who will have reason to be grateful to the Office of War Information and its Overseas Branch for making it available here. It is true that little has been done to conceal that this is roughage. Grim pages of small and unattractive print may put off the mere idler, the lounger in the flowery fields of statistics and crude, unprocessed information, but the reader who is in good training will be very amply rewarded. In short, this is a book which every editorial library should possess, and which by its very factual sobriety does a better job than many more lively impressionistic works have done.

First of all, it makes clear how great have been the changes imposed by the war on the American governmental structure. The old simple division into executive, legislative, and judicial branches, the division of the executive into the great Cabinet departments and the independent agencies, the division between the Union and the States, these classical landmarks are hidden beneath a deep, lush growth of new bodies, under unclassifiable heads, exercising new powers in all kinds of relationship with the old units of government, from harmonious symbiosis to civil war. Much of the permanent growl of discontent from Washington comes from innocent and lost wayfarers who hope to find their way through the war Capital with the comparative ease of 1939. There was in Washington, 2 years ago, an information bureau designed to help people like these, and it did help them, but this book, even more effectually than what was unkindly called Melletts madhouse, will do the job both for the bold explorer who dares the risks and discomforts of a journey to Washington and the fireside traveler who simply wants to know what is going on and is content with vicarious experience.

By the very elaboration of the picture painted in detail by the first section of this book, it is made easier for British stay-at-homes to understand some of the American irritation at what, by the national tradition, is superfluous bureaucracy. For many Americans still dream dreams of the days when all men were masters of all political trades and when business was supposed to have secrets hidden from the politicians and bureaucrats. They are wrong—how wrong this book, unconsciously, perhaps, makes clear. But it nevertheless is a source of irritation to a patriotic and indignant citizenry to discover that somehow the bureaucrats stay and grow. It may in time (after this year's elections, perhaps) be learned that you can have good and bad bureaucrats, but that you must have bureaucrats—which is a lesson for us, too. Whitehall may be less of a hothouse than Washington, but Whitehall does not publish guides to its own Kew Gardens of new departments and old ones redone.

But there is a larger and more interesting section in this book: the collection of basic facts. We learn a great many things that ought to interest us, even if we do not always come easily to believe that figures prove or even suggest as much as a chamber of commerce hand-out suggests. There are, taken at random, such figures as 22,500,000 books published, 216,000 degrees conferred by universities and colleges, nearly 4,000,000 college graduates, and a yearly average expenditure on elementary and high-school pupils of $105 per head. Fifty million visitors entered museums, and 1,250,000 pints of blood had been collected for plasma by the end of 1942. There are 56,000,000 radios (nearly 2 for each family group) and 6,000 television sets. There were 21 major short-wave stations and 15 more under construction. "Under centralized control, they direct transmissions to all parts of the world, in nearly 40 languages and dialects." There were 24,250,000 telephones, "about half the world's total."

Basic facts of a more important kind are here, too. We learn of that decisive dividing line between the adequately watered and semiarid zones. It runs roughly up 103°, usually simplified into the short-grass and long-grass divide of 100°. East are the farmlands, west are (or should be) the ranches. "For sustenance, each head of cattle needs from 12 to 320 acres of grazing land, depending on the quality of the range. Approximately 263,000,000 acres of grazing land sustain the West's livestock production, an area about five times as large as Great Britain." But more surprising is the limited amount of good farm land available. "There are about 460,000,000 acres of good arable land, of which about 350,000,000 acres were in crops in 1942." And only about 130,000,000 acres of land were entirely free from erosion—whose chief cause is not the tearing wind, but the pounding, sudden, heavy rain. We are assured that this time everything possible is being done to prevent that reckless plowing-up of what was really nonarable land that did so much harm in 1917–18. Can it be that there is a lesson for us here?

And, as we contemplate the tide of American production flooding in, we should always remember the great peacetime industry that beat its electric razors into tank parts, its refrigerators into planes. "January 1942 saw the last gaming machine produced; February the last passenger automobile; March, the last piece of metal office furniture for civilian use. In April, production of civilian trucks, radio receivers, gramophones, refrigerators, amusement machines, slot machines, and vacuum cleaners halted. In May, production of household washing machines, automatic ironers, residential coal stokers and oil burners, commercial laundry equipment (except for military use), metal household furniture, safes, vaults, electric roasters, toasters, waffle irons, grills, razors, and a dozen smaller items stopped. June saw the last metal casket and burial vault, the last lawn mower and commercial dry-cleaning machine for other than military use. In July, production of bed springs, bicycles, and household sewing machines ended." This is the reverse of lend-lease; it was the turning over of this productive capacity to military uses that was decisive. (It illustrates the American inflationary problem, too.) This turn-around could not have been achieved but for Pearl Harbor. Hitler may well curse his Japanese ally. He and the Third Reich will be buried in that last metal "casket" which is the coffin of his illusions and hopes.

One Hundred and Fifty-third Anniversary of the Enactment of the Polish Constitution

OF

HON. JAMES J. HEFFERNAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. HEFFERNAN. Mr. Speaker, May 3 is the one-hundred-and-fifty-third anniversary of the Polish Constitution. The enactment of this constitution in 1791 was, for that time, a highly democratic constitutional reform. This day has always been celebrated in Poland as the greatest national holiday. As it cannot be thus celebrated in Poland now it would be just and proper for us lovers of freedom and democracy to take over and remind the world that Poland was not only the first nation in Europe to write a constitution granting individual rights to all her citizens, but has through the years struggle mightily against oppression.

On September 1, 1939, Hitler ordered his armies to attack Poland and began a war which has spread throughout the world. Hitler was strong; the Poles were not. In 4 weeks the campaign was over, but the defense of Gdynia and the heroic resistance at Warsaw will be long remembered. The Poles have not surrendered; the Polish Government in London leads thousands of Poles who have escaped the Nazi hordes and continue in active service against them. They continue to hold high the burning light of freedom which was instituted in 1791 with their constitution's writing.

Poland is a nation with a past—in science with Copernicus and Mme. Curie; in music with Chopin and Paderewski; in statesmanship with Casimir the Great, John Sobieski, and Kosciuszko. We must not forget also Julian Ursyn Niemcewicz, prominent Polish statesman, poet, playwright, and political leader, who played such a large part in the enactment of the Polish Constitution of May 3, 1791, commemorated today. Poland is a nation with a future. For that future the Poles are fighting, in common purpose with the other United Nations. The spirit of its indomitable people will never be crushed; resistance will continue until the Nazi conqueror, who thought to break the Polish spirit, will find he is beaten.

In connection with this one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the Polish Constitution it would be fitting to mention Poles in America. It is believed that Jan of Kolno, a Polish sailor, reached Labrador and explored the Atlantic coast as far south as Delaware Bay in 1475. There were Poles in John Smith's settlement at Jamestown in 1607 and in New Amsterdam from 1659. Infiltration of Poles into these United States produced a hardy, industrious people who have contributed greatly to the richness of our country. Wherever busy industry may be found—in sugar refineries, plants producing agricultural implements and rolling stock, cotton mills, furniture factories, coal mines, in the meat-packing and leather trades—you will find the industrial Pole. Also we must not forget the Pole's love of the land and his hard work which has produced so many successful farms throughout these United States.

Therefore, it is with pleasure that I salute undefeatable and immortal Poland. Together with the other United Nations, we are dedicated to help Poland survive and to reestablish a strong and healthy independence, not only for the sake of the Poles but also for the benefit of the world in the future—an independence that is the cherished possession and trust of all freedom-loving Americans.

School Lunches

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following reprint of broadcast by Fulton Lewis, Jr., over the Mutual network Tuesday, April 18, 1944:

I learned today that the Senate Committee on Agriculture has been flooded with mail from all parts of the country about an issue that is coming before that Committee on Agriculture in the very near future and which I think will be interesting to you particularly if you happen to have any children. It involves the low-cost hot lunches for school children all over the Nation, and at the moment there is a threat to discontinue that program, in fact the appropriation of some $50,000,000 to finance the Federal Government's share of the program was stricken out of the agricultural appropriations bill in the House of Representatives about a month ago and these letters are demanding that it be restored to the bill in the Senate Agriculture Committee.

Perhaps I had better give you a little background on this school-lunch program because it is the past and the future that are chiefly important in deciding whether the program should be continued or not at this time. It was started back in 1935 at a time when the Surplus Commodity Corporation in Washington was buying up large quantities of surplus farm produce of various kinds, the buying being done to help support the price of those farm products by absorbing the surplus production which would have knocked the bottom out of the market. The Government, having these farm products on hand, began distributing them to local welfare agencies all over the country and considerable quantities were given to school organizations to help provide lunches for the schools.

One of the most important commodities was milk, of which there was a tremendous surplus all through those years, and it is pretty hard to question the wisdom of any plan by which surplus food of that kind, particularly surplus milk above all things, is turned into the building of better and stronger bodies for the school children of the Nation, instead of being dumped into sewers or allowed to spoil. What's more, this was chiefly a local program in which the help of the Federal Government was only a small factor and that still is true, by the way. For example, a local parent-teachers' association or a Kiwanis Club or the Rotary or the Lions or some such organization sponsor the school-lunch program in one or more schools where there are needy children; they make a cash contribution and in some cases the city government also helps out, but over the broad average the lunches have cost all told about 2 cents per child. The contribution by the Federal Government has been the equivalent of about 9 cents per lunch, 9 of the 27 cents, and the local interests have made up the other 18 cents.

The average cost to the individual child has been between 10 and 15 cents per lunch. That is what little Willie pays across the counter. But this year, for example, some 800,000 children have been given their lunches absolutely free, children who couldn't even pay the 15 cents. With the stress of wartimes and the dislocations, the surplus products from the farms have just about disappeared, so the foundation upon which the entire Federal Government participation was based has been largely swept away. There are some periodic surpluses here and there, but they are not large and the materials which the Government buys probably could be disposed of in other channels, so beginning last year in order to keep the program going the Congress appropriated $50,000,000 in cash, the money to be distributed to the local school lunch agencies in the place of actual food commodities. The requirement is, however, that that money be used to buy certain specified things, a list of which is provided from time to time, that list being, of course, the commodities of which there is the greatest abundance or of which there actually at the moment is a surplus.

In the House of Representatives, however, the appropriation was stricken out this time, and unless it is restored in the Senate Agriculture Committee it would appear that the Federal Government is going out of the school-lunch program.

The argument was used that the surpluses are gone, therefore the justification no longer exists.

The counter-argument, however, is that the moment the war is over the surpluses will reappear as serious as ever or worse, and it may happen before the war is over. When it does happen, this machinery will be just as much needed as it ever was, and unless it is kept alive in the meantime the whole thing will have to be rebuilt after the war. It took years to build up the machinery of this school-lunch program; it will take years to build it again, and it seems penny-wise and pound-foolish to wreck the whole structure now merely on the strength of extraordinary conditions of the moment.

Executive Authority

OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Mark Sullivan from the Washington Post of May 3, 1944:

EXECUTIVE AUTHORITY
(By Mark Sullivan)
EXTREME EXTENSION

If the Montgomery Ward case stood alone, it might be regarded as a casual step out of bounds, unpremeditated and taken in the hurry and pressure of war, without realizing its nature and consequences. Even if the policy and course of action underlying the step, the policy of enlarged powers for the Executive had been adopted only for the emergency of war, if there had been no such course of action before the war, and if no such course were anticipated after the war—in that event the course might be looked on with some tolerance (though by no means could there be tolerance for the extraordinary assertion of Attorney General Biddle that, in time of war, the President does not need authorization by statute, that by his inherent powers as Commander in Chief he can take any step which his judgment deems necessary.

If a step outside the Constitution, outside the established pattern of governmental practice, were taken by a public official to whom such a step is repugnant; if it were taken with regret and only because of the emergency of war; and if we could feel sure that the public official taking such a step and following such a course would be quick to abandon it when the emergency was ended—in such a condition the step might be regarded without great concern.

But the country is obliged to remember that the seizure of Montgomery Ward, as an extreme extension of the power of the Executive, is kin to a course and attitude that existed before the war. It is unhappily not possible for the country to look upon the Roosevelt administration as one which, in normal peacetime, had meticulous regard for the Constitution; which was careful to restrain itself within the limitations of its Executive powers, careful to have regard for the powers of Congress and the courts, and for the rights of citizens. The country is obliged to look at the present extreme assertion of Executive power during wartime in the light of a course of action that went on during several years preceding the war.

That the administration, during peacetime, followed a course leading toward extension of the Executive power is a familiar fact. It is not merely a charge made by the administration's opponents and critics. It is the verdict, in many cases, of impartial persons, even of persons prevailingly sympathetic to the administration. It has been the observation of persons trained to observe, the judgment of persons equipped with the background for judgment.

While this tendency of the administration has prevailed at all times, it became conspicuous in the summer of 1937. That was when Mr. Roosevelt had sent to Congress his measure for changing the Supreme Court, and followed that up with a group of far-reaching measures, one of which would have reorganized and enlarged the Executive branch of Government, and transferred a degree of power from the legislative to the Executive. At that time, among other critics, Dorothy Thompson made a careful analysis of the measures and concluded that they were "profoundly revolutionary." She added:

"These bills are not isolated measures, but add up to a consistent picture, and the picture is of a tremendously centralized government, with a power and authority vested in the President, not far from equal to the power and authority vested in Mussolini or in Stalin."

It was about the same time that Mr. Walter Lippmann wrote: "I feel, let us hope mistakenly, that he (President Roosevelt) really does have a plan and that he is determined to execute it. * * * It is a plan, as I see it, to gather together an irresistible power over the economic life of this country and to consolidate that power in the hands of his own following * * * irresistible power personally directed. * * * These fears, I regret to say, are shared by men who have occupied high places in this very administration and in the confidence of Mr. Roosevelt himself."

The fears Mr. Lippmann spoke of have been and are in the minds of many, in Congress and outside. They account for a further apprehension, now expressing itself in connection with the seizure of Mongomery Ward. The apprehension is that extensions of Executive authority, practiced in time of war, and for which justification is claimed on the ground of war, may have an effect after the war.

One Hundred and Fifty-third Anniversary of the Polish Constitution of May 3, 1791

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH MRUK
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. MRUK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution which was adopted by an assembly of Americans of Polish extraction gathered in Buffalo, N. Y., April 30, 1944, in celebration of the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the Polish Constitution of May 3, 1791:

Whereas each May celebration brings to us a rebirth of courage and a renewal of our pledge to the ideals of freedom, we solemnly observe today, through the gloom of the moment the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the adoption by the Polish Diet in 1791 of the world-famous Constitution of May 3, so justly appraised by the English statesman, Edmund Burke, as "the noblest benefit received by any nation at any time"; and

Whereas we draw our moral strength from that historic document which inspired our ancestors imbued with a feeling of intense national unity in the face of impending danger, to proclaim courageously to the world that "more than life and personal happiness we value external independence and internal freedom"; and

Whereas we are approaching the decisive moment when the Allied operations will bring the liberation of Poland, the first member of the Allied Powers to resist brutal aggression over 4½ years ago, in result of which every tenth Pole has died for the cause of freedom, a record which no other nation has equaled in this cataclysm called World War No. 2; and

Whereas we are fully cognizant of the historic fact that the geographic location of Poland in the vast plain of central Europe between two powerful neighbors, opposite in their culture, both ambitious for territorial expansion, makes the need of a strong and an independent Poland an essential requisite for enduring peace not only in Europe but in the entire world of today; and

Whereas the Soviet Government has declared repeatedly that it stands for the establishment of a strong, independent, and a friendly Poland, and since it is easy to understand that the loss of 51 percent of Polish territory and 37 percent of her people, 85 percent of her oil and natural gas, more than half of her lumber, about half of her chemical industry, her potassium mines, phosphates, and most of her grain—cannot possibly lead to a strong, independent, and friendly Poland; and

Whereas it is a matter of historic record that Poland, in the period of her greatest expansion, when her territory comprised more than double the 150,000 square miles restored to her after the First World War, Poland before the first partition stood out prominently in Europe as an illustrious commonwealth of federated republics enjoying unprecedented religious tolerance, liberty, and freedom based on Christian principles of social justice; and

Whereas sincere cooperation and mutual trust among the Allied Nations are indispensable for bringing on a final victory, we strenuously condemn all agitation and every suggestion of acts tending to divide and weaken the common front of the United Nations, especially at this critical hour in the prosecution of this war for freedom: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That as loyal citizens of the United States we solemnly pledge our unstinted support to the great President Franklin Delano Roosevelt and to our Government in their untiring effort to bring this war to a complete and an early victory conforming to the terms of the various declarations made by the United Nations for a just and enduring peace for all nations, large and small; to this end, we promise first, to increase our purchases of Government bonds, especially at this time of the coming Fifth Loan campaign; secondly, we pledge our increased contributions in money and work for the American Red Cross and other recognized war relief agencies performing missions of mercy to our men and women in the various services, as the zero hour of the allied invasion approaches; thirdly, we further promise conscientious performance of all our duties at home, in war plants, or in other positions working for increased production of supplies, equipment, and weapons with which to arm our sons and daughters in the fight for freedom and justice for all nations; and be it further

Resolved, That after the war is won and the proper moment shall arrive, we shall stand united in our most earnest appeal to the leaders of our Government in Washington and particularly to the President, and to the Secretary of State, to use their good offices as mediators on behalf of the righteous cause of Poland by supporting her determination to maintain the integrity of her territory so that the world may be assured of a lasting peace; and finally, be it

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of State, to the Ambassador of Poland-in-exile to the United States and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

The Jewish Agricultural Society, Inc.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I call attention to the forty-fourth annual report of the Jewish Agricultural Society, which since the beginning of the century has been dedicated to the advancement of farming by Jewish citizens of the country. The encouragement which it has given during those years is today bearing fruit in increased food production for war needs:

THE JEWISH AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY—ITS AIMS AND ACTIVITIES

The Jewish Agricultural Society was founded and is maintained by funds derived from Baron de Hirsch foundations and by virtue of a revolving fund which these endowments created. Its purpose is to encourage and advance farming by Jews in the United States.

Through a department of farm settlement, the society advises those who intend to take up farming as a livelihood and helps the qualified person to get the right farm at the right price and on the right terms. The society acts on the premise that a prime requisite for successful farming is a genuine desire on the part of the individual to farm and that an artificially stimulated desire is apt to wane as soon as the sober realities of farm life are confronted. In the last 10 years over 10,000 people sought the society's advice and the society was responsible for the establishment on farms of 964 families directly, many more indirectly. Of the 739 families settled by the society since 1939—and the 5-year period is taken because the first 5 years are the crucial years for the new farmer—692 are still on their farms.

The society's farm-loan department makes loans not usually obtainable elsewhere, based not strictly on tangible security but also on human factors—faith in the ability of the borrower to make good; a service which any self-respecting man can accept without the sacrifice of prestige or dignity. Since its inception in 1900 the Society has approved 14,371 loans aggregating $8,907,268 in 40 States.

For the Jew, farming is an acquisition, not an inheritance. The task of making a farmer out of a Jew is one of orientation as well as of craftsmanship. Because of his loss of contact with the soil, the Jew needs a special type of service suited to his background and which no public or governmental agency can be expected to provide. Recognizing this, the society maintains a department of agricultural education and extension, designed to bring to the new Jewish farmer agricultural information on all phases of farming. In the more populous Jewish farming districts, Jewish agricultural experts carry their teachings from farm to farm. During 1943 these traveling teachers made 3,134 farm visits, held 144 farm gatherings of various types, with an aggregate attendance of over 7,500. This was in addition to 2,527 individual letters of advice and 4,464 circulars and 2,429 office consultations. The society conducts agricultural night classes for farm aspirants in New York City and Chicago; publishes the Jewish Farmer, an agricultural magazine; maintains a purchasing service for individual farmers and farm cooperatives. It works with farm youth groups.

The society's farm employment department has made 19,669 job placements in 32 States since its inception in 1908. Some of these workers have developed into successful farm operators.

The society's department of rural sanitation carries on work to promote higher standards of sanitation in and about the farm premises. Through farm gatherings, public meetings, demonstrations, and lectures, this department has reached many thousands of rural folk.

The society makes loans for the erection of synagogues and center buildings in Jewish farm communities. For many years it made loans to agricultural students and awarded agricultural scholarships.

Since the advent of refugees, the society has devoted effort to the rehabilitation of those who saw salvation in farming. It has helped to settle refugee families on farms in 12 States.

The society holds that the family farm is the backbone of American agriculture. It is opposed to a system of farming which, while euphemistically termed cooperative, is in essence collectivistic and lacks the voluntary motif of free persons working together toward a common end. From the experience of early Jewish colonization efforts and from resettlement attempts the society has learned that the average American wants to be the possessor of his own farmstead, be it ever so modest or burdened with debt. But the society has from the very beginning been a staunch advocate of those forms of cooperation among farmers which promote the common weal and yet leave individual ownership unfettered. It has helped to organize and it works with cooperatives in the fields of buying, marketing, processing, fire insurance, and credit—all on a nonsectarian basis. It extends credit to cooperative enterprises.

Since the outbreak of the war all these activities have been mobilized toward a single end—to help Jewish farmers achieve maximum food production.

It's Time To Change Horses

OF

HON. HOWARD BUFFETT

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include the written text of an address given by myself before the Douglas County Republican Convention, Omaha, Nebr., April 27, 1944:

Fellow Republicans, there is a lot of confidence and enthusiasm this year among Republicans, who have watched the great upsurge of our strength in the Middle West and throughout the Nation. They see this country going toward a Republican victory like a great tide. I am pleased by their determined energy and enthusiasm, but I want to put in a word of warning.

This country is in the grip of the most powerful political machine the world has ever known. This machine is not going to give up the power it has seized for itself over the lives of the people without a desperate fight. The men who are running the Government in Washington know every angle, every trick, every "sleezy" method to keep your lives under their control. These men are not men who were elected by the people, so that you can only remove them by changing administrations.

There is only one agency which can do that job. That agency is the Republican Party. Accordingly, our party has a solemn and fearful responsibility in 1944. That responsibility divides itself into two parts:

First. To save representative government in America, which is the last major country in the world where the people are at least partially governed by representatives elected at regular intervals.

Second. We have the job, and this is the most complex and difficult part of our task, of saving Government by the consent of the governed in a manner and by methods which will hasten the winning of the war and get your boys back home. These two great objectives, to save representative government in America, and to hasten the winning of the war and get our boys back home as quickly as possible, are not easy to achieve. The New Deal is going to exploit every aspect of this war and its related problems to win the election this fall.

They will say, for example, "Stop politics, and win the war." But, behind this pious phrase, they will play politics 24 hours a day. If they possibly can, they will prevent the American people from throwing out of office those who have betrayed their responsibilities. We must learn from history. The New Deal perpetuated itself in power in 1940 by claiming that it wanted a third term for Mr. Roosevelt "to keep us out of war." It was a clever trick and it worked, but it did not keep America out of war.

Now, they are telling the American people "not to change horses in the middle of the stream." Fellow Republicans, let me warn you of the danger which lies ahead. If this New Deal stays in power another 4 years, the liberty that you and I inherited, and which we should pass on to our children, may be gone forever.

If that prophecy sounds too fearsome, let me remind you of a parallel prophecy by John T. Flynn, in 1940. He stated, "If * * * you reelect the President and the war drums should beat and your son should be marched off to the transports and find himself a grave in some distant land—in Europe or Indochina—fighting to save the colonial possessions of some European empire—do not blame Franklin Roosevelt for it. The blame will be upon your own heads."

The blame for despotism will be on the heads of the people of America, if they allow the New Deal to stay in office another 4 years after their colossal failures of the past 12 years.

"Don't change horses in the middle of the stream." That is an old saw, and may have merit on some occasions. But, it is an assertion that has always been used by bungling failures to keep the reins of office. The New Dealers believe that this is their strongest argument. But, if you examine that argument carefully, it soon falls apart. But first, let us look at the example of England.

In 1940, England had Chamberlain running the government. Chamberlain, the man of Munich. What did the English do after Dunkerque in their hour of supreme trial and crisis? They threw Chamberlain out and put in Churchill. They changed horses right squarely in the middle of the stream, and that change was the action that saved England. I say to you, fellow Republicans, that here in America, 4 years later, a change of horses is the only action that will save America.

They are going to tell you that a change in administration will interfere with the winning of the war. They will say they have the machinery all set up, the job under way, and that control should be left in their hands.

Let us examine that counterfeit logic and expose the humbug in it. Our military effort fits into one of two categories: Either it is being run by the military heads of our Army and Navy, or the politicians are interfering with the direction of war strategy. One or the other. It can't be both.

Either General Marshall and Admiral King are running the war for America, and are making the final decisions—which is as it should be—or Roosevelt and Churchill and other politicians are mixing into the military decisions. Now, if the military men are running the war and a Republican President is elected, which he will be next November, the conduct of the war will stay just where it is and where it ought to be—in the hands of the trained military experts.

If, on the other hand, and this is a big "if," Roosevelt, Churchill, Harry Hopkins, and Henry Wallace are mixing into the military decisions that should be made by the Army and Navy, I can tell you that that kind of damnable monkey business will stop when the Republicans are elected.

Now, let us get this situation straight. The question is whether they are mixing into the military decisions, or whether they are not mixing in these decisions. If they are not mixing in the war effort, a change in leadership can have no affect on the successful conduct of the war except to help dramatically by strengthening the home front. But, on the other hand, if the Palace Guards are mixing into the military strategy and invasion plans, a Republican administration will stop that kind of political finagling.

Now, let us examine the domestic false front which the new dealers plan to use in selling their candidate to the American people. It is their claim that the New Deal has prevented inflation. And, when it comes to gigantic and colossal absurdities, that claim is the worst of all. Here is a similar situation. It would be like you going to your doctor with a badly infected tooth, only to have him pack it with morphine and tell you that he had fixed the tooth and prevented the infection simply because it had stopped hurting.

We have had in this country, price control and price-fixing—and incidentally, as an adjunct to the management of the economic front, price control is necessary—but price control is a dangerous device and is not a preventative of inflation. Price control is like an anesthetic, it is like packing your tooth with morphine. It does not remove either the infection or the cause of the infection. And the infection, as Roosevelt said in 1932—and has violated every year since that time—is an unbalanced Budget.

Spending more than you take in is what sends an individual to the bankruptcy court. Spending by a nation of more than it takes in is what sends a nation into inflation. Reckless spending went on for 9 years before we got into the war and has been going on since we got into the war.

No, the New Deal has not prevented inflation any more than the application of morphine has fixed the aching tooth. All the New Deal has done has been to prevent us from feeling the pain. But, we are beginning to feel it now. Many articles of commerce cannot be bought except in the black markets, and there is chiseling, bootlegging, and economic distress on every hand. The great middle classes of America, the backbone of the country, are being squeezed and beaten down by the impact of higher prices and higher taxes.

Let me, just for the record, here cite you an example of how these clever schemers in Washington are misleading you on the economic front. A few days ago, you were told that the cost of living was remaining stable. They didn't tell you that they don't include taxes in that cost of living index. But, taxes have increased tremendously since the war began, and they are a much bigger part of your cost of living than ever before, and much of our taxes are taken out of our paychecks even before we get them.

Now let me tell you something about the difficulties—we who oppose the New Deal in Washington are up against. This administration possesses more power than any Government has had at any time in the history of the world. No Caesar ever had the armies, the industrial capacity, or the propaganda agencies available to our modern rulers, at his command.

This tremendous power breeds ideas and dreams of imperialism and empire in the minds of the bureaucrats. For example, a few days ago one of the fantastic schemes in the minds of our leaders was brought to light, when Ickes announced that the United States Government was going into partnership with Standard Oil thousands of miles away in desert Arabia.

The fact that power feeds upon itself is proven again and again in the history books. Today, we see it in a so-called New Deal, which has constantly used its power to perpetuate itself in office. We must be prepared to see this effort made cleverly and shrewdly behind the screen of beautiful oratory, noble promises, and glowing reports from the battle fronts.

The New Deal is counting on the emergency which has involved us in war in all corners of the world as a successful alibi for their continuance in office. As a word of caution let me suggest to you that this clever scheme is affecting the minds of some anxious parents, who are desperately worried about their sons and daughters in the armed forces. You will hear some people say that the New Deal is wrong and should be done away with, but that we should wait until the war is over.

Fellow Americans, as long as this gang is in power, there is no hope for a return to normal conditions under which they can be removed from office. In the first place, the New Deal has proven for 12 long years its absolute incapacity to create a normal and healthy condition; secondly, the record indicates that you cannot have a normal situation with the New Deal in power any more than you could teach love, tolerance, and fair play on a battlefield.

In exploiting the crisis alibi, the new dealers are making use of their control of the propaganda agencies of this country to a degree which borders on the sinister. Your actions and mine are governed by the information which is available to us. What you may do in a given situation depends on the facts in your possession.

This administration controls the radio through the F. C. C.; war news is released or not released as the new dealers desire, and the same is true of domestic news. They pull the strings and exercise the controls that determine the sly and hidden propaganda that permeates the movies and the newsreels in every theater in the land. Beyond that they have developed the most unwholesome and vicious smear technique that has ever been known in American history.

In the Voice of Destruction, by Hermann Rauschnigg, which tells of Hitler's rise to power, Hitler is quoted as saying, "I will destroy my opponents by making them look ridiculous and contemptible." Today you see the same tactics being used on outstanding and patriotic Americans.

For example, we are seeing this smear technique used on our senior Senator, HUGH BUTLER. During his first 2 years in office, he had consistently opposed the New Deal, but not until he delivered a body blow at their boondoggling in South America did the high-powered hatchet men go to work. They attacked Senator BUTLER'S figures. They attacked him personally. They attacked his sincerity of purpose, and finally, they used many tricks calculated to blacken his reputation.

The truth is that BUTLER gave the people a realistic picture of the tremendous expenditures of American dollars in Central and South America—with side-line allies who have received from us hundreds of millions in goods, services, and actual gold itself.

The same technique has been used on Senator KENNETH WHERRY. When WHERRY went to Washington, the New Deal used its regular methods on all newcomers. They flattered him and made the usual allurements of parties, teas, and trips to soften him up and bring him into camp. That is a regular part of the New Deal chicanery. They make it very pleasant for a Senator or Congressman who can be influenced in this fashion. Of course, these methods failed on WHERRY. Now they have started to get out the old tar bucket and start their mud-slinging procedures.

You may have seen the actual incident on Senator WHERRY. A sly story was written that WHERRY, a Senator from the Bible belt, was helping get the Police Gazette more paper, but would not help high-grade concerns with their paper problems. This story represented a downright distortion of the facts.

This smear was shrewdly and carefully calculated to make WHERRY look bad with the people in the Middle West. In this particular instance WHERRY called their bluff and exposed the trickery. Donald Nelson got busy immediately and pledged himself to stop that kind of monkey business. Nevertheless, it will go on and on by the New Deal hatchet men against every candidate or Republican officeholder.

The fire of their hate propaganda will be centered most of all on the Republican candidate for President. They will belittle him and cleverly suggest that the Republican candidate is a man of small caliber who is unable to handle the great problems confronting us. Likewise he will be smeared and sniped at from every conceivable aspect. The backroom artists of the New Deal play on every aspect of race, religion, economic life, minorities, and class prejudice in the book. Underlying all these other sources of social disturbance is the hatred of business which has been conducted from the White House since Roosevelt took office in 1932.

The New Deal has striven to undermine the foundation of America, which was builded on the absence of classes. All their devious schemes of creating unrest, disturbance, and distrust lead in just one direction and toward one result—an atheistic, communistic, and totalitarian society where all the great values for which America has stood will be dumped on the scrap heap.

America was built on the great virtues of righteousness, justice, freedom, and opportunity. Under the New Deal, the American home, which glorified these virtues, has been literally torn up by the roots. Your boys and girls have been sent to the four corners of the earth and shifted back and forth across the country until the trains cannot carry them. The manpower bureaucrats have created such a muddle that heads of families don't know from one day to the next whether they are in or out of the Army, and our people get new rules and regulations from the bureaucrats in Washington almost every day.

When the people are poor and desperate, when they lose confidence in each other, and when the middle classes have been destroyed, the country is in a desperate plight. That process of destroying the constitutional Republic has gone a long way in this country.

It is not a question of whether the country can stand a fourth term or not. The basic question which confronts us is whether or not we can recover from three terms of New Deal waste, extravagance, and bungling. For 12 long years the people of America have not exercised their constitutional right to change those in power.

The only practical way the existence of the all-important right can be demonstrated is by its exercise. You can say you know how to drive a car, but the only way you can prove it is by driving one. The same logic applies to freedom in this country, and the only way the American people can prove they are still free and can still choose their own rulers is by throwing this gang out of power.

Fellow Nebraskans, I could go on telling you about things that are going on down in Washington. It makes my heart sick to see how the loyalty, patriotism, enthusiasm, and industry of the common people is being misused by those in whose hands the fate of this Nation currently rests.

But I want to talk to you about the most important aspect of this situation. American boys, right now, are fighting, bleeding and dying all over the world. They have gone willingly, bravely, and courageously to these outposts and far-away places scattered from Suez to Singapore, from Timbuctoo to Iceland. These boys face not only danger on the battle front, but also the ugly dangers behind the lines in every war. And it is all these dangers together which constitute an overpowering reason why we must get them back as soon as possible.

While these boys are gone, we must remember one obligation above all. In Heaven's name let us keep the kind of America they left and the kind of America they are praying they will come back to. We must preserve America as a trusteeship while they are gone.

The brave American patriots who have gone where they were ordered and have died in their tracks on 50 different battle fronts—we must respect their memory by preserving here in America the freedom and opportunity for which they have cheerfully and bravely given their lives. Here is the supreme challenge in 1944. It is not whether the Republicans or the new dealers win this election.

There are a lot of tremendous values in a Republican victory. First, a Republican victory will enable the genuine Jeffersonian Democrats to regain control of their party from this group of new dealers who have taken their party over. Thus America will get back to the actual two-party system so essential to our country.

Second: A Republican victory will stop the deadly march toward totalitarianism via the inflation route. Third: It will establish the fact that the American people have retained their right to change their rulers. These are all great objectives.

Anyone of these benefits make a Republican victory in 1944 worthwhile, but all these benefits are as nothing to the sacred responsibility that we have to preserve America as it was when these boys left. Only a Republican victory will assure them of their heritage.

The founding of America brought new hope to the common people of the world. It was the first land in all recorded history where the ordinary person, born of humble parentage, could rise in the respect and esteem of his fellow man, and his opportunity for advancement was only limited by his own ability and energy. Under that system the common people of America have enjoyed more spiritual happiness and material advantages than the common people of all history.

That America was an America of righteousness, justice, and opportunity. The New Deal is now destroying that kind of America. It has uprooted the home, torn apart the family, and is undermining the churches and the educational systems which prepare our children for the responsibilities of citizenship.

The New Deal is destroying the God-given right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness guaranteed by the Constitution. The New Deal has brought economic disaster to this land and has set class against class.

Unless there is a Republican victory this fall, this will not be the century of the common man which Henry Wallace has been talking about. Instead, it will be the century of the betrayal of the common man. For 150 years, America was truly "the light of the world." It must become "the light of the world" again.

As I have said before, the decisive battle for freedom in this generation will be won or lost in America. Victory will come in that battle November 7, when the Republican Party will drive the threat of slavery from America and reopen the doors of freedom and opportunity.

Polish Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. BYRNE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. BYRNE. Mr. Speaker, I have always felt that the Polish people made the greatest fight for liberty and freedom of all the human beings in the world. For over a thousand years the Polish people strongly adhered to their determination to some day secure absolute freedom for their nation, and it is indeed a glorious coincidence that their constitution was adopted on May 3, 1791, about 2 years after our Constitution was ratified.

We in America have always held that the two great outstanding men of foreign birth who came to our assistance in our Revolution against the mother country were Kosciuszko and Pulaski, and we have always recognized them as of the same caliber as George Washington and Alexander Hamilton.

Today, as in the past, the Polish people and we of the United States of America are fighting shoulder to shoulder for the preservation of our glorious principles which inspired us in 1775 to erect in this country a nation of freemen, and which for over a thousand years inspired the Polish people to adopt their constitution of similar character to our own on May 3, 1791. It is, therefore, highly fitting that the Congress of the United States on this occasion pay high tribute to the magnificent part that Poland is playing in the present war, and I join with great happiness with all my colleagues in assurances of our support for, and interest in, a free and independent Poland as a part of Europe when we have succeeded in the defeat of our enemies.

Operation of Airplanes by Steamship Companies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYLE H. BOREN

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, there appears in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at page A1786, a letter from the Pacific American Steamship Association to the Honorable CLARENCE F. LEA, chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. This letter was inserted in the RECORD by the Honorable SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND, chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The steamship association states that it desires to integrate airplane service with its steamship service, and attacks the Civil Aeronautics Board on the ground that through misinterpretation of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 the steamship companies will be prevented from doing so. The letter is based entirely upon misinformation as to the rulings of the Civil Aeronautics Board.

I also received a copy of the letter which Mr. BLAND inserted in the RECORD, and I have written a reply in an effort to provide the steamship association with accurate information on this important subject. In order that the House will not also be misinformed, there follows a copy of my letter:

DEAR MR. WILLIAMS: Thank you for the copy of your letter to Mr. Lea dated March 20, in which you state that the Civil Aeronautics Board has so interpreted the law as to prevent steamship companies "from using planes integrated with their ships in a complete transportation system between their customary terminals."

I am quite surprised that you should make any such statement. The two cases involving steamship companies which have been decided by the Board both dealt with American Export Steamship Co. In one case the Board denied American Export the right to acquire control of T. A. C. A. Airlines. T. A. C. A. Airlines operated in Central America. American Export Steamship Co. operated to the Red Sea. In the other case the Civil Aeronautics Board denied the steamship company, operating to the Red Sea, the right to operate an air line between New York and Ireland.

How, by any stretch of the imagination, do these rulings bear on the question whether a steamship company can be permitted to use planes "integrated with their ships in a complete transportation system between their customary terminals"?

I strongly suspect that someone has given you misleading information. There is nothing in any decision of the C. A. B. that even suggests that the Civil Aeronautics Act constitutes a bar to the operation of airplanes by steamship companies in conjunction with their customary services, provided that such operation is found to be in the public interest. Your association and other representatives of the steamship companies have been flooding us and the public with the most striking misstatements concerning the rulings of the Civil Aeronautics Board, and I do feel that you must have been given some very faulty information.

I also observe the statement in your letter to the effect that "there has never been any general policy of dividing modes of transportation as these apply to traffic outside the boundaries of the United States." Is not this statement somewhat naive? Until the development of air transportation the only mode of transocean transportation was steamship. Now there are two modes, air and steamship. Consequently the question arose in 1938 whether Congress should not apply to that situation legal provisions similar to those which it has applied in other cases where competing modes of transportation have existed. The action taken in 1938 was very definitely in accordance with a general policy followed in transportation legislation. In fact, in the Panama Canal Act, dealing with railroad interests in certain water carriers, even more drastic restriction was applied to the railroads than has been applied to the steamship companies and other surface carriers in the Civil Aeronautics Act.

Feeding of Children in Nazi-Dominated Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 4 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter written by Howard E. Kershner dealing with the subject of sending food to the children of Nazi-controlled Europe. Mr. Kershner is chairman of the Temporary Council on Food for Europe's Children. I also ask in the same connection to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed by Mr. Kershner to the President of the United States.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We are most grateful to every Member of the Senate and House for the unanimous passage of Senate Resolution 100 and House Resolution 221, both of which urge child-feeding in Nazi-dominated Europe. Experience has shown how it can be done without aiding the enemy and with great benefit to our friends and allies who endure every form of torture to help us in the struggle against the common foe. Strategy and humanity unite in urging immediate action.

The vision and wisdom of the Senators and Congressmen in this instance shows high statesmanship and encourages one to believe that free, intelligent, democratic government will not perish from the earth.

In view of the unanimous action of both Houses of Congress and the overwhelming expression of public opinion it is difficult to believe that action to save these children will be postponed. Evidence of public approval is also very strong in England and the governments of the exiled countries continue their urgent pleas for their children.

The approach of invasion emphasizes the importance of sending food before communication becomes increasingly difficult. When we call upon our tortured allies for a last effort against the foe, we will want them to have the solid encouragement of a little food for their children—the most effective form of propaganda.

If the mercy ship with food from South America, Africa, and if need be a little of what we waste, are not started promptly we trust that you and your fellow Senators and Congressmen will find some way to implement the action already taken in the passage of the resolutions.

With congratulations and best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

HOWARD E. KERSHNER.

APRIL 22, 1944.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,

The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The British Broadcasting Corporation has just warned French listeners (New York Times, April 18) "they had better store up supplies as best they could because the Allies would be able to distribute only limited supplies while the fighting was going on and for some time afterward."

May I suggest, Mr. President, that this emphasizes the importance of sending food to the children of the occupied countries before invasion. Now may be our last opportunity to strengthen the morale of the conquered peoples by this gesture of friendship, before all means of communication are cut off by the disorganization accompanying the reoccupation of Europe.

For 4 years the patriots in the occupied countries have endured every form of torture and martyrdom in order to continue their resistance to the common enemy. They have scorned the inducements of the enemy to submit to the hated regime. At the moment when a last call is about to be made on them to support the action of the invasion troops some tangible evidence in the form of food for their children, showing them that we care and appreciate their help, would stimulate their capacity to render aid to our forces and be more effective than the most eloquent propaganda.

Child feeding in Greece and France has shown that the operation can be so closely controlled that no food gets into German hands and that the enemy is unable to profit even indirectly.

Surplus foods are available; the occupied countries have their own funds to make payment; neutral ships not available for the war effort are ready—only official permission from Britain and America is needed to start relief.

The occupied countries are as anxious to win the war as we are. Their military leaders and their governments believe that child feeding would help and have pleaded for it earnestly. They are a part of the United Nations group, certainly their opinions should be taken into consideration.

If Hitler is permitted to destroy the democratic peoples of Europe by starvation our boys will fight the next war alone. The armies that would have helped will not be born or will be so enfeebled as to be ineffective. The people of these countries have fought for liberty for centuries before our country was born—certainly we shall need their help in reconstruction days ahead. It cannot be right to allow them to perish. Humanity and strategy unite in urging action.

By unanimous vote both Houses of Congress have urged you to act, Mr. President. The Gallup poll shows that the people of this country want the children saved. All religious faiths have urged it; the press has urged it; and innumerable resolutions, petitions, and letters from individuals have been sent to Washington.

We appeal to you, Mr. President, to start the mercy ships before it is too late.

Sincerely yours,

HOWARD E. KERSHNER.

A Monument to the Mothers of America

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I hope every Member of this Congress will be glad to accept joint authorship of a resolution that I have just introduced. It is a joint resolution to erect here in the Capital of the Nation a permanent memorial to the mothers of America. Monuments have been erected to commemorate the noble deeds of soldiers, statesmen, scientists, poets, jurists, and others, but nothing to that sweet and gentle spirit of motherhood.

Mr. Speaker, the two words most hallowed in every language spoken by man are God and mother. God, in every language, means good. Mother, whatever the vocal sound which denotes it in any language, always means to the heart of man one great, deep-rooted sense—love.

Civilization is based upon mothers and mothers' love.

Religion is based upon mothers and mothers' love.

In the sacred manger in Bethlehem, holding, as a tiny mite, the Light of the World, was—mother.

At the foot of the Cross on Calvary, faithful—utterly faithful—in the great trial knelt mother.

Infancy's first consciousness is mother. The last thought of old age must be of mother.

In that one word, mother, is embraced all that is lovely; all that is loving; all that is faithful; all that is long suffering, enduring, forgiving, comforting, understanding, courageous, gentle, self-sacrificing; and all that is noble, all that is beautiful in this strange enigma we call human existence.

It has been written that "The hand that rocks the cradle is the hand that rules the world." It can be written, the hand that rocks the cradle comforts the world, nourishes the world, saves the world from its own follies; and redeems man from his own mistakes.

It is written that God made man in His own image. That image of infinite love must be mother love. That image of infinite compassion must be a mother's compassion. That image of infinite care must be a mother's care.

If ever the world shall know peace, sanity, and happiness, it will be mother love which will accomplish it. That mother love which longs for the touch of baby hands; that mother love which will make any sacrifice, suffer any torture, pray without ceasing, to preserve her offspring from the ravages and horrors of war, and gain for them the blessings of peace.

Mother—the cry of baby voices in the fears of night's shadows and the pains of adjustment to the world of men.

Mother—the cry of the dying soldier, in his agony amid the awful confusion of the battlefield.

Mother—the glad cry of greeting on the tremulous lips of the aged beginning in the last struggle of human existence—the journey to that far shore from which no traveler ere returns.

Mother—that name so hallowed within itself that to attempt to shed upon it added lustre by means of mere words is futile—that name which we can but pronounce and leave it in its deathless splendor forever shining on.

American People Can Win Present War Only if Everyone Takes Part in Struggle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Lowell Mellett, published recently in the Washington Evening Star.

AMERICAN PEOPLE CAN WIN PRESENT WAR ONLY IF EVERYONE TAKES PART IN STRUGGLE

(By Lowell Mellett)

Some one once said, in better language, that in times of great crisis a man always emerges to meet that crisis. Much history is cited as proof that this is true, but I believe it is open to debate.

True, the American struggle for independence produced George Washington and the Civil War produced Abraham Lincoln. True, the present world condition has produced Churchill, Stalin, Chiang Kai-shek, and Roosevelt. But, it seems to me, a lot of crises in the history of the human race never were met, whether because the necessary man did not emerge or for some other reason.

The crisis was not met for untold millions submerged in the misery of the Dark Ages. The crisis was not met for the little people of our own time in the late great depression. True, the country as a whole was pulled out of it, but for the babies that starved or suffered such malnutrition that their whole lives have been affected, the crisis was not met.

VICTIMS OF TWO CRISES

The country seems sure to pull through the present crisis as a nation, but can it be said that the men who gave their lives or their limbs to the effort have pulled through? I don't think it can be. They are the absolute victims of two crises, the one which followed the last war and which was not met, even in the terms of the Nation's interest, and the one which has engulfed them now as the result of the first failure. By that I mean failure of our statesmen to do their part toward forestalling this present World War.

The great man of all history will be the man who succeeds in doing what Woodrow Wilson tried to do. But I don't believe that any one single man will be able to do that. Just as we cannot leave it to one man to win this war for us, just as we cannot leave it to any one or all of the four men named, we cannot leave it to one man or four men to win the next great crisis in the world's history—before it occurs.

Eisenhower cannot win this war. MacArthur and Nimitz cannot win it. Nor can Marshall and King. Roosevelt cannot win it. Only the American people can. And the American people can win it only if they are all in it. I think this is coming to be understood. I think there is a great deal of soul-searching going on in this country at this time; that people are beginning again to ask themselves as they did in the days immediately following Pearl Harbor, "Am I doing all that I can?

ACCEPT SITUATION PHILOSOPHICALLY

I don't believe there is as much resistance by the people to the Government's efforts to fit them into the war program as a lot of political and other leaders appear to think. I believe the people recognize that it is not easy to devise a system of selection that will automatically produce complete justice for all men and women. I believe they are willing to accept such unavoidable injustices as occur.

Many have reason to feel they have been miscast, that their best abilities are being disregarded, but almost without exception they seem to accept the situation philosophically. They aren't quitting. This is not a Nation of sunshine soldiers and summer patriots.

We are going to win this war. The American people are going to win it. The thing to pray for is that when we have achieved this victory we will put the same concerted effort into meeting the next crisis—before it occurs.

If we do that we will be the greatest people in history.

A Great and Patriotic American Exonerated—Legion Executive Committee Clears Representative Hamilton Fish of Alleged Abuse of Franking Privilege

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, no Member of this body has been more brutally and unjustly treated than has the able, distinguished, and patriotic gentleman from New York, Hon. HAMILTON FISH, but many of us felt that a new high in that direction was attained at the national convention of the American Legion at Omaha last fall.

We have no way of determining whether the action referred to was made in good faith or inspired by desire to injure Mr. FISH politically. Whatever the reason the effect was the same. We all recall that the Legion's action aroused universal resentment among servicemen and others who knew of Mr. FISH's splendid service in the First World War, and his equally fine and long service in this body. We all rejoice that the national executive committee of the American Legion, in a report, has completely exonerated Mr. FISH of the baseless charges that were made at their national convention.

Under permission granted me I desire at this point to insert a news item from the Washington Evening Star of May 3, which follows:

LEGION COMMITTEE CLEARS FISH OF MISUSING FRANKING PRIVILEGE

The national executive committee of the American Legion virtually has cleared Representative FISH, Republican, of New York, of previous Legion charges of misuse of his congressional franking privileges for subversive and un-American activities.

In a report couched in language which was critical of the Legion itself in some respects, the committee suggested the next annual Legion convention at Chicago in September approve the loyalty and patriotism of the New Yorker, whatever the Legionnaires may think of the soundness, wisdom and property of some of his speeches and proposals.

NO SUPPORTING EVIDENCE

The committee found that charges contained in a resolution scoring Mr. FISH at the annual Legion convention at Omaha last year were not based on sufficient supporting evidence.

The committee took its action by approving unanimously at the Statler Hotel, a report of a special subcommittee of three which had spent months on the case. It warned Legionnaires to be more careful in the future to see that their resolutions were based on fact, and could be substantiated.

The special subcommittee report was presented by its chairman, Harry W. Colmery, of Topeka, Kans. Other committee members signing the report are National Vice Commander Edward A. Mulroonew, of Wilmington, Del., and W. H. Hargrave, alternate national executive committeeman from the District.

CONCLUSIONS REACHED

Among the conclusions of the 14-page report were:

"There was no basis for the charge that Congressman FISH allowed certain groups and individuals, including George Sylvester Vierick and the America First Committee to use his congressional frank."

"Not only was there no violation or misuse of the franking privilege but the act of use complained of and on which the (Omaha) resolution was based was specifically authorized by * * * postal laws and regulations. * * *

"The charge that Congressman FISH allowed * * * Vierick and America First Committee to use his frank for disseminating propaganda inimical to the United States has no foundation in fact."

The committee also found no evidence to support a condemnation by the Legion of the use of franking privilege by Senators and Representatives for the distribution of matter "subversive and un-American in their character."

At Goshen, N. Y., Mr. FISH said his exoneration was "a simple, outspoken act of justice," the Associated Press reported. He is campaigning for renomination in the twenty-ninth district.

Mr. FISH had appeared before the executive committee in Indianapolis some time ago, where he made a lengthy defense.

Referring to Legion charges against a speech of Mr. FISH and his proposed amendments to the sedition laws the Colmery committee found that the whole labor of the speech and the amendments is the protection of individual freedom. The charge against Mr. FISH in this respect, the committee declared, "is contrary to the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy to which the American Legion is dedicated," adding and although we may question the soundness and the wisdom and the propriety of such expressions it is not in accord with the American ideal to level the accusation of subversive and un-American to such remarks as are contained in that speech, just because we do not agree.

OTHER RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED

The executive committee, which is the governing body of the Legion in the periods between national conventions, adopted several resolutions before it adjourned late yesterday.

The committee denounced all proposals for an immediate and negotiated peace, favored retention of a strong, thoroughly manned and well equipped Navy; favored retention in the armed forces of men with minor disabilities, to prepare them better for return to civil life; asked the Army and Navy to issue battle clasps for former prisoners of war, and ribbons or medals for service in this country; and endorsed a House bill to permit promotions of prisoners of war.

The committee tabled a proposal calling for more complete and true news of military and naval action, contending that the Army and Navy should be sole judges of what is appropriate.

Warren Atherton, national commander, presided.

Mr. Speaker, I also insert in the RECORD the complete text of the report to the national executive committee of its subcommittee on the Hamilton Fish resolution, as certified to the national executive committee of the American Legion by its chairman, Harry W. Colmery, past national commander of the Legion, and which was adopted by the national executive committee amid prolonged applause without a dissenting voice being raised.

Mr. Speaker, this may exceed the usual allowance and I ask unanimous consent that such limitation be disregarded in this instance and that the article and the report may be printed notwithstanding the additional cost.

REPORT TO THE NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF ITS SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE HAMILTON FISH RESOLUTION

Subject matter: "Guard against the misuse of franking privileges for subversive and un-American activities."

Mr. Commander and gentlemen of the committee, your committee, appointed by the national commander, pursuant to your action taken at the November 1943 meeting[1] submits the following report:

1. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

At its 1943 convention, the California Department of the American Legion adopted a resolution on the above subject matter, which, under the terms of one of its resolving clauses, was communicated to the twenty-fifth annual national convention of the American Legion, held at Omaha, Nebr., on September 21-23, 1943. There, the convention committee on Americanism reported the same resolution, in substance, as Resolution No. 296, entitled "Guard Against the Misuse of the Franking Privileges for Subversive and un-American Activities." That convention adopted the resolution.

Thereafter, request having been made by him to the national commander, the national executive committee, by a mail vote of 60 to 5, extended to HAMILTON FISH, a Member of the Congress of the United States, the privilege of addressing this committee on the subject of the above Resolution No. 296.

Following the appearance of Congressman FISH, the national committeeman from the department of California moved that "the commander be empowered to secure and proceed to get further evidence regarding the resolution, possibly through the medium of a proper subcommittee and report back to the May meeting of the executive committee."

That motion was duly seconded, and was adopted by this executive committee. Obedient to that instruction, the national commander appointed this subcommittee which now reports.

Pursuant to said instruction, your committee, acting both as individuals under specific assignment and as a committee, have examined the pertinent records of the proceedings of the American Legion; the correspondence and documentary evidence available and material to the inquiry; have studied and analyzed the resolution, and the Postal Laws and Regulations relating to the franking privilege; have interviewed various officials of the Government and Members of Congress as to the custom and practice in sending mailable matter under the free frank; and have interviewed 10 of the members of the convention Americanism committee, which considered and reported Resolution 296 to the Omaha national convention, and also the director of the Americanism commission, who functioned with that committee; and have also done some legal research on questions involved.

2. THE POWER AND AUTHORITY OF THE NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

The constitution of the American Legion vests the legislative power in the national convention (sec. 1, art. V). It is the source of power and authority. Between national conventions the administrative power is vested in the national executive committee (sec. 1, art. VII). In the exercise of that power, the national executive committee transacts its business in accordance with the rules adopted by it on November 21-22, 1940, as amended on May 1-2, 1941, referred to as "rules of the national executive committee of the American Legion." Rule 4 thereof, having to do with its duties and powers, provides that—

"The national executive committee is specifically empowered to exercise the following powers and rights, and may delegate to any subcommittee composed of members of the national executive committee authority to investigate and report back to the committee on any of the following powers and rights:

"(a) To make decisions on all matters executive or administrative: Provided, however, That the said action so taken shall not be contrary to nor in derogation of actions of the national convention, except as provided by the resolution adopted at the Cleveland national convention in 1936, as follows:

"Resolved, That any policy adopted by the national organization of the American Legion by convention action shall be a mandate during the year of its adoption, and thereafter shall continue as the national policy of the national organization unless changed by subsequent convention action or by action of the national executive committee."

Under this rule 4, it is clear that—

(1) Any policy adopted by a national convention is a mandate during the year of its adoption.

(2) The national executive committee cannot change that policy during the year of its adoption.

(3) After the year, the policy may be changed by either convention or executive committee action.

(4) On all matters other than policy, the executive committee cannot take any action contrary to or in derogation of the convention action.

It is also clear that, since this resolution 296 condemns the use of the franking privilege for the distribution of articles and speeches which are subversive or un-American in character; calls upon the Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives to take proper action to guard against such use for such purposes; and instructs and directs the national commander to take the necessary steps to enforce the postal laws and regulations against their infringement through either the misuse of the franking privilege or its misuse for subversive and un-American activities, that it expresses the policy of the American Legion in those particulars. For they constitute a settled or definite course or method which the American Legion has adopted as to the subject matter involved.

Therefore we conclude that—

1. The national executive committee cannot change that expressed policy at this time or prior to the 1944 national convention of the American Legion.

But this does not mean that the national executive committee cannot take any action at all. It is inevitable, and our experience in this organization has demonstrated the fact that, from time to time, this executive committee has found it necessary to interpret various actions of national conventions. On these occasions it has done so, and properly so. And it is recognized in the law of private organizations that, although an inferior body may not change the policy of its parent body, nevertheless, in the administration of the organization's policy, it may properly and legally ascertain facts, record experiences, report mistakes and failures, to the end that the parent organization shall have the benefit of its experience and, through that medium, judge the soundness of its own policy and the effectiveness of its own procedure. In fact that is a cardinal principle in the delegation of responsibility, and in management and organization.

We make it clear, therefore, that in the rendition of this report, we are aware of rule 4: That we have no intention to, and do not recommend any action which will constitute a change in convention action. But we do reflect our analysis of the situation created by the passage of resolution 296, and the problems it creates, leaving it for this committee, in its own wisdom to determine its own course of action.

We now invite your attention to an—

3. ANALYSIS OF RESOLUTION NO. 296

An analysis of the resolution will be helpful in understanding its purpose and scope and the exact statements of fact contained therein on the basis of which action was taken.

A. The recitals

(1) The postal laws and regulations make it unlawful for any person entitled to the use of the frank (a) to lend such frank, or permit its use, by any committee, organization, or association; (b) permit its use by any person for the benefit or use of any committee, organization, or association.

(2) HAMILTON FISH (with certain other isolationist Members of Congress) allowed his Congressional frank to be used by certain groups and individuals (including George Sylvester Viereck, and the America First Committee), disseminating propaganda inimical to the United States.

(3) That on April 14, 1943, there was mailed in San Diego, Calif., under the free frank of HAMILTON FISH, a reprint of his remarks made in Congress on April 6, 1943, on proposed amendments to the Alien and Sedition Act of the United States, which envelope was mailed on a mailing list of the pro-Nazi editor of The Broom, one C. Leon de Aryan, who is stated to be under Federal indictment for sedition and is "out on bail and still pursuing his activities."

(4) That the amendment to the Alien and Sedition Act proposed by Congressman FISH, (a) would make it impossible for the United States Government to convict certain persons now indicted for sedition, and (b) would cripple the Department of Justice in its efforts to convict enemies of the United States.

B. The resolving clauses

(1) The American Legion affirms Resolution No. 127 passed at the twenty-fourth annual national convention at Kansas City, Mo. That resolution states:

"We condemn the use of the franking privilege by Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives for the distribution of articles and speeches, subversive and un-American in their character, and we urge that * * * Senate and House * * * take such proper action to guard against the misuse of the franking privilege for such subversive and un-American activities."

(2) Instructs and directs the commander to take such necessary steps by and in the name of the American Legion, including court action, if necessary, which will enforce the postal laws and regulations of the United States, against the infringement of the spirit thereof, by Members of Congress, whomsoever they are, who are misusing their mailing frank, or who are allowing the same to be misused for subversive and un-American activities.

4. THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE—LAW AND REGULATIONS

The applicable provisions of the law and regulations are as follows:

"(a) It shall be unlawful for any person entitled under the law to the use of a frank to lend said frank or permit its use by any committee, organization or association, or permit its use by any person for the benefit or use of any committee, organization or association. (Chap. 8, title 39 U. S. C. A. sec. 335; sec. 613 Postal Laws and Regulations 1940.)

"(b) The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or any part thereof, or speeches or reports therein contained, shall under the frank of a Member of Congress * * * written by himself except as provided in section 185 of title 44, be carried in the mail free of postage, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe." (Chap. 8, title 39 U. S. C. A. sec. 325; sec. 609 Postal Laws and Regulations 1940.)

"(c) All franked matter shall be forwarded like any other, but when once delivered to the addressee, may not be remailed unless properly franked again. A bulk package of franked articles may be sent by a person entitled to the franking privilege to one addressee, who on receiving and opening the package, may, on behalf of such person, place addresses on the franked articles and remail them for carriage and delivery to the respective addresses. This section relates to matter entitled to free carriage under sections 608 and 609." (Sec. 612 (3) Postal Laws and Regulations 1940.)

5. The evidence or facts upon which the charge is based that there was a violation of the Postal Laws and Regulations, with reference to the franking privilege or misuse thereof.

The resolution adopted by the California department had attached thereto as exhibit A, a photostatic copy of a page from an issue of The Reporter (vol. 6, No. 1, report for April 1943), an organ of first mail advertising published monthly by Henry Hoke at 17 East Forty-second Street, New York City. That page contained an article entitled FISH Is on the Hook Again, and reproduces a copy of an envelope, bearing the frank of HAMILTON FISH, with post-office stamp of San Diego, Calif., April 14, 1943, and the printed label showing that it contained an extension of remarks of Hon. HAMILTON FISH, made in the House on April 6, 1943, on the "proposed amendments to Alien and Sedition Act to Conform to Bill of Rights."

This documentary evidence was not attached to and made a part of the Omaha resolution as presented to the convention. However, according to approximately 10 members of the convention committee on Americanism and the director of Americanism, who have been interviewed, the attention of the convention committee was directed to that evidence, and its consideration of the resolution was based thereon.

In writing to Homer L. Chaillaux, director, National Americanism Commission, on November 1, 1943, Lewis Hayd Leve, Americanism chairman, thirteenth district, Department of California, who wrote the resolution and "put it in the hopper," stated:

"I wish to recall to your attention, which is important, that our resolution was based on the data furnished from the article and photographed in The Reporter and the resolution so states. When the resolution was submitted in post, district, and Department of California, a photostat of the page you have was attached to the resolution showing that we went no further than the data submitted."

And on November 6, 1943, Leve also wrote to Chaillaux:

"It is important to remember that the resolution had attached thereto as an exhibit a photostatic copy of article from The Reporter showing the franked envelope mailed from San Diego, Calif., as being the basis and proof of the resolution. I personally know from a member of the Department Resolutions Committee that the said data was attached to the resolution when it passed the Department at the San Francisco Convention. As far as I know, the exhibit accompanied the resolution when it went to national."

Your committee finds that, insofar as allegations of misuse of the franking privilege by Congressman FISH are concerned, that they are based upon:

1. A franked envelope, bearing the frank of HAMILTON FISH, and postmarked at San Diego, Calif., April 14, 1943. (Exhibit 4).

2. The remarks of FISH on the proposed amendments to the Alien and Sedition Act, contained in said envelope. (Exhibit 5.)

3. Page from The Reporter, containing the article, FISH Is on the Hook Again. (Exhibit 3.)

(From this article it appears that it is claimed that the publisher of The Reporter knows from the name of the addressee, which is not revealed, that this envelope was mailed by an individual whose name is C. Leon de Aryan.)

6. The subcommittee's interpretation of its assignment.

Inviting your attention to the fact that the expressed subject matter of Resolution 296 is "guard against the misuse of franking privileges for subversive and un-American activities," and that the evidence on which it was based was confined to exhibits 3, 4, and 5, referred to above, we restate the fact that the basis of the resolution is the misuse of the franking privilege, by permitting an individual to use the frank, and the misuse of the franking privilege for the dissemination of propaganda inimical to the United States or subversive or un-American in character.

Since the committee was directed only to consider Resolution 296, it has confined its work to the above subject matter. It does not consider that, by any construction its assignment goes beyond that stated. Therefore we have not felt called upon to consider and have not considered, and make no report on such subject matter as whether the views of the pre-Pearl Harbor isolationists were, or were not right; whether the principles and the activities of the America First Committee, and those who supported it were or were not right; whether George Sylvester Viereck should or should not have been convicted; or the Americanism and the patriotism of Congressman FISH.

Having stated the applicable provisions of the law and regulations, and the facts upon which the resolution was based, we now consider whether the charges contained in the resolution are supported by the evidence.

a. As to the violation of the Postal Laws and Regulations relating to franking privilege by Congressman Hamilton Fish

1. As to Exhibits 3, 4, and 5

The law: The use prohibited under section 613 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, set out in the resolution is (1) lending the frank or permitting its use by any committee, organization, or association; or (2) permitting its use by any person for the benefit or use of any committee, organization, or association.

The evidence: An individual person used the frank by mailing the envelope exhibit 4.

Finding and conclusion: The prohibition is against use by a committee, organization, or association either directly, or by a person for the benefit of such committee, organization, or association. There was no evidence of such use. On the contrary the use was by an individual. Therefore, there was no violation of section 613 of the Postal Laws and Regulations.

We also invite your attention to the fact that resolution 296 only sets out section 613. Why its authors did not set our section 609 and section 612 (3) of the Postal Laws and Regulations (cited hereinabove) we do not know. Those sections specifically authorize the sending of franked mail in bulk, to one addressee, who may, on behalf of the sender, break the bulk package and address the franked articles and remail them. And that privilege covers specifically speeches contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, such as exhibit No. 5.

Under the law of agency, the interpretation of section 613, is that, when the person entitled by law to the franking privilege, sends a bulk shipment of sealed franked mailable matter to an addressee, he thereby makes the latter his agent, to address the franked articles and place them in the mail on his behalf.

Our investigation discloses that the mailing of franked material in the nature of a speech of the sender under section 613, in the manner and form as shown by the facts herein, is a well established and widely used and authorized custom and practice.

Therefore, not only was there no violation or misuse of the franking privilege, but the act of use complained of and on which resolution 296 was based was specifically authorized by section 613, Postal Laws and Regulations 1940.

And now, having arrived at this conclusion, independently, we direct your attention to the fact that the Reporter—a page from which was the basis for the original resolution, likewise, has come to the same conclusion. I read from its May 1940 issue:

"Last month the Reporter reproduced an envelope bearing the frank of Congressman HAMILTON FISH * * * mailed from San Diego, Calif., on April 14, 1943, to a dummy name placed on the list of C. Leon de Aryan, who is under indictment for sedition but who is now out on bail. We revealed how HAM FISH is again allowing his frank to be used by seditious characters * * * and how HAM FISH is trying to defend the 33 people who are now under indictment."

Then, after setting out a copy of a letter written to the Postmaster General, it states:

"Third Assistant Postmaster General Ramsey S. Black replied without humor. He had to be officially dignified in turning down the request for free postage. But here is his paragraph concerning the use of the frank:

" 'With respect to the matter referred to which was mailed under the franking privilege of a Congressman, you are advised that under the provisions of paragraph 3, section 612, Postal Laws and Regulations, a Member of Congress may send a bulk shipment of franked articles properly mailable under his frank to one addressee, who on receiving and opening the package, may, on behalf of the Member of Congress, place addresses on the franked articles and remail them for carriage and delivery to the respective addressees. This contemplates that the person who addresses and mails the matter is doing so as the representative or agent of the one whose frank appears on the matter.'

"Study that paragraph carefully. That is exactly what the Reporter has been beefing about all these years. What moral right has HAMILTON FISH, or any other Congressman, to appoint an addressing agent far removed from his own congressional district? Why shouldn't the Government or the Post Office Department have some rights to inquire into the status of the agent appointed by the Congressman? Under the present laws and regulations HAMILTON FISH is entirely within his legal rights. He can furnish his franked envelopes to an unlimited number of Nazi-loving seditionists * * * and no one can make him stop. Isn't that one hell of a mess?"

b. By certain groups and individuals, including George Sylvester Vierick and the America First Committee

The Evidence

There was no evidence before the convention Americanism committee at Omaha, Nebr., nor at the Department convention of California, that the frank of HAMILTON FISH was used by George Sylvester Viereck, the America First Committee, or any other group or groups.

Finding and Conclusion

Absent such evidence to support the charge, we find that, as to Resolution 296 there was no basis for the charge that Congressman HAMILTON FISH allowed "certain groups and individuals, including George Sylvester Viereck, and the America First Committee" to use his congressional frank.

c. Disseminating propaganda inimical to the United States

It will be noted that the resolution recites that Congressman FISH allowed his frank to be used by Viereck, America First Committee, disseminating propaganda inimical to the United States. Such a charge has no relation to or bearing upon the misuse of the franking privilege. The franking privilege law does not make the character of the mail matter an element in determining the misuse of the franking privilege. Furthermore there was no evidence before the convention committee on Americanism that any speeches or material of Viereck or the America First Committee, or any group had been sent out by FISH or under his frank, directly or indirectly.

Finding and Conclusion

We find that, as to Resolution 296, the charge that Congressman FISH allowed George Sylvester Viereck and America First Committee to use his frank for disseminating propaganda inimical to the United States had no foundation in fact.

2. Misuse of Franking Privilege by Members of Congress.

Attention is invited to the fact that Resolution 296 reaffirmed the Resolution 127 passed at the Kansas City convention. Note what that resolution says:

"We condemn the use of the franking privilege by Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives for the distribution of articles and speeches, subversive and un-American in their character, and we urge that the Senate and House of Representatives take such proper action to guard against the misuse of the franking privilege for such subversive and un-American activities."

Resolution 296 also instructs and directs the Commander of the American Legion to take steps necessary, including court action, if necessary, which will enforce the postal laws and regulations against the infringement of the spirit thereof by Members of Congress.

(a) Who are misusing their mailing frank, or (b) who are allowing the same to be misused for subversive and un-American activities.

Your committee does not know what evidence the Kansas City convention had before it to support and justify the condemnation of the Congress for and charging them with distributing subversive and un-American material under their free frank. Our investigation as to the Omaha convention justifies the statement that at that convention there was no evidence before the convention Americanism committee to support such a charge against the Members of Congress.

In fact, to carry out the instruction, the national commander would have to put some snoopers on guard to check the use of the franking privilege and the nature and character of all such mailed matter.

Gentlemen of the committee, the American Legion has done a great job. It is quite natural that weaknesses will show up in our operations, and that we will make mistakes. That is typical both of the ways of democracy and any mass operation. Even so, it is beneath the character, and the tradition of the American Legion, and of the spirit that gave it birth, and of the record of its worthy accomplishment to impugn the motives, or to attack the Americanism of the Members of Congress, either directly or by inference or innuendo, unless such charges are supported and justified by provable facts. Legionnaires, Legion posts, districts, department and national committees should set the example in the field of doing justice. Let's be American.

B. Violation or misuse of franking privileges by dissemination of propaganda inimical to the United States or of a subversive or un-American character

Speech by HAMILTON FISH on amendments to the alien and sedition law

The resolution charges that the above amendments proposed by Congressman FISH (1) would make it impossible for the United States Government to obtain conviction against certain persons now indicted for sedition, and (2) would cripple the Department of Justice in its efforts to convict enemies of the United States.

What is the subject matter of Resolution 296? It is to "Guard against the misuse of the franking privileges for subversive and un-American activities." As pointed out hereinabove in this report, the character of the matter mailed is not an element in connection with the lawful use of the franking privilege. A "good speech" in the hands of a reader does not become harmful to the public welfare, because sent out by a scoundrel. And a "bad speech" is none the less detrimental if sent by a superpatriot. So we hold that it is of no consequence that de Aryan, alleged to be under indictment and a pro-Nazi, mailed the speech, if he did. In fact in a letter by Leve to Chaillaux dated November 6, 1943, he states:

"The entire point and purport of our resolution is to stop Members of Congress in allowing other persons not Members of Congress, to obtain their franked envelopes for mailing purposes, even though they contain speeches or other data furnished by Congress. It is this feature which causes abuse. It is immaterial, therefore, whether FISH'S envelope mailed at San Diego was mailed by de Aryan, or some other person."

It is interesting to note that, as a matter of record, in a subsequent indictment, which supersedes the prior indictment the name of de Aryan was not included. So he no longer stands indicted. We are referring to the so-called sedition case pending in the District of Columbia. If there be any other case, we are not aware of it. Incidentally, his paper Broom continues to be published during the month of April 1944 so that the Department of Justice and the United States postal authorities must not consider it to be seditious.

These charges that FISH's purpose in advocating the proposed amendments to the sedition law was to make it impossible to convict persons now indicted for sedition, and would cripple the Department of Justice in its effort to convict enemies of the United States, are not germane to the subject matter and have no bearing on misuse of the franking privilege, and as such constitute no violation or misuse thereof.

It will serve no good purpose to analyze the sedition law and the proposed amendments. It is sufficient to state that the general main purpose of the amendments was to tighten up the prosecution and require the Government to prove that the act complained of had a direct relation to and were brought to bear upon the result, that is, the interfering, impairing, or influencing the loyalty, morale, or discipline of the military or naval forces of the United States.

But regardless of what our view or opinion might be on the purpose of Congressman FISH, your committee is of the opinion that the charge in this respect is contrary to the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy, to which the American Legion is dedicated. The whole labor of the speech and the amendments is the protection of individual freedom.

In the first place, this speech is protected under section 6 of article I of the Constitution, which states as to Members of Congress that "and for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

This privilege is not the privilege of Congressman FISH. It is the privilege of the people he represents. It is not given for the purpose of protecting him for his own benefit, as to the wisdom of legislation. It is given in support of the rights of the people by enabling their representatives to execute the functions of their office without fear of prosecution, civil or criminal, or coercion, or intimidation. It is given in order that the channels of free and open expression of opinion may be kept open, to the end that in the legislative halls, whatever should be said and needs to be said, will be said, courageously and fearlessly, so that there may be accomplished a complete fulfillment of the hopes, aims, and desires of the people as they go about the business of establishing the rules through which to govern themselves.

And although we may question the soundness and the wisdom and the propriety of such expressions it is not in accord with the American ideal to level the accusation of subversive and un-American to such remarks as are contained in that speech, just because we do not agree.

We understand that freedom of speech and of the press secured by the Constitution, does not confer an absolute right to speak, without responsibility, and that, though freedom of speech is an inestimable privilege in a free government, without limitation, it might become the scourge of the Republic. For the security and stability of the state is essential to freedom of speech. And this freedom does not deprive the state of the primary and essential right of self-preservation, "which, so long as human governments endure, they cannot be denied."

For that purpose the state may punish utterances which endanger the foundation of organized government, or threaten to overthrow it by unlawful means, or which attempt to destroy or imperil the government or impede it in its governmental function; or advocate that citizens should not assist the government in carrying on war on the like. But there is nothing wrong in discussing or advocating the rules or standards upon which such acts should be judged. That the people must do. That is the nature of the speech and the proposed amendments. And as such we do not consider them properly subject to the criticism of being subversive or un-American.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS FOR THE GOOD OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

As we view this experience, may we respectfully invite your attention to these observations and suggestions for the good of the American Legion:

Greater care should be taken to limit the scope of our deliberative actions, to the end that they will be kept within a field which is germane to our primary objectives. The American Legion should not attempt to solve all the social, economic, and civil problems of the Nation. To "fiddle around" with the problem of what mailable matter should be sent free, and by whom, and what violations have taken place is beneath the dignity and high purpose of our great American institution.

2. Since the real purpose of this resolution in its origin was to stop Members of Congress from abusing the franking privilege by allowing other persons, not Members of Congress, to use it, the effort should have been or should have been directed to changing the law governing franking privileges. And if a person is un-American and commits subversive acts, let's say so, and meet that issue "head-on." It is worthy of that approach or none.

3. Possibly we have adopted the practice or habit of assuming things to be facts, solely because resolutions presented at a national convention so state, and making no further inquiry to substantiate them as such. In some matters that policy is justifiable. But where the alleged facts are being used as the basis from which interferences are drawn, or sought to be drawn, or conclusions are made or sought to be made, which involve in any way or reflect upon or question, or create a suspicion or an unfavorable impression as to the character, loyalty, fidelity, patriotism, or Americanism of any individual or group of individuals, the American Legion owes it to them, to itself, and to our country to make certain that the facts upon the basis of which we presume to judge are the facts, that we have the evidence to support them, and that we adopt appropriate procedures to make certain that accomplishment, to the end that our actions shall always be just and worthy of our name and our purpose.

Whether the purpose of the resolution 296 was to curb the abuse of the franking privilege or to condemn Congressman FISH for the alleged misuse thereof, your committee does not see where any good purpose was served, or any sound reason, for including the reference to and implied criticism of "other isolationist Members of Congress" and of "the America First Committee," and attributing to them un-American and subversive tendencies.

However mistaken some may think the persons who classify under these designations were in their views on the Nation's foreign and military policy, our examination of the declared principles of the America First Committee, our rather intimate knowledge of the public life and service and public and private character of many fine citizens who are active in or adhered to the cause of that committee; our knowledge of the ebb and flow of public opinion on the matter of our foreign policy before Pearl Harbor; our acquaintance with many pre-Pearl Harbor isolationists; compels the conclusion that, although fair criticism may be justifiable, we have no right, in good conscience directly or by inference or innuendo, to impugn the good faith or ascribe any subversive or un-American tendencies to either such persons, their point of view, or their program. It is unfortunate that we should not have kept our escutcheon untarnished.

With the hope that your committee shall have accomplished the assignment to your satisfaction, we shall submit a resolution for your consideration, and ask to be discharged. If not, we await your further command.

Respectfully submitted.

International Air Transportation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PERCY PRIEST
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the Members of the House to an editorial which appeared in the Wall Street Journal on March 22, 1944, dealing with one of the most important problems with which this country is faced, that is, the proper organization of our international air transport.

This editorial comments on the proposal recently made by Senator MCCARRAN that this Government have only one company in the international field; that this Government adopt the "chosen instrument" policy. This is a subject in which I am deeply interested and to which I have given a great deal of thought and study.

My conclusion is that Senator MCCARRAN'S chosen instrument policy, a policy which failed badly in Great Britain, should be adopted only if other proposals which do not involve the creation of such a huge monopoly are clearly doomed to failure.

The editorial is as follows:

MONOPOLY IN THE AIR

This newspaper is not enamored of the idea embodied in Senator MCCARRAN'S proposal for a single American corporation with a capital of $1,000,000,000 to conduct civil aviation beyond the borders of the United States. While the existing United States air lines would be exclusively admitted to ownership of the corporation's stock, the corporation would be an obvious monopoly. As such it would be subject to rigid Government regulation, tantamount in all probability to control. This could only tend to foster a similar development in other nations which would in time inevitably bring the respective governments into a competition that could easily develop dangerous friction, unless the various national air fleets were included in a great international "cartel" of sorts. This would in the present state of American opinion be an extremely unpopular idea and politically impossible of adoption.

The fact is that international transportation by sea as well as by air is a tough problem to solve, if by solution a reasonably orderly state of competition is understood. The war has made us enormously powerful in both fields so far as equipment is concerned, particularly in the air. It has also generated relative similar growth in some other nations, notably in the British Commonwealth. Facilities for the conduct of international transportation at the close of the fighting will be very large and each nation which finds itself with such facilities will be keen to put them to the largest possible use.

The less that this use is tied to direct governmental control the better. It is obvious that a considerable degree of control or regulation will everywhere be necessary, but it is important that it be kept at a point short of promoting direct governmental rivalry. As between a system of definitely "national"—and therefore monopolistic—fleets of ships and planes competing with each other for the available business, and a number of privately owned companies doing the same, the risks to international peace are greater in the former than in the latter, even if the latter involves greater economic casualties to the participants.

No one can now clearly foresee the conditions that will surround international commerce and travel in the years immediately ahead. In these circumstances it is only prudent not to commit ourselves too closely to any single course of action, until we know a good deal more both of these conditions and how the other nations propose to meet them.

Polish Freedom

OF

HON. JAMES H. FAY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. FAY. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the 3d of May was Poland's national holiday. It commemorated the signature on May 3, 1791 of the Polish Constitution, one of the world's greatest documents of freedom.

For almost 6 years the people of Poland have suffered an appalling martyrdom under the heel of the Nazis. Their valor in resisting against overwhelming odds, has brought the admiration and respect of the entire civilized world to their country.

In defense of their freedom and independence, the people of Poland have united together and are of a single mind. Poland has contributed greatly in the field of education, music, and culture. The Poles have always known that to retain their national identity they must preserve their language and culture.

Poland was the first to fight the Germans. They will continue to fight to the very end, until victory is theirs. I can only say that the heroic manner in which the Poles have sacrificed for the love of their country has been and will continue to be an inspiration to the people of the United States, as well as to all liberty-loving people everywhere.

Each year the sons and daughters of Poland parade up Fifth Avenue in New York City. It is one of the most colorful parades New York witnesses.

I have had the honor to witness it for the past few years as a guest of a great American of Polish extraction, John Pateracki, of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York City. He is a great American and exemplifies the highest traditions of the Polish race.

I have in my district many people of Polish ancestry and they, together with other loyal Americans, are looking to the day when peace and victory will come to the Allies.

Treatment of Jewish Prisoners of War by Nazis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the folowing letter written by me to the Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, and his reply thereto:

APRIL 3, 1944.

HON. CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The official reports of Japanese treatment of American prisoners of war, which have shocked all of us, have been particularly painful to residents in the district I have the honor of representing in Congress. While these reports are of American prisoners of war taken in the Pacific area, many of my constituents are concerned to know more about the treatment which our war prisoners may be receiving at the hands of the Nazis.

Their concern arises from the fact that many of them stem from lands now occupied by the enemy. They know the bestial treatment which their kinsmen in those conquered lands have received from the Nazis. They know that the Nazis look upon other people as inferior beings and have not hesitated to starve them, despoil them, and butcher them. They know that the "master race" theory has both served to brutalize the Nazis and caused them to hate, and smother and destroy all the civilizing forces in our society—the forces of religion, of democracy, and of decency

These American citizens, therefore, live in constant fear that their sons in the service who may fall into the hands of the Nazis will receive the same brutal treatment which has been the lot of the peoples in the conquered lands.

In particular, American citizens of the Jewish faith, in the district I represent, knowing how their coreligionists have been murdered by the thousands, are especially fearful that the "Aryan" laws will be applied to American soldiers, too, should they be so unfortunate as to become Nazi prisoners.

With the invasion of the continent daily growing nearer, you can readily understand that their anxiety becomes more pointed.

I would deeply appreciate information that your Department can furnish relative to this subject.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR G. KLEIN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 18, 1944.

The Honorable ARTHUR G. KLEIN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. KLEIN: I have received your letter of April 3, 1944, requesting information concerning the treatment of American prisoners of war held by the German authorities.

The Geneva Prisoners of War Convention of 1929 which the United States and the German Governments are applying provides a humanitarian standard of treatment for prisoners of war. Specifically, it provides that prisoners of war shall be treated humanely and held in honorable captivity—not imprisoned as criminals. It establishes as the standard for shelter and diet of prisoners of war the corresponding treatment of garrison troops of the detaining power and establishes fundamental rights regarding correspondence, medical care, clothing, pay for labor, satisfaction of intellectual, recreational and religious needs, and the continued enjoyment of full civil status.

The Department of State is constantly alert to ensure the observance of the Geneva Prisoners of War Convention. Whenever it is learned through the Swiss Government which represents American interests in Germany and German occupied territories, through the International Red Cross Committee, or otherwise that the terms of the convention are not being observed, the United States Government draws the attention of the German Government to that government's obligations under the Geneva Prisoners of War Convention. It may be stated that as a result of such representation improvements have been reported in the conditions under which prisoners of war are held by the German Government. I enclose a copy of a memorandum summarizing the information received by the Department concerning the treatment of American prisoners of war held by Germany.

The Department is exericising special vigililance to prevent discrimination by the German authorities against American prisoners of war upon a racial or religious basis and it has not so far obtained evidence establishing that such discrimination exists.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

Address by Senator Langer Before India League of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 5 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech I delivered at a meeting held last night at the National Press Club, in Washington, under the auspices of the India League of America.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Congresswoman CLARE BOOTHE LUCE, Congressman EMANUEL CELLER, distinguished guests, and friends, it has been a distinct pleasure to hear foreign correspondent Leland Stowe and Representative CLARE BOOTHE LUCE speak so eloquently about democracy. In my State of North Dakota, in which I was born and reared, true, and not pseudo, democracy prevails. There, on Lincoln's brithday, the common people meet in the voting precincts, select delegates who meet at the county seats on Washington's birthday, and there select delegates who meet at a State convention, where the candidates are endorsed by ballot.

The names of the candidates are placed on the blackboard. The delegates then vote. The person receiving the least number of votes is eliminated, until only one name remains on the board, and he or she is the endorsed candidate.

Then, the convention of the common people decides whether the endorsed ticket shall run in the Republican, Democratic, or Independent column. I might add that they have placed candidates in all three.

The people there are concerned primarily with helping the political and economic conditions of the farmer, the laborer, and the small businessman. In that State there is no distinction of any kind because of race, color, or creed. So it was that as their representative I, over a year ago, made a tour of the Southern States, studying the conditions of the sharecroppers, black and white. And so it was again, that 2 months ago, I traversed Arizona, California, and other States, visiting and studying the economic and political conditions of the immigrants from India, although only one Indian family resides in North Dakota.

Upon my return and in discussing what I had seen, I was amazed at the lack of information about India. Here, Mr. Chairman, is a country which has a population of 389,000,000 of people—almost three times the population of the United States of America, three-fourths of the total population of the British Empire, four-fifths of the overseas population of the British Empire, and nearly nine-tenths of the subject colonial population of the British Empire. And this country contains more than one-half of the total colonial population of the world; this country that is a little more than one-half as large in area as the United States; this country that is 20 times as large as Great Britain.

We hear much these days about Estonia, Rumania, Finland, and other European countries, but few people realize that India is as large as all the countries of Europe combined, minus Russia.

Without at all criticizing England or risking any disunity of the United Nations, I say that those opposed to the independence of India have said much about the various dialects, but the truth of the matter is that there are only 13 distinct languages, as compared to the 150 spoken in Russia. But so neglected has this country been that less than 1 percent of the population can read or write English, in spite of 200 years of English rule.

The most interesting fact about India from an agricultural standpoint is that her soil is rich and her people are poor. Even under primitive agricultural conditions, she produces a large quantity of rice, wheat, sugarcane, tea, cotton, jute, linseed, rape and mustard, sesamum, coffee, rubber, barley, tobacco, and indigo.

Her vast reserves of coal are estimated at 36,000,000,000 tons; her iron-ore deposits amount to 3,000,000,000 tons, as against 2,554,000,000 for Great Britain and 1,754,000,000 for Germany, and she is exceeded only by the United States and France. And yet before the war, India's production of iron was only a little over 11 percent of capacity.

India is rich in manganese, bauxite, chromite, mica, and copper ores, and she has vast water-power resources.

Water power resources

[In million horsepower]

Country	Potential	Developed	Percent developed
United States	35.0	11.7	33
Canada	18.2	4.5	25
France	5.4	2.1	37
Japan	4.5	1.7	37
Italy	3.8	1.8	47
Switzerland	2.5	1.8	72
Germany	2.0	1.1	55
India	27.0	0.8	3

India stands second only to the United States in water-power resources, yet uses only 8 percent, compared to 72 percent in Switzerland, 55 percent in Germany, 47 percent in Italy, 37 percent in France and Japan, and 33 percent in the United States.

CONDITIONS

More than 80 percent of the people of India depend directly upon agriculture, on an average holding of one and one-half acres. The vast majority of peasants live in debt. The average annual income of an agriculturist is round $15. From the borrowed money with interest rate from 22 percent to 160 percent, he pays taxes to the landlord, the state government, tax on waterwells, cattle, grazing land, forest, etc.

INDUSTRIAL WORKERS

There were in 1930 about 56.5 million wage laborers out of 154,000,000 million persons in all occupations in the whole of India. Industrial workers in the modern sense represent less than one-half percent of 40,000,000 landless semiskilled workers, unemployed for 10 months in a year.

CHILD LABOR

"Workers as young a 5 years of age may be found in some of these places working without adequate meal intervals or weekly rest days, and often for 10 or 12 hours daily. For sums as low as 2 annas (4½ cents) in the case of those of tenderest years."—(Royal Commission on Labor in India, 1929, p. 96.)

INCOME

"The annual income per head in India in 56 rupees, or about $18."—(Budget speech in the Central Legislative Assembly, April 1938.)

HEALTH

Combined central and provincial expenditure on public health is only 2.6 percent of the total central and provincial expenditures. (Figures for 1935–36—Official.)

"The average length of life in India decreased between 1921 and 1931, being 23.2 and 22.8 years of males and females respectively."—("Industrial Labor in India," International Labor Office, 1938, p. 8.)

There is only a small hospital for every 165 square miles. Infant mortality rate in India is 171 per 1,000. In overcrowded cities like Bombay it is 374 per 1,000, the highest in the world. Two hundred thousand mothers die annually during child birth. Thirty-nine percent of the population is well nourished, 41 percent poorly nourished, and 20 percent semistarved.

EDUCATION

In 1941, only 12 percent of the people were classified as literate, 8 percent male and 4 percent female. India does not have a general system of compulsory or free education. There is one elementary school for every 10 villages. About 18 cents per capita is spent annually on education. The United Kingdom spends $6.50 and the United States, $20.

The literacy in the Philippines under the American Government increased from 2 percent to 55 percent in 40 years.

PRINCES

There are 563 Indian princes who rule about one-third of India's area, and whose subjects number about 90,000,000. The present status of the princes is upheld by the British. Most of the princes are autocratic and medieval in their outlook. There is a growing agitation among their subjects for democratic rights.

"It was said long ago by Sir John Malcolm * * * that if we could keep up a number of native states without political power, but as royal instruments, we should exist in India as long as our naval supremacy was maintained. Of the substantial truth of this opinion I have no doubt." (Lord Canning, April 30, 1860.)

Sovereignty over India rests with the British Cabinet, responsible to the British Parliament. The Viceroy on their behalf exercises supreme executive power in India.

VICEROY'S SPECIAL POWERS

The viceroy may, at his discretion:

1. Appoint or dismiss ministers.
2. Veto legislation passed by the legislature.
3. Pass legislation rejected by the legislature.
4. Prohibit the discussion of legislation.
5. Issue ordinances.
6. Instruct provincial governors to issue ordinances.
7. Veto provincial legislation.
8. Issue rules for the police.
9. Control the use of the armed forces.
10. Dissolve the legislature.
11. Suspend the constitution.

Besides the special powers, of which the above are but a sample, there are special responsibilities of the governor general—commonly called safeguards, in connection with which he may take any action that he individually deems necessary for their discharge.

Among the special responsibilities are included the protection of the rights of the Princes, and the prevention of discrimination against British imports into India and against British individuals or companies operating in India whether the companies are incorporated in India or in the United Kingdom.

The Viceroy never hesitates to exercise his powers whenever he thinks that Britain's economic interests are in jeopardy. The Ottawa Pact (Imperial Preferences), rejected by the Indian legislature, was enforced by the Viceroy. Since the war, he has exercised unlimited dictatorial powers. Under his ordinance powers, the Viceroy imprisoned Gandhi, Nehru, Azad and thousands of other political leaders without any trial. These arrests were declared invalid by the chief justice of the federal court of India—an Englishman—but the Viceroy over-rode the decision by holding the prisoners and issuing another ordinance which made the arrests legal retroactively.

THE VICEROY'S COUNCIL

The Viceroy appoints an advisory council, enlarged in 1942 to 14 members, 11 of whom are Indians. The key positions of war, finance, war transport, and the home department, are in the hands of Englishmen. The members of this council hold office at the Viceroy's pleasure; they cannot be removed by any hostile vote of the legislature; they have no collective responsibility. The British Cabinet is responsible to the Parliament and falls if it forfeits its confidence. The members of the American Cabinet are chosen by the President, who has been elected by the people. The Indian Cabinet is responsible neither to the elected legislature, nor to an executive enjoying the confidence of the people.

The present members of the council do not speak for any of the major political parties of India.

THE GOVERNORS OF THE PROVINCES

The governors of the Provinces (who are Englishmen—appointed, not elected) have under their individual control the police, secret or political, whose records are not accessible even to the ministers. The governors have over-riding veto powers.

After the resignation of the Congress (Nationalist) Provincial ministers in 1939, the working of the constitution was suspended in seven provinces, the Provincial governors assuming the direct autocratic rule. The Prime Minister of Sindh, the late Allah Baksh, elected by the people, was dismissed by the governor although he still enjoyed the confidence of the elected legislature.

CIVIL LIBERTIES IN INDIA

Press restriction and rule by ordinance have made a mockery of civil liberties in India. The English Civil Liberties Union has protested against the infringement of civil liberties in India. By December 1942, 60,229 arrests were made and 39,498 were in jail as political prisoners. The crimes of these persons vary from Gandhi's announcement of his intention to start civil disobedience, to marching in processions, shouting nationalist slogans, and carrying the Indian national flag. Official figures give 940 persons killed by police or military up to the same date, and 1,630 injured—sometimes by machine guns from planes. The home member, Sir Reginald Maxwell, said that he had no figures on the number prosecuted, sentenced to death, or executed.

Hundreds of India's daily newspapers have suspended publication as a protest against humiliating press restrictions. There have been cases of public whippings to intimidate the people and of exorbitant collective fines upon impoverished communities for the suspected guilt of one individual.

INDIA AND THE WAR

For years before the outbreak of this war, the people of India expressed their opposition to fascism. They proclaimed their solidarity with the peoples of Ethiopia, Spain, and China. And in 1938, they launched a boycott of Japanese goods in protest against her aggression in China.

"The Congress is fully conscious of the necessity of facing this world menace in cooperation with the progressive nations and the peoples of the world." (Indian National Congress, December 1936.)

Since 1927 Congress has been warning Britain that unless the people of India were first consulted they would not lend their support in any future war.

Disregarding these warnings Britain declared Indian belligerent without consulting anyone in the country.

At the outbreak of the war Congress reaffirmed its opposition to fascism and its faith in democracy, but demanded a clear-cut enunciation of British war aims.

"A free democratic India will gladly associate itself with other free nations for mutual defense against aggression. * * * The Working Committee, therefore, invite the British Government to declare in unequivocal terms what their war aims are in regard to democracy and imperialism and the new order that is envisaged, in particular how these aims are going to apply to India and to be given effect to in the present." (Congress Resolution, September 15, 1939.)

The Viceroy refused an explicit declaration of war aims, but offered a "consultative group" to be associated with the Government.

The disappointment over Britain's response led, in October 1939, to the resignation of the nationalists from the Central and the Provincial Legislatures.

OFFERED COOPERATION

Following the collapse of France, Congress made in the summer of 1940 a new offer of cooperation in war, contingent upon the recognition of—

"A provisional national government at the center, which, though formed as a transitory measure, should be such as to command the confidence of all elected members in the central legislatures."

The Viceroy's statement of August 9, 1940, offered no transfer of real power to Indian hands, but the enlargement of the Viceroy's Executive Council, and the inclusion of a few Indians in a "War Advisory Council."

INDIA'S WAR EFFORT

During World War No. 1, India's contribution in manpower was greater than that of all the self-governing Dominions put together, and her financial contributions were very large.

In this war India's soldiers now number almost 2,000,000—of whom 170,000 were already in her standing army. 500,000 Indian soldiers are serving overseas.

India is producing 80 percent of her own war equipment—as well as supplies for other members of the United Nations. This includes armor-plating for tanks, etc., small arms, shells, and many other articles. She is making uniforms at the rate of 10,000,000 garments a month.

ARMY NOT NATIONAL

The Indian army has long been treated as a part of the armed forces of the Empire.

"Most of our Asiatic wars with countries beyond the limits of our Empire have been carried on by means of military and monetary resources of the government of India, though the objects of those wars were, in some instances, purely British, and in others but remotely connected with the interests of India." (Major Wingate, "Our Financial Relations with India," p. 17.)

Between 1913 and 1928, the military expenditure in India increased from 22 to 44 millions sterling—an increase of 100 percent, as against an increase of less than 50 percent in Great Britain and 33 percent in the Dominions.

In 1936–37, the military expenditure in India represented 54 percent of the central budget and 29 percent of the combined central and provincial budgets.

In spite of the appaling burden on India, the Indian soldiers receive about one-third the salaries that the British soldiers in India get. Up till very recently Indians were barred from training in aviation, artillery, and mechanized warfare, and no Indian ever rose higher than the rank of captain. Even now there is only an insigificant number of Indians commissioned, and these only to the lower ranks.

WHY CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE?

The failure of the Cripps mission generated bitterness and frustration.

On August 8, 1942, the Congress resolution called for the establishment of a provisional government whose "primary function must be to defend India and resist aggression with all the armed, as well as the nonviolent, forces at its command, together with the Allied Powers."

The committee sanctioned "for the vindication of India's inalienable right to freedom and independence, the starting of a mass struggle on nonviolent lines."

Nehru observed in the final debate: "The resolution is not a threat; it is an invitation and an explanation; it is an offer of cooperation."

Ghandhi's letter to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek in July 1942 said:

"I am straining every nerve to avoid a conflict with British authority."

Gandhi started by writing a letter to the Viceroy asking for an interview. The Congress resolution was passed on August 8, and on the morning of August 9, 1942, all the principal leaders, including Gandhi, Nehru, and Azad, were arrested and the Congress was declared an illegal organization.

BLOCKING SETTLEMENT

Since the arrests of the Indian leaders, practically all the Indian parties have been urging the Government to reopen negotiations. The Chinese have expressed profound concern over the Indian deadlock. Sixty of America's leading public men and women signed on September 28, 1942, a full-page ad in the New York Times urging mediation in India.

The Viceroy has refused to allow Indian leaders to see Gandhi. He refused permission to William Phillips, President Roosevelt's personal envoy to India, to see Gandhi. The Viceroy even refused to deliver in full Gandhi's letter to Jinnah.

The British Government has taken the position that nothing can be done now.

"Perhaps I can give you my father's position. I feel that I know what it is.

"My father would want an unequivocal declaration of India's independence now. He would be accommodating on matters of detail and war direction if he could be convinced of the genuineness of the British desire to set India free.

"He would not consider immediate Pakistan, nor does Mr. Jinnah demand it." Devadas Gandhi, son of Mahatma Gandhi, in interview with Dewitt MacKenzie, quoted in latter's India's Problem Can Be Solved, 1943, (pp. 185, 187).

PROMISES AND ACTIONS

Ever since the First World War Britain has kept dangling before India the prospect of Dominion status. Almost 25 years have gone by and that promised land still remains a mirage. Here are a few sample promises:

"The policy of His Majesty's Government with which the Government of India is in complete accord is that of increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration and the gradual development of self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realization of a responsible government in India as an integral part of the British Empire." (Mr. Montague, Secretary of State for India, August 20, 1917.)

"I hope that within a period of months rather than of years there will be a new Dominion added to the Commonwealth of our Nations, a Dominion of another race, which will find self respect as an equal within the Commonwealth. I refer to India." (J. Ramsay MacDonald, July 2, 1928.)

"I am authorized on behalf of His Majesty's Government to say that in their judgment it is implicit in the declaration of 1917 that the natural issue of India's constitutional progress as there contemplated is the attainment of Dominion status." (Lord Irwin (now Lord Halifax, British Ambassador to Washington), Viceroy of India, October 31, 1929.)

"The object is the creation of a new Indian Union which shall constitute a Dominion associated with the United Kingdom and other Dominions by a common allegianec to the Crown but equal to them in every respect, in no way subordinate in any aspect of its domestic and external affairs." (Sir Stafford Cripps, March 29, 1942.)

There is no basis for Britain's contention that she has always been preparing India for eventual self-government. It is repudiated by earlier pronouncements of prominent Englishmen, and a recent series of statements confirms India's belief that, in spite of Cripps' offer, Britain has no intention whatsoever of relinquishing her hold upon India.

"I do not hesitate to say that both the Governments of England and of India appear to me up to the present moment unable to answer satisfactorily the charge of having taken every means in their power of breaking to the heart the words of promise they have uttered to the ear." (Lord Lytton, Viceroy, 1876–80, in a confidential letter to Lord Cranbrook, Secretary of State.)

"That Britain under no circumstances will relinquish her responsibility in India is a cardinal principle not merely of the present government, but of any government which will command the confidence of the people of this country." (Lloyd George, in the House of Commons, August 2, 1922.)

"No one had the right to tell the people of India that they were likely in any near period to attain Dominion status." (Lord Birkenhead, in the House of Lords, November 5, 1929.)

"None can say when responsible government will be established; none can say what shape it will take." (Stanley Baldwin, when Prime Minister, December 4, 1934.)

"Our Viceroys and our Governors in India, and under them the services that will be recruited by the Secretary of State and safeguarded by Parliament, will have the duty and the means to ensure, if need be, that that political power is exercised by Indian ministers and legislatures for the purposes that we intend." (Stanley Baldwin, broadcast on Government of India bill (new constitution) February 5, 1935.)

WINSTON CHURCHILL AND INDIA

"The loss of India would mark and consummate the downfall of the British Empire. That great organism would pass at a stroke out of life into history. From such a catastrophe there could be no recovery." (Winston Churchill, December 12, 1930.)

"Of course, we have always contemplated it (dominion status) as an ultimate goal, but no one has supposed that, except in a purely ceremonious sense in the way in which representatives of India attended conferences during the war, that that principle and policy for India would be carried into effect in any time which it is reasonable or useful for us to foresee." (January 28, 1931.)

"We are encouraging hopes in India which cannot be realized, we are assigning exaggerated importance to individuals in India with whom we shall never be able to agree and are injuring the prestige and strength of British Government in India for dealing with all these problems." (March 12, 1931.)

"I am against this surrender to Gandhi. I am against these conversations and agreements between Lord Irwin and Mr. Gandhi. Gandhi stands for the expulsion of the British from India. Gandhi stands for the substitution of Brahmin domination for British rule in India. You will never be able to come to terms with Gandhi." (March 1931.)

"It is alarming and also nauseating to see Mr. Gandhi, a seditious middle temple lawyer—striding half naked up the steps of the vice regal palace—to parley on equal terms with the representative of the King-Emperor." (March 1931, referring to the Gandhi-Irwin pact.)

"Most of the leading public men—of whom I was one in those days—made speeches, I certainly did, about the dominion status, but I did not contemplate India having the same constitutional rights and system as Canada in any period which we could foresee." (December 3, 1931.)

"And I do not believe the people will consent to be edged, pushed, talked, and cozened out of India." (April 29, 1932.)

"This India home rule plan strikes at the destiny of the British Empire. We have in this island a population of 45,000,000 living at a higher level than the people of any other European country. One-third of these would go down, out, or under if we ceased to be a great empire with world-wide connections and trade. * * * And then they tell us that the relations of Great Britain and India are not a matter for the working classes or for the ordinary elector. Let them mind their own business. India has nothing to do with them, nothing. It is only their daily bread. That's all!" (Broadcast, January 29, 1935.)

"* * * At the Atlantic meeting we had in mind primarily restoration of the sovereignty, self-government, and national life of States and nations of Europe now under the Nazi yoke and the principles which would govern any alterations in the territorial boundaries of the countries which might have to be made." (September 9, 1941, in the House of Commons, commenting on the Atlantic Charter and its application to India.)

"Let me make this clear, in case there should be any mistake about it in any quarter. We mean to hold our own. I have not become the King's First Minister in order to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire." (November 10, 1942.)

INDIA FOR WORLD FEDERATION

India wants freedom from Britain's political domination. This is her birthright as a nation. She is anxiously looking forward to the day when, as a free nation, she will play an active role in a federation of all the free peoples of the world.

"The committee is of the opinion that the future peace, security, and ordered progress of the world demand a world federation of free nations, and on no other basis can the problems of the modern world be solved. Such a federation would insure the freedom of its constituent nations, the prevention of aggression and exploitation by one nation over another, the protection of national minorities, the advancement of all backward areas and peoples, and the pooling of the world's resources for the common good of all. * * * An independent India would gladly join such a world federation and cooperate on an equal basis with other countries in the solution of international problems." (Resolution passed by the All-India Congress Committee at Bombay, August 8, 1942.)

Mr. Chairman, on my trip through Arizona, California and other States, I was accompanied by Mubareck Ali Kahn, president of the India Welfare League, Inc., who has worked unceasingly with others for many years for the naturalization of those Indians who came here before 1924.

These men had come here at the request of missionaries in China and India, and as a result of conversations with Army officers in those countries.

Most of them had taken up agriculture by improving what was considered worthless alkali swamps, and by making them into profitable rice fields. By the passage of the Asiatic exclusion bill they suddenly found themselves deprived of their property. Some States, notably Washington, Oregon, California, and Arizona, would not permit them to own land. Their property was taken away from them in one breath. In some States they could not even get married, the claim being that they had no civil rights. And so we today find these men who are experts in agriculture, and in the sciences and the arts, facing problems to the removal of which, some of us have dedicated ourselves.

I thank Mr. Mubarek Ali Khan, president of the India Welfare League, 113 Broome Street, New York City, for his great assistance in the endeavor to pass my bill, and tonight I express my warm appreciation at the efforts of the chairman, Mr. J. J. Singh, of the India League of America, for getting assembled under one roof this vast multitude so greatly interested in democracy all over the world.

Milk for School Children

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 5 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, Dr. Clinton N. Howard, editor of Progress magazine, and general superintendent of the International Reform Federation, of Washington, D. C., made an able statement at a hearing on May 4, 1944, before a subcommittee appointed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, urging that milk be provided as a part of the diet of the noonday lunch for school children. I ask unanimous consent to have the statement printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Abraham Lincoln said at the conclusion of his first inaugural address, "I am loath to close." In view of the wealth of testimony which has been presented in favor of the passage of one or the other of the bills considered for three days by this committee, I am loath to begin.

I wrote the chairman from Boston on Tuesday to suggest my desire to be heard if the issue before the committee today was on the passage of the pending school lunch bill, and not on the method of its administration as proposed by S. 1820 or S. 1824, as I am not an expert on matters of administration in a bill of this character, dividing the responsibility of its enforcement between the Federal Government and the States.

We most heartily favor the passage of the school lunch bill. We could not do otherwise as a Christian organization. Our Lord said, "Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water, verily I say unto you he shall in no wise lose his reward." Certainly if this be true of a drink of water it must be doubly true of providing food for a multitude of school children of a Nation, who would otherwise go hungry. Some 4,445,000 children are now receiving lunch aid through the Food Distribution Administration.

That is certainly "a multitude" and we read that "Jesus had compassion on the multitude because they had nothing to eat, and He commanded His disciples, saying, "Give ye them to eat." Not only once, but twice he fed the hungry multitude of four and five thousand men, besides women and children, the record says, for no other reason than because they were hungry. I believe he would say the same to the hungry school children of this richest and most blessed of all nations, no matter how large or small may be their numbers, whether 1,000,000 or 10,000,000.

We could multiply the reasons, had they not already been presented, and there was any doubt about the passage of the bill with such amendments as may be offered in the Senate, after a favorable report by this committee of either S. 1820 or S. 1824.

However, I do discover one very important difference between these two proposals. S. 1820, known as the Russell proposal, reads in its title, "An act to provide for Federal assistance in the maintenance, expansion, and operation of school-lunch and school-milk programs, etc." This language is repeated throughout the bill. On page 1, line 6, "school lunch and milk programs" are specifically named again. In lines 23 and 24 on page 2, we read, "distribution of food and milk for such children." On page 3, line 13, we read, "what kinds and forms of food and milk shall be provided." On page 4, line 1, we read, "this title may be used for the purchase of food and milk and the distribution thereof, or to make payments or repayments for the purchase of food and milk." The language is uniform and explicit throughout that the appropriations made for school lunches are to be for "food and milk."

In marked contrast to this provision in S. 1820 is the ambiguous language of S. 1824, known as the Smith-Ellender bill, which reads, "to provide lunches and nutrition instruction thereto for children while attending school." The language employed here is not only ambiguous, but it is capable of various interpretations as to what the Federal Government may supply for the children to drink, from this appropriation of $50,000,000 "as a measure of national security" * * * "of high-school grade and under" * * * "to safeguard the health and well-being of the Nation's children," as stated in S. 1820, which specifically provides for milk.

It would be possible under the Smith-Ellender bill, S. 1824, to give the school children coffee, with its caffeine, to drink, and tea, with its tannin, to drink, and in some localities, Coca-Cola, and in others a light alcoholic content of malt liquor, let us say up to 3.2 percent which, for taxable purposes, is not now considered an intoxicating beverage. This may not be probable, but it would be possible, and certain powerful interests may and likely would attempt to so construe and interpret the statute so loosely drawn, as it is now construed for boys of high school age in the Army training camps of the Nation and teen-age girls in military service.

We express the hope, therefore, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, that with regard to what shall constitute food and drink, the language of S. 1820, known as the Russell bill, shall be employed, and that such an amendment shall be made in your committee report, and sustained by Congress "to safeguard the health and well-being of the Nation's children," as stated in the act.

Irrigation Versus Navigation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 5 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Irrigation Versus Navigation," originally published in the Minneapolis Star-Journal, and reprinted in the Bismarck (N. Dak.) Tribune of May 2, 1944, together with a news article published in the Bismarck Tribune of the same date entitled "Missouri River Is Low for May."

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IRRIGATION VERSUS NAVIGATION

War prices and unusually plentiful rains have restored Dakota and Montana agriculture to prosperity, but the residents of those States have their fingers crossed. They point to the record since 1880—only one profitable crop year in five. Lack of moisture is the constant threat west of the ninety-seventh meridian. Yet there are small areas which have raised a crop each year in spite of the vagaries of weather. They are the 4,410,000 acres under irrigation along the upper Missouri River and its tributaries.

Westerners are fired with the idea that an increase in irrigation could stabilize their farming. It is estimated an additional 4,560,000 acres could be watered. North Dakota, with 24,000 acres now irrigated, looks forward to 1,500,000 acres made drought-free. The Bureau of Reclamation has ready a report to Congress outlining a plan to spread far distant the water of the Missouri.

The reclamation report will conflict in many particulars with the Army engineers' report, which already is before Congress. The Army proposes a series of dams to control floods and insure navigation on the lower Missouri. Army engineers say that water for irrigation still would be available, but irrigation enthusiasts answer that their needs should be met first and any additional flow be used for navigation. Other forms of transportation are at hand, they argue, to handle the freight which river barges would carry. They have appealed to the Twin Cities, as the business capital of their territory, to assist in presenting their claims.

The rivers and harbors bill recently passed by the House and upon which a Senate subcommittee soon may open hearings contains authorization for a 9-foot channel from Sioux City to the mouth of the Missouri.

Western Congressmen are seeking the inclusion of an amendment which would read: "In connection with dams or works authorized by this act, any use of the waters of any stream or tributary thereof having its source west of the ninety-seventh meridian shall be subordinate to and shall not interfere with any use west of the ninety-seventh meridian of such waters for domestic, irrigation, mining purposes whenever established under State law."

That is the language of an amendment defeated in the House. Senators will be asked to include it in the rivers and harbors bill. Certainly it seems reasonable to insure water for irrigation, a productive enterprise, ahead of navigation on the lower Missouri, where maintenance for traffic is a costly and constant problem.

Yet inland waterways leaders point out that the water of the Missouri is necessary for year-around navigation on the lower Mississippi. With any appreciable diminution of flow from the Missouri in dry weather, the Chain of Rocks near St. Louis would be a big hazard. When the level falls in the lower Mississippi now, water is released from Fort Peck Dam in Montana. It is clear that continued navigation on the lower Mississippi is closely linked to continued traffic on the upper Mississippi to the Twin Cities.

Thus the differing interests of navigation and irrigation appear. Some years enough water is available for the maximum requests of both, but all agree this is not usually the case.

Despite these differences, spokesmen for each side are reasonable men and their usual attitude is only that their arguments not be overlooked before Congress commits itself. Probably the first step in a compromise is to bring together the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation. They have been at odds for years in their whole approach to the Missouri Basin problem. When the two reports are before Congres surely an intelligent integration of them can be worked out.

That might well be the plan for a huge, sound post-war project of everlasting benefit to the northern States of the Great Plains.

MISSOURI RIVER IS LOW FOR MAY

Although the Mississippi River at St. Louis is at a near-record flood stage, the Missouri River here is at the lowest point ever recorded at this season, Federal Meteorologist F. J. Bavendick said Tuesday.

The river stage here Tuesday morning was 3 feet, 1 foot below the previous low mark of 4 feet recorded on May 24, 1938.

The all-time low mark for the Missouri here, Bavendick said, was 0.9 of a foot on December 12, 1913.

Operation of the Fort Peck Dam, which shuts off the flow of water from the main stem of the Missouri, is credited with causing the low flow here.

Inflationary Taxation

OF

HON. JOSEPH H. BALL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 5 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Inflationary Taxation," published in the Northwestern Miller of May 3, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INFLATIONARY TAXATION

In the current issue of his company house organ, mailed to customers, a miller—who we assume would prefer not to be quoted by name—discusses what he terms the increasingly extravagant habits of business enterprises. We are quoting below the essential part of his comment, not only because it is sound reasoning succinctly stated but more because of a single sharply pointed phrase—"Certainly high income tax rates must be more inflationary than all other influences combined."

"Present all-time high in the use of long-distance telephone facilities is one manifestation of the frame of mind of business people. That and the tremendous increase in passenger traffic are, of course, partially due to wartime activities; but to our notion indicate the rapidly growing I-don't-care attitude toward expenses—occasioned by confiscatory tax rates. Extravagance is rampant. Certainly high income tax rates must be more 'inflationary' than all other influences combined.

"The danger to the individual businessman is the formation of bad habits, his own as well as those of his organization. 'What's the use' is a phrase that should never be allowed, for some day the good old ways of thrift must be resumed."

By coincidence, we were about to air our own views on this particular subject when along came this circular supplying the exact text we needed phrased in better words than we ourselves could have chosen. Can any single reader of this think of a single item in the whole vast complexity of causes of present and threatened further inflation than the current income-tax rates, especially those which confiscate virtually all corporation earnings over 5 percent? Marching with it, indeed part and parcel of it, is the incredibly wasteful spending of public money for purposes not associated with the actual war effort and thus adding astronomical sums to the mounting public debt.

Every man associated in any responsible capacity with business and industry well knows how widespread is the practice of considering every kind of expense, not with the customary prudence and exercise of sound business judgment but largely in connection with its relation to taxes, with the frequent answer to expense problems expressed in the phrase, "Oh, well, why not? It costs only 5 cents on the dollar." This applies not only to such minor items as telephone services and travel costs but, especially among some of the country's largest corporations, to such things as advertising and sales promotion extravagances, vast contributions to this and that permissible and presumably worthy cause and a thousand items of cost which would not be given a moment's consideration in normal times.

We have willingly done our share in sandbagging folks for these last-mentioned donations, but have as yet failed to carry on with our cheer leaders' emphasis on the argument that most of such contributions is paid by the Government. The argument is, of course, perfectly all right, fair enough and even endorsed by Government. Furthermore, our conscience is as elastic as most, and we certainly take account of every permissible allowance in our own settlements with the tax sleuths. Yet we someway cannot escape the conclusion voiced by Huckleberry Finn's "Pap" when he declared it "is a hell of a Government any way a feller looks at it." We mean, of course, in this particular matter.

Also we know almost no man responsible for the management of even a modest corporation who would not greatly prefer in these difficult times to pursue a prudent program of expenses, and then pay the Government a fair and just, even overgenerous share of his income provided he were permitted to lay aside the money he now wastes as provision against post-war rehabilitation, reconversion, and a score of other needs not accurately to be even estimated in advance of the event. We can, indeed, testify to the accuracy of this because of consideration we have had to give to it with little or no worth-while result in our own relatively small establishment. Literally none escapes.

Perhaps the danger of "formation of bad business habits" mentioned in the opinion we quoted at the beginning may not be lasting. Men who succeed in business necessarily must have capacity to adjust themselves to changing situations. So quite possibly the tax-reckless spendthrift of today may in the hard days which quite possibly may succeed the peace easily return to his old habits of prudence and economy. Yet, so far as now can be foreseen, he will have then, as he has now, the overshadowing wastes of government, quite possibly increased by some new slant to the economic philosophy of overcoming hard times by increased taxation and multiplied expenditures of public funds. It is not beyond imagination to picture an administration of government setting out to defeat depression by keeping up civilian expenditures to the present basis of war costs. Sounds silly, but might happen.

Manpower Needs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 5 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "How Much Manpower?", published in the New York Times of Thursday, May 4, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW MUCH MANPOWER?

Speaking for the Army Service Forces which he commands, Lieutenant General Somervell tells the American Legion that the Army's greatest demand on the country's manpower is still to come. There will be a terrific problem, he believes, when we try to take 1,400,000 more men from the factories and farms and still try to maintain production at a high enough level to beat Germany and Japan. But, speaking on the same day at a meeting of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. William Green calmly assures us that there is no manpower shortage whatever, only sporadic local shortages; more likely to be labor surpluses from this point forward. The A. F. of L. council itself takes the Army severely to task for ever having proposed a National War Service Act, declares that the arguments in favor of such a measure have been demolished, and demands that all Government officials who have ever favored this proposal back down from their support of it entirely.

It seems to us that the executive council of the American Federation of Labor is taking a quite large burden of responsibility on itself when it attempts to match its judgment against the combined judgment of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the head of the Maritime Commission in the matter of estimating what our manpower needs will be after our armed forces have met, not the mere advance guards but the main military and naval power of our enemies. Mr. Green, and Mr. Murray and Mr. Lewis as well, guessed badly when they originally opposed the prompt enactment of a Selective Service Act. It will be small comfort to the organized labor movement if its leaders again guess badly now.

In our own judgment, not one of the important arguments in favor of the enactment of a National War Service Act has been seriously answered, let alone demolished, by the critics of this plan. Those arguments are that such a measure (1) would provide a more effective method of recruiting manpower to fill really critical shortages than is furnished by the present hit-or-miss methods; (2) could and would bring about a reduction of labor turn-over, which is now running at the perfectly fantastic rate of 72 percent a year, in wartime; (3) would provide a safeguard for use in sudden desperate emergencies, which may occur if we are forced suddenly to shift tens or even hundreds of thousands of workers into the production of some entirely new weapon to meet a surprise tactic or a surprise invention of the enemy; and (4) would give welcome and needed assurance to our soldiers in the field that they are not being discriminated against unfairly; that we who are safe at home recognize and willingly accept the same legal obligation for service which now rests solely on their shoulders.

These are all strong arguments in a year when many American boys will die in action in France and the Pacific.

Civil Rights No Longer Secure

OF

HON. THOMAS D. WINTER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Speaker, President Roosevelt's ordering the Army to move in on Montgomery Ward & Co. after he had been assured by Attorney General Biddle that he had a legal right to issue such an order, on the ground that labor difficulties at the plant were impeding or threatening to impede the war effort, is, in my opinion, one of the most disgraceful spectacles in the history of this Nation.

What were those labor difficulties? No issue of wages or working conditions was involved. What was involved was this; the company had not signed the C. I. O.'s contract which carried a maintenance of union membership clause and which required the company to withhold union dues from the employees' wages for the benefit of the union. The old contract had expired in December 1943. The War Labor Board ordered Montgomery Ward & Co. to sign a contract with the C. I. O. without an election by the company employees as provided for by an act of this Congress. The company refused. The C. I. O. officials ordered a strike and placed pickets around the plant in an effort to keep employees out of the premises. However, with protection from the law enforcement officials of Chicago, against violence, many of the workers remained at their jobs and the company continued to operate its business. But because there was no signed contract with the C. I. O. Attorney General Biddle ruled that Montgomery Ward & Co. was impeding or threatening to impede the war effort.

If the war effort can be impeded in this manner in a mail-order establishment such as this, it can be empeded in any business institution in the Nation and soldiers can be sent to take over whenever the President gives the order.

The average American citizen is not concerned over the affairs of Montgomery Ward & Co. as such. What he is concerned with is the implication that the trend toward fascism has become so pronounced in the United States that it is now possible for the Government to take steps such as the Fascists took in Italy and the Nazis took in Germany—steps that mean the civil rights of American citizens no longer are secure; that they are subject to the whims and prejudices of Government officials and agents.

Supporters of the administration are crying out in holy horror that the company's chairman, Mr. Avery, defied the President and by the same token defied the Government of the United States. Sounds like a good argument, does it not? But less than a year ago one John L. Lewis was defying the same President and the same Government of the United States, but the President, through his Attorney General, sent no soldiers of the United States Army to seize the United Mine Workers organization and bodily eject Mr. Lewis from his office. Evidently it makes a difference who does the defying.

Perhaps part of the answer as to why there is a difference in who does the defying may be found in a speech Attorney General Biddle made on March 5, 1942, at a banquet held at the Cosmos Club here in the city of Washington and sponsored by the leftist New Republic magazine, celebrating the tenth anniversary of the New Deal's ascent to power. It is also interesting to note that Sidney Hillman, now head of the C. I. O.'s political action committee, was a guest at this banquet. In this speech Mr. Biddle stated, "The success of the New Deal is due to the fact that it is not just a group of theorists and liberals, but because it is a political party tied up with the labor movement under an able political leader." Mr. Biddle also stated in this speech, "Regardless of the war, we must keep up the fight for the liberalism of the New Deal."

Defiance of the Government in error reaps no condemnation through the years. Many men have defied the Government when it was in error. George Washington did and so did Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. Avery, as chairman of the board of Montgomery Ward & Co., in this case defied the Government because he dared to believe the fact we are at war is not enough to empower even the President of the United States to ignore the fourth amendment to the Constitution which provides that the rights of the people to be secure in their persons, homes, businesses, and effects against unreasonable search and seizure shall not be violated.

A great majority of the American people, I believe, agree with Mr. Avery that a great mercantile establishment is not a war plant and that the Presidential right of seizure does not apply without due process of law.

For those of us who believe in peaceful adjudication of controversies between capital and labor—adjudication—not mere arbitrary decisions by the administrative branch of the Government, there is something ominously inimical in the helplessness of any individual or firm opposed by the Government as illustrated in this case.

The manner in which President Roosevelt and Attorney General Biddle handled this situation just is not the American way of doing things. It smacks too much of Hitlerism, the very thing thousands of American boys are fighting and dying to suppress.

As the duly elected representatives of the parents of these boys, and the boys themselves, it is our solemn duty to see to it that the liberty they are dying for on the battlefields abroad is not assassinated on the home front and to this end I am sure the Congress will meet its responsibility unflinchingly.

REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, in connection with this Montgomery Ward matter I shall first briefly summarize my position and then set it forth more fully. First, then I am going to vote in favor of the investigation. I think it is altogether fitting and proper, and I hope every phase of the matter will be gone into.

In the second place I believe that orders of the Executive and the executive departments should in all cases be subject to appeal to the courts to determine and define the extent and scope of those powers. But in the third place I should like to point out that if the War Labor Boards to be effective if it is to settle labor disputes in the only way they can be settled in wartime the War Labor Board must be supported in its decisions by responsible public officials. To support the Board only part of the time, only when a Member of Congress likes the decision is not to support them at all. Unless the War Labor Board's decisions are going to be upheld, unless people are going to loyally abide by them, then it cannot be what it was set up to be, namely a wartime substitute for the last steps of collective bargaining, for the strike or the lockout or action by either employers or workers which impedes production. Upon those people who are undermining the Board and its work will rest responsibility, if they succeed in their efforts of desiring some other means of assuring us a continuation of the most prodigious production that has ever taken place in all the world. America is outproducing the whole world today. Something or other must be right about that situation, Members of Congress, corporation officials, and everybody else ought to think a long time before they destroy existing machinery that has made this production possible. But to encourage defiance of decisions, especially unanimous decisions of the Board, is to invite exactly that result.

The temporary taking over of certain property of Montgomery Ward & Co. by the Government and the events which led up to it have precipitated a critical situation in our country on the very eve of the invasion of Europe, when all our thoughts should be upon that great effort.

It is very important that some straight thinking be done by all of us, and with the hope that all the facts can be made available to the people thereby I shall vote for the pending resolution for a thorough congressional investigation of this whole Montgomery Ward matter.

I cannot agree fully with the sweeping nature of the Attorney General's description of the President's powers. There are, and must be, limits to those powers, although in time of war those limits have got to be greatly extended if we are to fight the war successfully. The question, however, as to whether either the President or the War Labor Board has exceeded the proper scope of their powers should be decided by the courts, as is now being done. In the minority report of the Smith committee to investigate executive agencies, which was just issued, I myself wrote:

> It is our opinion that provision for appeal to the courts of the land from the decisions of the executive agencies exercising such broad and sweeping powers as those given to the Office of Price Administration and War Labor Board is no more than fitting and proper. At the very least, citizens and organizations should have the opportunity of appealing to the courts to see whether the rule, regulation, order, or decision is a valid one and whether the agency in question has exceeded its duly granted power and authority in issuing such a regulation. Indeed, it is our opinion that provision for appeal to the courts would strengthen rather than weaken the stabilization structure, and we are certain that the possibility of such court review would add greatly to the confidence of the people of the Nation in their dealings with these agencies.

According to the tripartite form of the American Government Congress must grant powers, the Executive must exercise them and the courts must decide whether or not they have been properly exercised.

Fundamental to all other considerations, however, is the effect of this whole situation on America's war effort. This is not the first time that similar action has been taken by the Government during this war. When North American Aircraft plant was taken over I spoke publicly in support of the President's action, pointing out that the Nation could not tolerate a strike and that the interest of the Nation was paramount to the particular interest of any group.

In connection with the coal mine dispute, I spoke publicly against refusal of John L. Lewis to submit his case to the War Labor Board, against the fact that the War Labor Board was circumvented in the handling of the matter, and against what appeared to me the breaking of the no-strike pledge by Lewis.

In the railroad situation I was thoroughly convinced that better handling of it by the Government could have settled the matter without the drastic action taken. But I wrote in my newspaper column at the time my approval under all the circumstances of the President's action and pointing out that by means of the Government taking over the railroads temporarily all possibility of strike was removed. In this particular case I do not believe a strike would have taken place anyway.

But my purpose in reviewing this history is to show one thing. From the beginning I have consistently upheld the principle that the War Labor Board must be the wartime substitute for peacetime methods of collective bargaining; that strikes and stoppages of work, whoever is at fault, must be prevented; and that the only way this can be done is by both sides accepting decisions of this Board and loyally abiding by them. The only alternative is to let management and labor fight out their differences and to leave both of them free to do so. In wartime that simply will not work.

I cannot take a different position with regard to the Montgomery Ward case than I took in connection with North American Aircraft, the mines, or the railroads. I found no great outcry that the Constitution was being overthrown in any of these three instances. In those three cases the Government took action to curb the demands of labor. In the Montgomery Ward case it is taking action because the employer has refused to agree to a War Labor Board decision, although it was a unanimous decision of employer, public, and labor members of the Board. I have supported the Government when it temporarily put the flag over properties in order to resist demands of labor, which the workers believed were just demands. I take the same position in support of my Government when it takes similar action to meet Montgomery Ward's defiance of a unanimous War Labor Board decision. I do not believe that in wartime labor has a right to strike against a War Labor Board decision. Neither do I believe Montgomery Ward & Co. has that right.

When last winter the President took over the railroads temporarily the unions stated, as they should have done, that it was impossible to contemplate a strike against the United States Government, regardless of how justified the men might feel in the position they had taken. Montgomery Ward said just the opposite.

Now, what exactly did the President ask of Montgomery Ward? He simply asked that they agree to continue in effect the terms of the agreement with the union under which they have operated for the past year until such time, not longer than 30 days, as was required for the National Labor Relations Board to conduct an election. Montgomery Ward refused to agree to a 30-day continuance of the same agreement that they had agreed to a year ago and thus precipitated the present situation. What changed their minds?

Mr. Avery's statement that the issue is whether or not anyone is going to be compelled to belong to a union in order to work for Montgomery Ward & Co. is simply false. The maintenance of membership provision does not compel the employer to hire members of the union. He can hire whomever he sees fit. Neither does it compel any employee not a member of the union to join it. All it provides is that anyone who continues as a member of the union 15 days after the contract goes into effect shall remain a member of the union as long as that contract lasts—usually for 1 year. As a matter of fact, Mr. Avery himself has made the statement in connection with the current dispute that he did not want to deal with this particular union for the reason that it only had 20 percent of the workers in the plant as members. In other words, 80 percent of Mr. Avery's employees have, under the terms of the very same War Labor Board decision which he refuses to continue to abide by, not been members of the union according to his own statement.

It is utterly impossible for the War Labor Board to decide disputes in a manner 100 percent agreeable to both labor and management. Usually it will not please either. In the future it will make decisions denying pay increases to workers; it will make decisions which employers will not like.

If the management of Montgomery Ward is going to be exalted into a position of national heroism because it chooses to defy the Government of the United States, then we must expect, if we are to be fair, to accord that same right to other employers and other groups of workers in future labor disputes. It goes without saying that those employers and those workers will be quite as convinced of the righteousness of their cause as Mr. Avery. Either the War Labor Board decisions have to be accepted and upheld or else everybody—not just Mr. Avery—will have to be excused from paying any attention to them and allowed to do as they see fit. In that event the War Labor Board will become useless and we will be without any machinery for settling labor disputes in this war period. The dangers in such a situation I need not elaborate.

As I have said, I believe Montgomery Ward or any other company or any union should be able to go to the courts for a decision as to whether or not the War Labor Board acted in excess of its authority and whether the action taken is legal or not. Such an appeal to the courts is now being taken and these questions will be determined there as they should be. Should the courts decide that the Government acted in excess of its authority then that puts an entirely different complexion on the whole matter so far as I am concerned. It also will mean that we must very quickly devise some other method than those now in use of assuring continuous production for the war.

No one regrets more than I that this whole thing has happened. Its political value to the opponents of the present administration is too obvious to require comment. Whether that factor in the situation influenced Montgomery Ward to take the position it did I do not know, nor do I presume to say. But the refusal of this company to continue in effect for a brief 30 days its working agreement with this union pending a decision through a duly held election by the National Labor Relations Board as to whether the union is entitled to be the certified collective bargaining agent in its plants is in my judgment a very considerable contribution toward weakening the hand of the only Government we have at preesnt to carry on this war—namely, the Government of the United States.

Farm Machinery

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, our farmers have been called on to meet tremendous food-production goals in 1944. The production records made by our patriotic, hard-working farmers during the past few years have been miraculous when we consider the handicaps under which they have worked. They have had many difficulties in obtaining necessary machinery—and too often have not been able to get it at all. They have lost much of their young, experienced farm labor, and in spite of the numbers who have already gone into military service, I read in this morning's paper that Selective Service has ordered reconsideration of present farm deferments with the view of drafting more of our younger, skilled farmers.

Whitley County in my district in Indiana, like other farm areas, is experiencing a difficult farm help situation. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following resolutions unanimously adopted by the Whitley County War Board in session at Columbia City, Ind., on April 28:

Whereas the different local divisions of the United States Department of Agriculture have been instructed to urge farmers to produce food to the maximum of their ability as a patriotic endeavor; and

Whereas industrial plants have been given war contracts which enable manufacturers to far outbid farmers for labor with farm products marketed under O. P. A. ceiling prices; and

Whereas the age of the average Whitley County farm operator is estimated to be well above 50 years; and

Whereas the selective-service policy now operative, is rapidly raising the average operator's age to still higher levels, thereby alarmingly reducing production efficiency; and

Whereas the labor-saving machinery policy now in effect is inadequate for the production needs of the county; and

Whereas imported foreign labor has been altogether unsatisfactory for all general farm work excepting hand labor: Therefore be it hereby

Resolved, That we the undersigned members of the Whitley County War Board of the United States Department of Agriculture, do petition the Whitley County Selective Service Board to maintain the present supply of dependable and skilled agricultural labor on our farms throughout the productive season now under way; and be it further Resolved, That copies of this resolution be submitted to the Whitley County Selective Service Board, the Indiana Selective Service Board, the Indiana U. S. D. A. War Board and the press.

WILSON BENNETT,
Chairman, Agricultural Adjustment Association.
WELDON MAY,
Assistant Secretary-Treasurer Albion Production Credit Association.
H. K. WAUGH,
Manager, Whitley County, R. E. M. C.
B. V. WIDNEY,
County Agent, Purdue Agricultural Extension Service.

D. A. V. Policies and Objectives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. FAY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. FAY. Mr. Speaker, as a wounded veteran of World War No. 1, I am a life member of the Disabled American Veterans, which, incidentally, is the only congressionally chartered organization composed exclusively of those Americans who have been either wounded, gassed, injured, or disabled while serving actively in the armed forces of the United States, or of some country allied with it, during time of war.

As a D. A. V. member, I receive its official publication, the Disabled American Veterans semimonthly newspaper in a recent issue of which I noted an outline of the policies and objectives of the D. A. V.

This outline emphasizes two points: First, preserve America and its freedoms; and second, promote welfare of America's disabled defenders and their dependents. These two points, with which all of us can certainly agree, are interrelated, and are of vital importance to the future welfare of America.

Such outline is here inserted, as follows:

I. Preserve America and its freedoms.

A. Protect America.

1. Maintain adequate specialized armed forces. (Numerous laws, appropriations, and pending bills.)

2. Produce needed war material quickly (policy).

3. Mobilize America's manpower efficiently (policy).

B. Provide adequately for America's defenders and their dependents.

Now before Committee on Military Affairs, H. R. 1110, as to Navy and Marine Corps, by Hon. ED. V. IZAC, of California; now before Committee on Naval Affairs. Also secs. 55–56 of H. R. 912.)

4. Emphasize complete assembly of medical records before discharge (policy).

C. Eliminate excess profits from all-out war for freedom.

1. Control purchasing power of United States money (policy).

2. Impose taxes according to ability to pay (policy).

3. Regulate men, money, material, machines toward war victory (policy).

D. Perpetuate Americanism.

1. Protect Americanism by its promotion. (Educational publicity.)

2. Promote workable representative democracy. (Educational publicity. Numerous bills.)

3. Reinstate direct-service connections granted in 1933–34 by the President's Review Boards. (H. R. 935, by Hon. JOE B. BATES of Kentucky. Now before Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. Also sec. 8 of H. R. 912.)

R. 3377, increasing from $40 to $50 per month and to $60 where 65 years of age or so rated for 10 years, after being passed by House on Oct. 11, 1943, Rept. No. 747, was favorably reported by Senate Committee on Finance on May 5, 1944, S. Rept. 855.)

9. Authorize payment of compensation for partial service-connected disability plus the percentage of pension for permanent total disability (nonservice) equal to the difference between 100 percent and his degree of service-connected disability. (H. R. 918, by Mr. RANKIN. Now before his committee. Also sec. 13 of H. R 912).

Mr. Speaker, many various objectives under the last principal point above are, it will be noted, embodied in the D. A. V. omnibus bill H. R. 912, introduced by my friend from Mississippi, the Honorable JOHN E. RANKIN, chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. Each separate objective is also covered by a separate legislative bill as indicated.

This comprehensive program of the D. A. V. is well integrated, looking to the welfare of our country, our communities, and our comrades. By providing for the welfare of America's disabled defenders and their dependents we thereby help to promote, protect, and preserve America and its democratic institutions.

America will, of course, be able to continue to provide adequately for its disabled defenders and their dependents only if our democratic America is preserved. Victory in World War No. II is therefore regarded by the D. A. V. and all Americans as our primary objective. Adequate provisions for America's disabled defenders and their dependents are inevitably linked up with the protection, preservation, and promotion of America.

To see to it that worthy disabled veterans of all of America's wars, and their dependents, are enabled technically to establish their equitable claims for various types of benefits provided for by existing legislation, the D. A. V. has long maintained the largest staff of any veteran organization of full-time national-service officers—one or more in nearly every regional office of the Veterans' Administration.

Every American war veteran who has been wounded, gassed, injured, or disabled by reason of his active service in the armed forces is eligible for membership in this exclusive service-giving outfit. Every eligible ought to support its legislative and service activities by becoming a paid-up life member of the D. A. V. If he was born prior to January 1, 1902, he can do this by payment of $50 or, if born thereafter, by payment of $100 in cash, or by a down payment of $5, plus installments until fully paid.

Application and payment for D. A. V. life membership should be sent to my long-time friend, Vivian D. Corbly, national adjutant, Disabled American Veterans, 2840 Melrose Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Patriots' Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include the following resolution adopted May 1, 1944, by the Boston (Mass.) City Council, urging that April 19 of each year be proclaimed as Patriots' Day, to emphasize the significance of the first military engagement between the American colonists and British troops of the War of the Revolution:

Whereas the 19th day of April, 1775, witnessed the first military engagement between the American colonists and British troops and the opening events of the War of the Revolution and the struggles through which the Nation passed in the early days; and

Whereas the City of Boston played so important a part on that first patriots' day, and is concerned in strengthening general interest and knowledge of the historic events of that day which lighted the torch of American independence; and

Whereas a frequent recurrence to the events out of which this great Nation arose, and a better understanding of the principles upon which our forefathers grounded their independence cannot fail to stimulate and renew that high sense of patriotism which has ever been the glory of our country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Boston City Council in session assembled hereby requests that favorable action be taken by the Judiciary Committee at Washington on House Joint Resolution 117 of 1943, introduced into the Congress of the United States by Congresswoman EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, asking that national recognition be given to this date by authorizing and requesting the President of the United States to proclaim April 19 of each year as patriots' day, emphasizing the significance of the events that occurred on April 19, 1775, and inviting the people of the United States to observe the day with appropriate ceremonies in commemoration of the patriots who laid down their lives for the cause of independence; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the Judiciary Committee of the Congress and to the United States Senators and Representatives from Massachusetts.

Mrs. Alfred E. Smith

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of today:

MRS. ALFRED E. SMITH

It will be 44 years tomorrow since her marriage. The stroke is cruel. The long "bright day is done." The survivor's sole consolation is the deep religious faith and hope that are his as they were his wife's. Because he is the best-beloved citizen of New York, because his wife won the affection of many friends, this is a public sorrow and we may speak of it. The life of these two seems like an idyl of some happier world.

She, too, was a fourth warder, but her parents had moved up to the Bronx. Young Mr. Smith bicycled up there time and again. He was a long time winning her. The wedding journey was to Bath Beach, where they lived for a while. Then they came back from Brooklyn to Madison Street, to Peck Slip. The convent-bred girl washed, ironed, cooked, scrubbed, swept. Mr. Smith began his political career. Thereafter, whenever she could, wherever he was speaking, she was in the audience. After his eye had found her he knew, as he said, that "he was all right."

Whatever honors came upon him, to whatever post he was called, she was equal to any duty or fortune. When he was a candidate for President the crowds in the cities which she visited with him gave her a friendly welcome. Whether she was doing her own housework or mistress of that somber palace, the Governor's Mansion, she was serene, living for her family, for others, for charity, for her church. In the turbulent stream of events the life of these two together is a gracious remembrance. The presses swarm with novels and romances. In none can be found anything half as pleasant and as touching as the game of cards that Mr. and Mrs. Smith played every night before bedtime.

The Smith-Connally Act and the Montgomery Ward Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, as a friend of both labor and management I rise today to urge Congress to repeal the Smith-Connally Act and to do it immediately before the pernicious effects of that act become more widespread.

The act stands indicted and convicted of two major crimes against public welfare, as follows:

First. It has cast unwarranted reflection on the masses of American labor who have accomplished the greatest war-production record of all time.

Second. It is doing incalculable damage to the relations between Government and industry.

I have deep feelings on this score because as a citizen and as a representative of citizens I feel very keenly my obligation to do everything I possibly can to protect civil liberties and free enterprise and no matter what may come I am going to be true to that obligation.

To my mind there is one lesson the seizure of the Montgomery Ward plant points clearly, and that is the advisability of repealing the Smith-Connally Act.

The President and Commander in Chief must, of course, have ample authority to deal with incidents that threaten the war effort but he has that ample authority under his other war powers and he does not need the extraplenary, ambiguous, and apparently all-embracing authority in the Smith-Connally Act which the Attorney General construed as the basis of his procedure in taking over the Montgomery Ward plant.

I voted against the Smith-Connally bill and on that occasion I gave out a statement in which I said:

> I think we ought to be recapturing the powers Congress has surrendered instead of augmenting those powers. When this war is over I want this country to be the same country of free enterprise it always has been and which, please God, may it always be.
> Yet no totalitarian ruler of Europe or Asia has more power over industry than this bill confers on the President of the United States. He can take over plants at will and hold them; his executive instrumentality, the War Labor Board, will write labor contracts all over the United States. I do not want Franklin D. Roosevelt or any other President of the United States to have any such power. I will not, as long as I am a Member of the House vote totalitarianism into the laws of the United States. It is altogether too dangerous.

Mr. Speaker, it is only fair to the President to say that he never asked for the authority which the antilabor groups in Congress, in an effort to strike at labor, thrust upon him. He opposed the passage of the Smith-Connally bill, and when the Congress passed it he vetoed it and it was passed over his head.

I think it is now pretty clear that the zeal of labor-baiters overreached itself when it forced the passage of the Smith-Connally Act. I imagine that in the light of the recent developments in the Montgomery Ward case many who formerly supported the Smith-Connally Act would now be reconciled to its repeal.

The uncertainty which the passage of the Smith-Connally Act has injected into the relations between Government and industry was by the Washington Evening Star in its leading editorial of April 28, 1944, from which I quote as follows:

> In taking over the plant, the President acted on the basis of an opinion by Attorney General Biddle that he had lawful authority to do so. A careful reading of the opinion, however, leaves many doubts on this score.
> The Attorney General relied in the first instance on the Smith-Connally Act, which empowers the President under certain conditions to seize "any plant, mine, or facility equipped for the manufacture, production, or mining of any articles or materials which may be required for the war effort or which may be useful in connection therewith." It requires a considerable exercise of the imagination to fit the Montgomery Ward mail-order house into this category, and there is excellent reason to believe that Congress in passing the law had no thought that it would be applied to such an establishment.
> It also may be inferred that Mr. Biddle has doubts on this score, for his opinion goes on to express the view that, aside from any authority derived through the Smith-Connally Act, the President could lawfully seize the Montgomery Ward plant under "an aggregate of powers" that are "derived from the Constitution and from various (unspecified) statutes enacted by Congress for the purpose of carrying on the war."
> Unless it is proposed to abandon constitutional government in time of war, this assertion of vaguely defined power is an exceedingly dangerous doctrine. Where does the President's authority end? If he can seize a man's business and forcibly evict the operating head under his "aggregate of powers" and without regard to specific legislation enacted by Congress to deal with such situations, what protection has any citizen against wanton abuse of power?

Without in any way prejudging the case, I shall vote for an investigation of the Government's seizure of the Montgomery Ward plant. In a matter of such transcendent importance it is in the interest of labor, of management, of the Government, and of the people of America, that the facts should be immediately developed and the issues immediately clarified. Let the truth be brought out. If no wrong has been done the investigation can do no harm. If wrong has been done the facts should be known. No harm can ever come to the public by having the truth revealed through an impartial investigation. The investigation should be conducted openly, with unrestricted opportunity to the press to report all of the proceedings. It should be as thorough as possible, and it should be by the Congress of the United States to whom the people are looking for protection of their constitutional rights.

There has been much criticism of Congress for alleged failure to resist trends which many people believe threaten to change the form and mold of our Government. Here is a fine opportunity for Congress, the popular branch of government, to assert itself and to render real public service. Ours is a government by laws and must always remain so. This resolution does not condemn anybody or exonerate anybody. It merely provides for an impartial examination to establish the facts so that the people of America may know.

I want to know more about the Government's seizure of the Montgomery Ward plant. I want to know not only what the Government did but what the company did leading up to the dramatic culmination of its controversy with the Government. As an investigatorial duty it is a matter that very properly comes under the jurisdiction of Congress. I hope that Congress will see its duty and rise to its responsibility.

I am against a labor draft; but I go further and say that neither business nor labor must be regimented. I do not believe that there is any substitute for the American system of free enterprise. I am opposed to the Government entering any field of business that can be carried on by private business under the principle of free enterprise. Those are all questions that are involved directly or indirectly in the present controversy.

The investigation of the Montgomery Ward case should be as complete as human wisdom and efforts can make it, but we do not need to wait for its findings before we strike from the books an act of demonstrated potentiality for harm, both to the great body of organized labor which has made a magnificent record of war production, and to industry which must be protected and preserved if free enterprise is to survive. The immediate duty of Congress is to repeal the Smith-Connally Act, and I hope it will do so without any waste of time.

Election Tests

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROGER C. SLAUGHTER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. SLAUGHTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of May 4, 1944:

ELECTION TESTS

The people of Florida and of Alabama, even more than the two successful candidates for senatorial renomination in those States, deserve congratulations on the outcome of Tuesday's primary contests. We are unreservedly glad that Senators PEPPER and HILL were renominated—not because they happen to be new dealers, but because the opposition to them was ugly, obscurantist, and essentially undemocratic. What was tested on Tuesday was neither the popularity of the administration nor of this particular pair of its supporters, but the intelligence of voters in the two States concerned. Happily the intelligence of the voters was equal to the test.

Rarely have election practices in the United States descended to so low a level of meanness and chicanery as during the campaigns just ended in Florida and Alabama. The wholly irrelevant issue of race was raised by those who strove to beat the incumbents. Whispered innuendoes and phony photographs were circulated to inflame racial prejudice. But when all this fog and poison cleared away, it was found that the people of Florida and Alabama hadn't succumbed. There is a good deal of vitality left in the democratic process, after all—not to say common sense in the American people.

The Montgomery Ward Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial taken from the Daily Pantagraph, Bloomington, Ill., under date of May 3, 1944.

This editorial is well worth reading by every Member of the House. It puts the finger directly to the point as to whether or not in this proposed congressional inquiry we will "press on into the fundamental constitutional powers of the President and propose definite bounds for it."

In the Montgomery Ward case we see where once again legal interpretations have been strained to favor one group while punishing another, and that the Attorney General and his aides are reading into the law things which were never the thought, intent, or purpose of Congress when the legislation was passed. In addition, it does seem that under the cloak of war, many unwarranted and uncalled-for steps are being taken as acts of favoritism and rather than these acts proving of any benefit to the war effort they are most definitely helping to break down national unity.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, this matter needs a complete investigation and I wholeheartedly support the passage of this resolution.

The editorial follows:

A GREAT ISSUE FROM A LITTLE ONE

The only possible excuse for the seizure of Montgomery Ward was that the company's attitude regarding a labor union was interfering with the war. (The business itself was in full operation.)

Yet Attorney General Biddle argued before the court Monday that "no business of any kind is immune" from the President's power of seizure. Apparently, he would agree with the Montgomery Ward attorney who said that if the President could seize the Chicago store he could also seize a general store in Marshfield, Wis.

The President of the United States in time of war is one of the most powerful governmental leaders in the world. As Biddle argued, he does have a vast constitutional reserve of power as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

But that is exactly the point. As Commander in Chief, he prosecutes the war and this embraces tremendous power over civilians. Does it, then, include the power of seizing a retail mail order house because it would not accede to a labor ruling?

Biddle seemed to sense the weakness of the Government's position for he went on to try and make a case for regarding Montgomery Ward as a war facility. The Smith-Connally act, which defines the President's power to seize plants, authorizes him to take over any "plant, mine, or facility equipped for manufacturing or mining of any materials used for the war effort or essential thereto." Biddle stressed the word "facility."

And yet, he retreated from this position too. "The essence of this case is based not upon the type of goods Montgomery Ward & Co. may or may not produce, not on a narrow construction of the law, but upon the whole history of Executive orders issued by the President. It is based upon the war emergency. . . ."

This seems to bring one back to the sweeping declaration that the President can seize any business in the country.

Despite the tangents, such as the precise meaning of the Smith-Connally law, this is the essence of the Montgomery Ward case. It is a war industry only by the furthest stretch of the imagination. A similar stretch would take in any kind of enterprise.

The Montgomery Ward case has deeply disturbed the people. The administration argues that the quarrel with a union was disturbing. But the administration's action is much more so. It has raised questions and created suspicions at a time when national unity should come before anything. This dangerous, ill-considered act has created an issue far greater than any involved in the original controversy about union maintenance.

If the court decides the president does have the power to seize any business in the country, regardless of its connection with the war, then the congressional inquiry now getting underway should not rest with a few hearings. It should press on into the fundamental constitutional powers of the President and propose definite bounds for it. The "vast constitutional reserve of power," if it is to be used recklessly, constitutes a danger to the people's liberties.

Acceleration of Peacetime Procedures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARY T. NORTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Evening Star of May 4, 1944:

ACCELERATION OF PEACETIME PROCEDURES

The intemperate protests of union spokesmen at Montgomery Ward should not serve to becloud the fact that the National Labor Relations Board, in ordering a representation election within 7 days, has acted with commendable speed to resolve one of the central issues in this extraordinary wartime controversy.

It is the function of the N. L. R. B. to determine the appropriate bargaining units and to conduct an election to ascertain whether the union has a majority in these units. From the practical standpoint, and without regard to legal questions concerning the validity of the seizure of the Chicago plant at the order of the President, the labor board election should settle the dispute. If the union wins in either or both of the designated units the objection which Montgomery Ward has interposed to negotiation of a new contract will disappear. And if the union loses that will automatically terminate its asserted right to represent the employees.

In these circumstances, and particularly in view of the resentment stirred up by the use of troops to take over the business, it was obviously desirable to dispose of the representation issue as quickly as possible. Hence, the N. L. R. B., invoking procedures which have been perfected for speeding up the handling of labor disputes presumed to bear on the prosecution of the war, arranged for a preliminary hearing in Chicago last Saturday. This hearing was completed on Monday and the transcript was flown to Washington and laid before the members of the national board on Tuesday morning. They completed their consideration of it that day and ordered that the election be held as early as possible or, in any event, within 7 instead of the usual 30 days.

This acceleration of peacetime procedures has brought excited protests from spokesmen for the union involved, one of them going to the extent of describing the order as "the dirtiest deal ever dished out to labor by the N. L. R. B." This is a complaint which can be discounted, however, for the N. L. R. B. does not "dish out dirty deals" to labor. There is every reason to believe that the arrangement provided for in the order is as fair to one party as to the other, and certainly it is in the interest of expediting the settlement of a dispute which has been hanging fire too long and which has caused an internal disruption in this country out of all proportion to its inherent importance.

The Montgomery Ward Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me I am including in my remarks two editorials, one from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch entitled "The Ugly Case of Ward's" and the other from the St. Louis Star-Times entitled "The Montgomery Ward Seizure."

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch]

THE UGLY CASE OF WARD'S

In the Montgomery Ward case, exception may be taken to the course of action of all of the three parties involved—the company itself, the labor union, and the Government.

The company and its president, Sewell Avery, have a bad record of intransigeance in wartime. In December 1942, after a prolonged controversy in which Avery became known as the John L. Lewis of industry, President Roosevelt ordered the company to comply with a War Labor Board ruling that it sign a C. I. O. contract embodying a clause for maintenance of union membership.

At that time, there was no question that the union was the legal bargaining agent for the employees and, however strongly Avery felt about maintenance of union and however justified his position may have been in ordinary times, his last-ditch resistance to the W. L. B. brought down upon him the condemnation even of industry members of W. L. B.

Referring to the questionable advertisements published by Montgomery Ward at that time, Roger B. Lapham, steamship line head, said:

"Ward's has freedom of speech and the industry members of this Board also have freedom of speech, and they intend to use it to tell the truth and not a damn bunch of half truths."

Another industry member, Harry L. Derby of American Cyanamid, said:

"Montgomery Ward has done the greatest disservice to industry and the private enterprise system of any concern in the United States, and I feel that just as strongly as I can."

The latest position of Montgomery Ward will necessarily be read in the context of its past attitude toward W. L. B., although the present dispute has some different aspects.

The company now is able to question whether the union does in fact represent the majority of the employees and is, therefore, the employees' legal bargaining agent.

Under the circumstances, the position of the union is subject to criticism. First, why has it resisted an election or other test which would determine exactly its rights under the National Labor Relations Act? If it had been able to make a clear showing that it continues to be the legal bargaining agent of the employees, the company's position today would hardly be defensible.

Second. The union can be criticized for going on strike in time of war in violation of unionism's no-strike pledge. However great the provocation, and it must be recalled here that the union is dealing with a very hostile management, the union is not nearly in as good case now as it would have been if it had disciplined itself in the difficult situation by which it was confronted.

In seizing the plant of a commercial company not a war industry in the strict sense of the term, the Government has brought into question certain legal and constitutional questions that are not at all clear, despite Attorney General Biddle's opinion.

The Attorney General himself was at pains to write that opinion. He had to fall back on that uncharted no-man's land of Presidential war powers. He had to say:

"In time of war, when the existence of the Nation is at stake, this aggregate of powers (conferred by Constitution and statute) includes authority to take reasonable steps to prevent Nation-wide labor disturbances that threaten to interfere seriously with the conduct of the war."

Many lawyers will question the shotgun nature of Mr. Biddle's opinion. He and the Government would be in much better case if he could point to the language of the War Labor Disputes Act or any other statute and show, without doubt, that the President's powers in this case are specifically outlined. The nearest approach to the specific was citation of a section of the law saying the President may take action in any dispute that might interrupt work that contributes to the effective prosecution of the war. The application of this clause to the present case is doubtful.

So with the legal basis of the Government's action cast in doubt, with the union's position impaired by its walk-out, and with the company branded with intransigeance in time of war, the picture is not pretty.

It is only fair to the union and to the Government to say that the ugly situation in Chicago could have been avoided if Sewell Avery had not, on two occasions, set himself stubbornly against the Government in wartime.

We repeat he has a perfect right to insist that maintenance of union is the opening door to the closed shop, to which he is opposed on principle. He has a perfect right to cite his construction of the law. He has a perfect right to make the strongest kind of case before the W. L. B.

But there are values involved here that rise above all these things. These values concern the proper behavior of parties to a controversy in wartime. Many employers have, in the interest of national unity and patriotism, swallowed W. L. B. rulings that are distasteful to them. They have temporarily surrendered principles and abandoned strong legal positions because they believed they owed it to the country not to cause harmful distractions from the war effort.

In the light of the sacrifices other private businesses have made and of the discipline they have imposed upon themselves, Sewell Avery and Montgomery Ward have done the country a disservice.

[From the St. Louis Star-Times]

THE MONTGOMERY WARD SEIZURE

In the seizure by the Government of the great mail-order house of Montgomery Ward & Co. the country witnesses an unhappy failure of national and private interests to attain the harmonious cooperation essential in wartime. From the soldier at the front to the board of directors' rooms, the war has demanded sacrifices and has altered the pattern of peacetime behavior.

The 2-year-long quarrel between Ward and the War Labor Board was dramatically climaxed yesterday when a truckload of military police physically took over the huge retail store. A total of only 13 property seizures by the Government, during more than 2 years of war, indicates that in the main we have solved our differences without carrying executives kicking and squirming from their offices.

No one interested in the inviolability and health of our democratic institutions as they bear upon both the rights of men and those of property can brush aside the assertion of Ward's that it is a nonwar enterprise and that its seizure represents a dangerous expansion of arbitrary power over property by government.

But there should be no leaping to conclusions either from the springboard of union sympathies or of antagonism to the Roosevelt administration. The facts on both sides should be soberly appraised.

Mr. Roosevelt ordered seizure of Montgomery Ward & Co. under the War Disputes Act. Representative HOWARD SMITH of Virginia, one of the co-authors of the act, has stated that he never contemplated its application to such an establishment as that of Ward. Nevertheless the President acted under a specific provision, section 3, of this measure. This section states that the act applies to "any dispute" that "might interrupt work that contributes to the effective prosecution of the war."

If there is no basis for the Government's position that the big mail-order house contributes to the "effective prosecution of the war," then the Government has clearly exceeded the powers granted it by Congress and has entered dangerous ground. Here the evidence is by no means one-sided. Fundamentally Montgomery Ward is a retailer of peacetime commodity goods. But apparently Sewell L. Avery, militant, intransigent executive for the company, solicited priorities on many occasions on the contention that its business contributed to the war.

Attorney General Biddle, in his ruling that the President possessed the power to make the seizure under the Smith-Connally Act, stated that priority rating had been granted Ward for materials used by them in the manufacture of farm pumps, separators, paint, wire, and chains. The W. P. B. held that these commodities were essential to the war effort.

Also bearing on this central issue is the fact that the War Labor Board was unanimous in accepting jurisdiction in the Ward dispute. It was apparently the conclusion of the industry and public members of the Board, as well as the union members, that Ward was a business connected with the war.

Biddle, some critics will say, will furnish the President with any interpretation he wants. Possibly there is some tendency on the part of Biddle to weight his interpretations on the side of New Deal ideology. But in this case we have, in addition to Biddle's ruling, the decision of the W. L. B. and the requests of Mr. Avery himself for priorities.

This newspaper opposed the Smith-Connally Act as unfair and dangerous, both to labor and to property. During the debate on this measure we predicted that property would find itself frequently being seized. A measure designed to invade some of labor's legitimate rights is now boomeranging against the rights of property. Representative SMITH is entirely right when he states today he never intended that the War Disputes Act would authorize such seizures as that in Chicago yesterday.

The very nub of the present dispute, of course, is the failure of labor and management to compose their differences. This failure was the basis of the Smith-Connally Act itself. It is the basis of the long dispute between Ward and the C. I. O., which finally resulted in Ward being trapped by a bill drafted by a Congressman who himself was uncompromising toward labor and thought he was forging a weapon to be used against unions.

A powerful case can be made out, both for and against the maintenance-of-union order, the occasion for most of Ward's resistance to the W. L. B. That was not, however, the immediate issue that brought about the seizure of Ward. The final straw was the company's refusal to continue in force a C. I. O. contract at least until a new one could be negotiated. Here was a point where Ward might have compromised, and, in the interest of industrial peace, conformed to the decrees of our wartime agencies, seeking redress in the courts. Even the conservative New York Herald Tribune denounced the company's position on this score. In explanation of its refusal to compromise this point Montgomery Ward claims that the union has refused to show that it is the majority choice of the employees by either a card check or an election. The company offers to continue the wages, hours, and others terms of the expired contract.

Also, one can hardly overlook, without seeking full information, the charge that the administration used the Post Office Department to help win the strike for the union. It is alleged that the Post Office removed its 70 employees to cripple its service, and even refused to deliver incoming mail. These charges, if true, should become the subject of a congressional investigation and the full findings made public. If agencies of the Federal Government are being used to help either side in a strike, the public should be in full possession of the facts prior to the next time the voters express themselves at the polls.

It is plain that the right and wrong of this situation is not all on either side, and it is strongly indicated that neither Government nor Ward comes into court with lily-white hands. Meanwhile the war must get on. After all, there is an invasion in the offing.

Fair Employment Practices Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS G. ABERNETHY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I was surprised to read last night an Associated Press report that the Committee on Labor would be called into session next week to consider hearings on bills to create a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission. That my stand may be made very clear, I want to announce my opposition to the creation of any such commission, either permanent or temporary. I believe it to be a waste of the committee's valuable time to even consider hearings on such a ridiculous subject.

Today I have directed a letter to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Labor which expresses my views. Under unanimous consent, I include the contents of this letter at this point as a part of my remarks:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1944.

Mrs. MARY T. NORTON,
Chairman, Committee on Labor,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MRS. NORTON: Through the Associated Press I learned last night that you plan to call the Committee on Labor in closed session to determine whether to hold hearings on bills introduced by Representative DAWSON et al., that would create a permanent Fair Employment Practices Committee.

As a member of your committee, this is to here and now place myself on record as being opposed to hearings on any such asinine measure.

The F. E. P. C. was conceived in sin and born in inequity. It is the rottenest, vilest, most communistic infested agency of this regulated Government. It is doing nothing but fanning the flame of race hatred and dividing our people when the very soul of our Government is at stake in a colossal war. It has for its purpose the further regulation of a free people. I don't know about yours but I do know that my constituents are tired of being regulated. It has about reached the revolting point. Every mail brings to them further Government regulations. The old mantel clock no longer beats a quiet "tick tock, tick tock," but a rapid "regulate, regulate, regulate, regulate," until the nerves and stamina of the Nation are at the breaking point. The Government now regulates labor, agriculture, commerce, business, mail-order houses, prices, food, clothing, hours, wages, exempting only bridge prizes and ping pong. It even forcibly acts as a stake holder for a large portion of the salaried incomes. We are regulated to death.

Now these so-called uplifters seek, through a permanent F. E. P. C., to regulate the personnel of business by forcing the hire of so many Negroes, Chinamen, gentiles, Jews, etc. When and if this regulation goes into permanent effect, we will thereafter be confronted with further break-downs of so many blacks, so many chocolates, so many tans, so many yellows, or so many full-bloods or half-blooded Chinamen, or, even quarter-bloods. And then why not so many Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Catholics, etc.?

I repeat, my people are tired of being regulated. For the sake of our Nation, its fighting forces, let's not use your committee to further regulate our people or be a party to further fanning the flame of race hatred.

Incidentally, we have some war industry antistrike bills pending before your committee. It might not be a bad idea, while we are regulating, to have some hearings on these. I think the soldier boys would appreciate it and so invite your attention.

Respectfully yours,

THOMAS G. ABERNETHY,
Member of Congress.

Montgomery Ward Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote today for the resolution directing a congressional investigation of the seizure of the Montgomery Ward plant in Chicago. In my judgment this seizure was illegal and unjustified.

Congress did not intend, when it passed the Smith-Connally Act, to confer upon the President power to seize other than war industries to prevent strikes and mercantile establishments such as Montgomery Ward were not included or intended to be included in the powers conferred upon the President.

A discussion of the issues and incidents involved in this seizure are contained in an editorial appearing in the Dallas News of May 2, 1944, which, under leave granted, is herewith submitted:

MONTGOMERY WARD CASE

It is easy to go off half-cocked on an issue so involved as that in the Montgomery Ward case. Biased statements obscure facts even for those who want to look from the objective viewpoint. Yet some of the facts and conclusions are obvious.

Chairman Sewell L. Avery contends that not more than one-fifth of the workers involved would vote for the union. Labor officials contend that they have practically 100 percent support. If the latter are right, why did they not consent to the election which should have been held under War Labor Board regulations? The corporation has offered to abide by an election and its opposition to the Government is based upon failure of the Government to see that the election is held.

Two issues have been raised which transcend the present local controversy. One is brought about by the Attorney General's specious argument that Montgomery Ward is a war industry because "the maintenance of a healthy, orderly, and stable civilian economy is essential to military effort." Under this theory, the whole Nation's economy is swept under presidential dictatorship over war industry. The Supreme Court has said in substance that the meaning of an act is what Congress had in mind in writing and passing it. In conferring the wartime powers, Congress did not mean what Attorney General Biddle now reads into the act. To put this interpretation upon the act makes the President virtual dictator of the Nation's economy. And this he actually is if he has the authority to direct the military forces to throw the head of a civilian corporation bodily out of his office on no other authority than Executive ukase.

The second general issue raised by the incident is the increasing obviousness of the President's lopsided policy as between labor and management. The outstanding example of defiance of government order by as individual is by no means this of Sewell L. Avery who refused to leave his desk—who simply took the defensive position against what he considered unfair Government action—but John L. Lewis who aggressively defied the Government. Yet at no time during the controversy did a military force or any other agency of law enforcement go near Mr. Lewis.

It is argued on behalf of the President that, when the case was placed before him, he had no other alternative than to uphold the authority of the Government. There is a measure of truth in this; and there is also an answer to it. It was Attorney General Biddle who said some months ago that the Roosevelt administration is a "labor government." Remembering this, it is easy to see why the course of events has run to its present end. The Secretary of Labor in certifying the case to the W. L. B., the W. L. B. in placing it before the President and the President in resorting to forceful eviction of Mr. Avery have each seen the need of upholding not only the prestige of the United States Government but also the "labor government." They did not want to lose face, and therefore votes, with the bloc that we may assume to be the core of the administration's support. The present general reaction ought to be a warning to the administration even in the matter of maintaining its political prestige.

It is also argued that Mr. Avery, even granting that he was right, should have bent to the need of harmony in the hour of national crisis and complied under protest as he did before. There is more substance in this contention. To have done so, of course, Mr. Avery would have necessarily overlooked the instance of Mr. Lewis' very aggressive noncompliance by which he won his point.

It seems that the issue might still be solved by simple compliance with the regulations of the W. L. B. that the company insists upon. If not, the case should be tried in the courts and if the courts find, on the basis of law, that the President has unwarrantedly wide power over civilian economy, then Congress should give the law its attention.

Address of Gov. Edward Martin, of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEON H. GAVIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Maj. Gen. Edward Martin, Governor of Pennsylvania, to the Independent Petroleum Association of America, Bradford, Pa., April 27, 1944:

Mr. President and fellow Americans, it is a pleasure and an honor to welcome to Pennsylvania the representatives of one of America's greatest industries. The oil business is not only vital in war and peace, but it is typically American.

Its development represents all the greatness of the pioneer spirit in this Nation.

You men represent what we call the American way. It is the way of initiative, hard work, and willingness to make sacrifices. In that way business has been built up by men willing to risk and work. They went out into the rough, hard places and lived the hard way to find new fields. They developed the oil industry under the American doctrine of the incentive plan.

Our forefathers knew they were taking the hard way when they came to America. Rich or poor, artisan or gentleman, they knew it was a hard way.

William Penn, founder of Pennsylvania, born 300 years ago, knew the way would be hard. He belonged to the ruling class of his time, but in his heart he wanted to set up a government of justice, good will, nonviolence, and recognition of the rights of the individual. He knew the wilderness must be conquered to make a home for that government. Had his ideas been universally accepted we would not now be defending our way of life on the sea and land and in the air, in every part of the world.

Penn came to Pennsylvania. Other men had come to Virginia and New England. They were God-fearing people. They all wanted to escape from fear and want through their own efforts. They wanted the opportunity to live their own lives and make their own way.

They were self-reliant. They found their own food, built their own homes, their own schools, their own churches, and their own welfare institutions. They worked out the first form of government, wherein certain great freedoms—particularly freedom to pursue happiness—were safeguarded.

In shaping this great country that is our birthright, they conquered a savage race, a wide wilderness, great rivers, mountains, and endless prairies. They had courage, patience, and a willingness to work and sacrifice.

The oil industry pioneers and develops rugged individualists. It conquers new frontiers just as our fathers conquered a continental wilderness. America made strong men then, and it can make strong men now.

You know the magnificent story of the development of the oil business. It is an American epic.

Drake's discovery well near Titusville in 1859 did more to revolutionize the world than any other single discovery. Nowhere was the impact so great as on the strategy and tactics of war. Not since the discovery of gunpowder had anything so greatly changed the very face of warfare.

Speed revolutionizes the strategy of war. Getting men and materials to a strategic position ahead of the enemy wins battles and decides campaigns. It does so with less loss in blood and material.

Swift transportation of units is the key to winning this war. Planes, tanks, trucks, and guns depend upon oil and the highest quality of oil.

It is history that the winner of a war is usually the nation that controls its own sources of supply.

The most critical items in modern war are food, oil, and ships. We have the greatest Navy in the world. We have the greatest production of food. We have the world's greatest oil fields; the best refineries; the most skilled workers, and best transportation for both raw and finished products.

In 1938 the United States produced 61 percent of the world's oil. Of the oil produced outside the United States, one-fourth was produced by American capital.

We dream that this may be the last war in human history, but it will not be. As long as we have aggressor nations we will have war.

We can, however, make war less likely by certain common-sense precautions, by training men and by planning for supply. We have the food, the transportation, and the greatest output of oil. We should develop these advantages not for making war but for preserving peace.

War demands are terrific now and will be in the future. It takes 80 times as much gasoline in this war as it did in World War No. 1. Including gasoline, 50,000,000 gallons of oil products go to the fighting forces every day.

We have so far produced 28,000,000,000 rounds of ammunition, planes at the rate of 100,000 a year, and 30,000 boats of various sizes since the war started. Included are more than 600 combat ships for the Navy; 1,250,000 trucks, more than 50,000 tanks, and high-octane gas at a rate never dreamed of by our enemies.

Oil products are required to produce and to operate all this equipment. The oil industry will do this job if given the opportunity.

What are some of the things that will give us an adequate supply of oil?

Incentive is one of them. Men take chances and work harder to secure a profit. This may be in the form of better wages or a return on invested capital.

The profit is an incentive for men to develop new fields of production and to increase the output of old fields.

Since Americans work by the incentive plan, there is only one way by which oil production can be stimulated. That is by an increase in price.

Just what would this mean? The cost of this war is running into tens of billions. Production for war, regardless of patriotism, has depended upon wages and prices. An increase of 50 cents per barrel would add no more than $700,000,000 yearly to American production costs, and it would speed up production, keep the industry healthy, and insure the necessary profits and good wages to employees.

New fields must be found year after year. Old ones must be continuously developed. In the Pennsylvania fields, for example, methods must be found to recover a greater percentage of oil from the sands.

The record of wholesale prices in this country indicates what an advance in the price of oil would mean as a stimulant to production.

In November 1941, using 1926 prices as equaling a basis of 100, farm products sold a little above 90 and in November 1943 at a little above 110. Metal products on the same dates were about equal to 103. Food in November 1941 was a little above 89 and in November 1943 a little above 105.

Petroleum and its products in November 1941 were a little above 60 and remained at that price in November 1943.

Retail commodity prices for the same dates, using 1923 prices as 100, show about the same picture. Food in November 1941 was a little above 92 and in November 1943 a little higher than 106. Clothing in November 1941 was a little more than 79 and in November 1943 was 88½.

Gasoline in November 1941, was a little above 66 and in November 1943, a little above 68. In brief, the present price of petroleum is clearly out of line with other commodities used by Americans in the war effort.

An increase in price is necessary to keep up production.

The proposed Arabian pipe line may easily lead us into a third world war. It will cost American taxpayers not less than $160,000,000. Nobody knows what it will actually cost. This money for the prosecution of the war can be much better used in the development of our own home fields. Arabia is on the other side of the world. Always remember that armies and nations should retain control of their source of supplies.

We need improved techniques in the development of new oil reserves and in the production of fields now in operation. The methods that were in use during 1917 and 1918, in World War No. 1, recovered less than one-third of the oil we produce by present methods. There is no reason why future methods cannot considerably increase production.

This is true also in refining. The present 100 percent octane gasoline was so expensive 10 years ago that its use was impossible. Now private enterprise has developed the process so that it can be more economically produced than was the poorest quality of gasoline 10 years ago.

The oil potentialities of the United States are much greater than is generally understood. Defeatist Americans, who would destroy American initiative, insist that the supply is so limited that it will be gone in a few years. That is not true.

We must depend upon private enterprise for our production. Subsidies for oil or any other commodity is not sound governmental policy. It may be necessary in a grave emergency but only in such an emergency.

The oil game is pioneering. Our American pioneers in the industry have shown all over the world that our methods are the best. We know how to get results. We can take care of the situation if we are given the "go sign."

The New Deal and its economic Fascists want to control the oil business. That must be prevented.

When the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941, the United States occupied only 7.3 percent of the territory and had but 6.9 percent of the population of the world. It did have 30 percent of the railways, 54 percent of the power, 63 percent of the oil, 70 percent of the radios, 80 percent of the motorcars, and two-thirds of the wealth of the world

It had these things because of its able management and skilled workers, and these skilled workers and that able management had been developed by the free enterprise system of the United States.

And what was the result of that free enterprise plan in war production?

An aroused America has produced oil, tanks, ships, planes, guns, trucks, munitions, and food in 2 years' time equaling the best efforts of Germany in 9 years, Russia in 20 years, and Japan in 25 years. In addition we have lent and leased to our allies much of the equipment they have so gloriously used against our enemies.

This policy of free enterprise can still continue and it should continue to make this Nation secure.

We will win this war but there is something more that should command the attention of American businessmen.

Back in the twenties we all wanted to be on "easy street." In the thirties we were scared. Everybody, business groups, chambers of commerce, labor unions, States, and cities rushed headlong to Washington for Federal help.

Now we all go to Washington after a war plant. When the war ends we are likely to hurry to Washington, demanding that these plants shall remain open, and that, if necessary, Washington shall pour more money into them to keep them alive.

That is not the way we made America great. America became great because our people had the courage to seek liberty rather than security.

Individual initiative made this the finest and strongest country under the sun.

I sincerely believe the salvation of America depends upon maintaining free enterprise at home. This proven system stood up in the crisis. In cooperation with the Government acting as a great umpire and arbiter, it can shape the plans that will absorb all the labor in this country.

Free men and free women made us the most powerful people on this earth. We have done more for the people of the world than has any other nation in history. We have extended goodwill, progress, and religion to the remote ends of the earth.

Our purpose in this war should be to retain our greatness as a people so that we may further extend progress, religion, goodwill, and the blessings of peace when the war ends.

This should be our contribution in preserving the peace of the world.

Inflation and Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting herewith an address delivered by me at the annual meeting of Academy of World Economics, Washington, D. C., May 5, 1944, at Brookings Institution:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have here some facts and some figures about inflation. I think this is the time and the place to draw these figures to public attention. I think it must be done to prevent any premature relaxation of effort on our part.

I am afraid there is a feeling out through the country that the war is drawing to a close and that surely we can start now to relax our efforts. I am no authority on the war. I have no knowledge of when it may end. I can hope that it will end shortly, but I certainly have no reason to believe that it will. All I can find out from the War Department is that by far the worst of the war lies ahead and that in the invasion to come we will have all the experiences that we have had during our 2 years of war, but they will come condensed into days and weeks instead of months and years. If all goes well in this invasion, we will be a very fortunate nation. If the invasion does not go well—we must never forget that it may not go at all well, for our record of fighting back the Nazis is not such that the doubt is erased—if, as I say, the invasion does not go well, we may get our first real taste of war in the days to come, and such corollary projects as the control of inflation may become far more important, instead of far less important, in the last half of 1944.

Up to this time we have done an extraordinary job in controlling inflation. I think the job we have done is in itself inclined to make us overconfident. We think because we have whipped a substantial problem that perhaps a problem did not ever exist.

I can assure you, gentlemen, that the problem did exist and does exist. In every nation of the world where war exists, or which war has touched, there has been inflation.

The cost of living has risen since the outbreak of the war in Europe by 29 percent in England. It has risen from 130 to 600 percent in the Near East, and from about 50 to 100 percent in Latin-American countries. Our own record has been the best of the lot. As in the case of Great Britain, we have had effective controls, and our total rise in the cost of living has been 23 percent.

The nature of the fundamental pressures which make for inflation is common to all wars, but these pressures have been more intensified in the case of this war than in the case of any other of which we have record.

In the eighteenth century wars were playthings of monarchs, conducted on the boundaries and in the far reaches of their realms. They were scarcely felt in the metropolitan centers and were not felt at all in the countryside in the heart of their kingdoms. Even the Napoleonic wars did not fundamentally disrupt this pattern, although the French levy in mass marked the first step toward the modern concept of total war.

The nineteenth century was, for the most part, a century of peace. During the whole of it, however, there was growing up the highly developed technology and the intensified spirit of nationalism which, between them, were destined to make present-day war so deadly and so total.

This country entered the First World War late and never felt its full impact, yet the economic intensity of war had been so increased by the developments of the preceding century that during the First World War about 25 percent of this country's gross national product went into the war effort.

The present war has involved a far greater aggregate economic effort than the last war and the proportion of the total effort put forth by the United States has been much greater. The money expense of the United States thus far in the war has been about $185,000,000,000, or more than five times the total current money cost to this country of the last war.

Every dollar spent now means more, too, than it did in the last World War. It is, of course, impossible to compare the value of a dollar spent in fabricating a tank or a plane in this war with that spent in fabricating a tank or a plane in the last war. Any tank or plane made during the last war would be junk in this war. But compare the cost of one or two basic war materials: Copper which costs 12 cents a pound now sold as high as 26 cents a pound in 1918; steel billets which cost $34 a ton now sold as high as $47.50 a ton in 1918; and today's billets are better.

Our gross national product is about 3 times as great as it was at the time of the last war, but the war effort is absorbing twice as large a proportion of it. Today about 50 cents out of every dollar of our gross national product goes into the war effort.

Consider for a moment what this means. About half of the labor force of the country, measured by the value of its product, is engaged in producing goods and services for use in the war effort. The other half is engaged in producing goods and services for civilians. Both halves are paid. They receive money incomes and at the best rates of pay in the history of the country. All producers receive these money incomes, yet only half of them are producing goods and services on which the incomes can be spent. This is the problem of wartime inflation.

The certainty of the development of this problem of inflation could be foreseen, and was foreseen, by the President as soon as France fell and the war clouds commenced to gather around the United States.

To foresee it, required only common sense. To act upon it, required political courage. The President had both and did both.

At the very beginning of the defense program he took two steps: He appointed a member of the Advisory Committee of the Council for National Defense to watch the prices of the commodities likely to be affected by the defense program, and he asked Congress to enact an excess-profits tax. Both of these steps were generally applauded by the country. Congress gave the excess-profits tax expeditious consideration, and it was enacted and signed into law on October 8, 1940.

Many voices raised at that time urged that stronger measures should be taken to check the speculative boom. But the President had the wisdom to see that the problem of inflation could not become serious or general in its incidence until the unemployed labor and resources of the country were set fully to work. He, therefore, asked for no measures additional to those just mentioned, and concentrated on the goals of raising the national income and achieving full employment.

For a year after the inauguration of the defense program national income and employment rose rapidly. Production of both war goods and peace goods was increasing apace. The bottle neck to a more rapid increase in the production of war goods was not competition with the producers of peace goods for the general run of labor and materials, however, but was still mainly technological—principally the time required to produce machine tools and plant capacity for making new products. Consequently, no measures generally restrictive of peacetime production were necessary and none were applied.

During this period the country received a foretaste of the spirit which was to set the economic development of this war off from that of its predecessor. Mr. Leon Henderson, who had been appointed to the function of watching prices, was keeping up a continuous survey of developments in this field, but had no statutory or other authority to fix prices or control the production of commodities. He was nevertheless able, because of the fine cooperation which he received from the producers of basic materials, to keep the prices of these commodities down by voluntary agreements. The country was treated to the spectacle, never seen before, of the prices of those very commodities which formed the basis of the defense preparations and which, therefore, might have been expected to be the spearheads of inflation—commodities such as copper, steel, and aluminum—become instead the bastions of price stabilization.

The voluntary agreements which held down the prices of these basic commodities were made possible by a general conviction, shared by all segments of the public, that the national necessity should not be made the occasion for any avoidable increases in prices, or for any excessive profits. It is this conviction—so different from that which has prevailed in earlier wars—which has made the policy of price stabilization possible, and has given it such deep roots in the sentiments of the people.

By the middle of 1941, the defense program had progressed to a point where it appeared that competition between peace goods and war goods for the available supply of labor and materials would soon be holding back the rate of increase in the production of war goods. At the same time there commenced to become apparent a general upward pressure on prices, because of increased incomes, and because of the growing inroads of defense production on the supply of goods and services available for civilian consumption.

Several steps were taken by the administration to combat these tendencies. In May 1941 the Treasury commenced a popular sales campaign for Defense Savings bonds, in order to drain off some of the growing purchasing power of the economy into United States securities. In August, the Federal Reserve Board, pursuant to an Executive order of the President, promulgated regulation W to tighten the terms of installment selling of durable goods, and so bring demand and supply more into line.

Most important, the President, on July 30, asked Congress to enact a Price Control Act, to give statutory authority to the voluntary agreements by which prices had hitherto been kept down, and so make possible an extension of the scope of the controls to industries with large numbers of individual producers, in which voluntary agreements were not feasible.

During the 2 years from August 1939 until the President asked for the passage of the Price Control Act, the cost of living rose a total of 7 percent, or an average of about thirty-one one hundredths of 1 percent a month. This was the period during which our unemployed productive resources were being put back to work. It was a period of relatively light inflationary pressure and few controls, outside of voluntary price agreements in the basic industries.

About the middle of 1941, the growing inflationary pressures began to forge ahead of the forces making for stability, and prices rose one and five one-hundredths of 1 percent a month during the 6 months while the Price Control Act was under consideration by Congress.

Commencing with Pearl Harbor, the war expenditures of the United States shot sharply upward. Spendable incomes increased and the available supply of goods and services contracted. Based on past precedent, prices should have surged upward at a redoubled pace. What actually happened was quite different, however, and provides one explanation of the remarkable fact, which I mentioned earlier in this paper, that so far in this war the price increases in the principal belligerent nations have actually been lower than those in many nonbelligerent countries.

War tremendously increases inflationary pressures. But like Pandora's box—which, when opened, brought so many troubles into the world—it has also brought us the spirit necessary to hold these pressures under control. This spirit is apt to be insufficient or lacking in nonbelligerent countries, and this is one reason why these countries have often borne up less well under their usually lower pressures than the warring nations have under their heavier ones. From this fact, the warring countries themselves may well take warning when their spirit flags and threatens to wilt in the heat of internal partisan dissension.

Even before Congress passed the Price Control Act in January 1942, the cooperation of industry permitted setting up the machinery of price control, and this machinery became more effective following the final passage of the act. At the same time, the increased spirit of cooperation for the common good, brought about by actual participation in the war, permitted the Treasury to organize its pay-roll-savings plan for drawing off excess purchasing power for investment in United States securities, and has made possible an ever more successful series of war loan campaigns, whereby a larger and larger proportion of the purchasing power pressing on the available supplies of goods and services has been invested in United States Government securities.

You will note that so far I have said nothing about credit control. Credit control used to mean a general tightening of money-market conditions, thereby forcing up interest rates. This was supposed to discourage borrowers, and so check inflation. Great store was set on this method by the economists and statesmen of the last generation.

It ought to be clear, however, that this method of controlling credit expansion cannot be effective when the Government itself is the principal borrower and is borrowing for the purpose of financing a war. Such borrowing can be reduced only by increased taxation. It cannot be reduced by the process of the Government raising interest rates against itself, and it is hard to believe that as late as the last World War this was supposed to be good counsel. The finance ministers of every belligerent have now learned better and so have the great body of economists, although I regret to say that there are a few of the latter who have not learned their lesson and lag behind the body of their profession.

Our thinking has advanced further in this war. We have seen that credit control to be effective must be selective, and must operate only to discourage borrowing for purposes not connected with the war effort. Regulation W of the Federal Reserve Board, which I have already mentioned, is a regulation of this type. So also are Regulations T and U dealing with security loans. Each of these has been effective in its field. Although the experience of this war has shown that the most effective means of credit control is that operating through priorities and allocations applied at the physical level.

The relative effectiveness of today's selective method of credit control, as compared with the shotgun method of the last war, is shown by the fact that the total loans and discounts of all commercial banks which rose by over $4,000,000,000 between June 20, 1917, and June 30, 1919, have declined by over $2,000,000,000 so far during our participation in this war.

Nevertheless, considered in the broader prospective, credit control has been relatively unimportant so far during this war compared with direct price and rationing controls. It is possible that this situation may be reversed during the reconversion period after the war, however, and if this should prove to be the case, I hope that the selective-credit controls which may then be necessary will be administered and received by the people in as good a spirit as the direct price and rationing controls are today.

As a result of the various measures which have been taken, despite the vastly increased inflationary pressures, prices rose only 72/100 of 1 percent a month from the passage of the Price Control Act until the President's hold-the-line order of April 1943. Since then, they have not advanced at all.

This record has been made possible only by the wholehearted cooperation of the people in the objective of price stabilization. It is easy, in the petty annoyances of today, to forget what this spirit has meant, and still means, to the cost of the war and to the position of the people of the United States now and for generations to come.

According to the recent testimony of Mr. Chester Bowles before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, if prices of war materials had risen as far and as fast this time as they did in World War No. 1, this war would have cost $65,000,000,000 more than it had up to the end of 1943. The dislocations incident to this price rise would have caused endless bickering between labor and management, and among producers of different commodities. At the best, these bickerings would have slowed down production; at the worst, they would have produced labor disturbances throttling major industries. In return for these wartime troubles, our only reward would have been a devastating post-war deflation leaving unemployment and ruin in its wake.

But so far we have held the line, and are in a position to turn over to the post-war generation a debt many billion dollars smaller than it would have been without efficient controls, and a price and wage structure under which they can operate without ruinous deflation.

I hope that I do not speak too soon, however, for our price-control structure faces a great test during the next 6 months. Price control is unfortunately becoming a partisan issue. In district after district and in State after State, Republican candidates for office are running on platforms of more gas, more tires, more sugar, higher prices for their constituents' products, lower taxes, and down with all bureaucrats.

These platforms are not put together in a conscious effort to wreck the country's war effort, but they do add up to just that. They are not put together with any object at all, save to elect the candidates, and the easiest way to do this seems to be to tell the people that their sacrifices are needless and are imposed only for the pleasure of sadistic bureaucrats; to tell them that they can relax and still win. No, the platforms are not consciously designed to wreck the war effort; they are simply Irresponsibility, written with a capital "I."

The Democratic Party has no monopoly on patriotism, but it seems in danger of having such a monopoly forced upon it. We do not want it. If the price-control program is wrecked by the efforts of petty politicians—and I say this irrespective of the offices which they seek—to secure their own elections by persuading the people that the real sacrifices of war are undergone only to please the whimsies of bureaucrats, this country will pay the bill for decades to come.

Let me close with this thought: Wars have always brought in their train pestilence and inflation. More men have died of disease than from enemy action, and more economic havoc has been wrought by inflation than by the laying waste of cities.

The advance of medicine has now nearly wiped out the dread horseman of pestilence. This preventive medicine, however, has its inconveniences. Arms must be jabbed with hypodermic needles, and it hurts. Water must be boiled, and it is a nuisance. Attractive native fruits and vegetables must be avoided, and it is a sacrifice. Do the boys believe that the nurses prick them with needles for the pleasure of it? Do they call the medical officers "bureaucrats" and blame them because disease germs are virulent?

Modern techniques of price control have also made great strikes against the fifth horseman of inflation. Against greater pressures than ever before inflation here in the United States has been held to smaller proportions than in any other major war.

But price stabilization has its annoyances, too. Shoes and gasoline and sugar must be rationed. We must observe price ceilings. Our accounts are sometimes blocked at department stores. Taxes are higher, and we are asked to buy War bonds. These sacrifices are required for the war effort and the economic welfare of the country. They are no more for the personal gratification of Mr. Bowles, Mr. Vinson, and Mr. Morgenthau than the jabs in the arms of the boys are for the gratification of the Army Medical Corps. If they continue to be made partisan issues, God help the country.

Drifting Away From the Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Sun of April 15, 1944:

DRIFTING AWAY FROM THE CONSTITUTION?—SUPREME COURT'S DEPARTURES FROM PRECEDENT DECISIONS ATTRIBUTED TO DANGEROUS ZEAL FOR FLEXIBILITY

To the EDITOR OF THE SUN:

SIR: The decision handed down by the United States Supreme Court relative to the Texas primaries, like so many other of its recent opinions, shows an increasing restiveness under the restraints of written constitutions. I hold no brief for the Texas plan to bar Negroes from the Democratic primary, but I am very much disturbed by the method chosen to assure their civil rights.

During the past 10 years if an abuse existed, whether real or imaginary, the New Deal majority in the Congress felt impelled to apply its own particular remedy, without showing too much concern for the provisions of the Federal Constitution. When the "nine old men" of the Supreme Court intervened to preserve the integrity of that venerable document, the administration made a determined effort to drive them from office or to nullify their decisions by packing the court. Though this effort was frustrated, death and resignation have enabled Mr. Roosevelt to fill the bench with men after his own heart—men of aroused and eager minds, who apparently feel obligated to use their position to correct any and every abuse without regard to precedent.

If the letter, or even the spirit, of the Constitution seems to bar the way to the desired remedy, the ingenuity of the legal mind has come to the court's rescue. The provisions of the Constitution are given interpretations diametrically opposite to those which have governed the court for a century and a half.

"CASTS US ADRIFT"

Of course, this speeds up action. It produces results. It may even be popular for the moment. But it should give thoughtful citizens pause. I say this because to change the meaning of our constitutions by legislative or judicial action amounts to an abandonment of the principles on which the American system is based.

It casts us adrift to be tossed hither and yon by the caprice of legislative majorities, or by the fitful winds of judicial reasoning. If hereafter public affairs are to be administered in this fashion, we might just as well tear up our constitutions or put them under glass in the Smithsonian Institution at Washington, as interesting relics of the past.

Unfortunately, too many people are wholly uninterested in constitutional questions. Discussions of them seem dry, pedantic and unprofitable. They do not seem to realize how completely their liberty, their property, and their mode of life depend upon the meaning given to our State and Federal Constitutions.

Other citizens are enamored of the flexibility of the British system, and so welcome any step which seems to make ours more nearly like it. But England's government is founded on a philosophical concept wholly different from our own. In Great Britain the people are supposed to have parted with all of their sovereignty to the King and Parliament—reserving nothing to themselves. There is no written constitution. The will of a parliamentary majority, tempered by custom, habit, and precedent, is the supreme power in the nation. It controls in all respects the rights and conduct of the subject, as well as the executive and judicial functions of public officials.

This highly flexible system has worked extremely well in the tight little island of Great Britain. But it failed utterly when applied to larger areas where sectional interests were divergent. That is why Ireland could not be retained as an integral part of the Empire. And why it was found necessary to decentralize by creating self-governing dominions bound together, in the British Commonwealth of Nations, by nothing more substantial than allegiance to the king.

Our concept is entirely different. We have believed that the individual, as God's creature, has certain natural and inalienable rights, with which no public authority ought ever to interfere. We have believed that the right of local self-government ought to be safe-guarded in a Nation covering so great a territory as the United States. And we have believed that Government itself must have only limited powers if it is to remain the servant of the people.

Written constitutions were adopted to give effect to this unique concept. In them, the rights of individuals are defined and guaranteed by bills of rights. The duties and powers of local governments are prescribed in State constitutions. The scope of the National Government is set out in the Constitution of the United States. These organic laws represent the supreme legislative acts of the people.

RESERVED POWERS

They are not immutable like the laws of the Medes and Persians. Both State and National Constitutions have amending clauses by which the people may change them from time to time. But they are supposed to be binding upon the citizen and upon his public servants until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the people themselves.

If through ignorance or indifference we permit these constitutional rules to be changed by legislative enactment, or by judicial decision, we will have ceased to be our own masters and have delivered ourselves over to our public servants. This is the road which leads to despotism.

It leads to despotism because the sovereign people cannot remain sovereign if they abdicate their exclusive right to frame their constitutions. Yet this is precisely what they do, when they permit interpretations of their constitutions to veer from one point of the compass to another, like a weathercock, under the impact of partisan opinion. Nations which have lost their freedom have nearly always forged their own chains. Germany did it in 1933, when the Reichstag authorized Hitler to "deviate" from the Weimar Constitution.

I am afraid that during the past 10 years we, too, have been very busy at the anvil. There is but one remedy. That is, for the people to insist that the words of our written constitutions be interpreted in the sense intended by those who wrote them. If, as a consequence, injustice is permitted, let it be corrected by constitutional amendment. In this way alone can the people remain the sovereign makers of their own constitutions and preserve them as dikes against the rising tide of totalitarianism now sweeping the world.

ARCHIBALD E. STEVENSON.

The Stripper Operator and Secondary Recovery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEON H. GAVIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of J. D. Sandefer, Jr., of Breckenridge, Tex., president of the National Stripper Well Association, at the mid-year meeting of the board of directors of the Independent Petroleum Association at Bradford, Pa., April 27, 1944:

In my discussion of the subject assigned to me by Chairman Merle Becker and his program committee I shall steer away from the technical approach of the subject, because we are having this midyear meeting here in Bradford, where secondary recovery by water flooding has perhaps been advanced to a greater degree than in any other section of the country.

Bradford is in the center of approximately 140,000 stripper wells, about half of the stripper wells in the United States. At the end of 1943, there were 410,184 producing oil wells, and of this number some 296,450 wells, or 72 percent of the total number are in the stripper class at the present time, and the remaining balance will all become strippers at some future date.

The added drain of production occasioned by wartime needs will cause many fields to become stripper areas in advance of their normal expectancy. This acceleration toward stripperdom becomes more alarming when it is fully realized that in 1941 there were 20,067 oil wells completed, and in 1943 only 9,812 oil wells were completed.

Oil operators have been referred to as God's frozen people. Taking that reference as a fact, the stripper operator is in the position of being as cold as the proverbial Eskimo well digger in Alaska. He is the one who has really been handicapped for some time.

When I refer to the stripper operator in this discussion, I mean just what the name implies—the operator who owns only stripper wells, the one who is not blessed with large wells which furnish him an income that enables him to sit back and hold his stripper production for a later day, and a higher price. The statement has been made by executives of larger companies, by some of those in authority in Government, and even by larger independent operators, that "there is no place for the stripper operator in the present day." Again I heartily disagree with this statement. The stripper-well problem is not only a problem for today. It is a problem that will always be with us as long as the industry exists. I have said many times that we are sure of three things:

1. We all must die.
2. Taxes will always be with us.
3. Every gusher will some day be a stripper.

My files are full of letters from small operators from nearly all of the oil producing States stating "we must have relief. I have held on as long as I can." In my mind the small oil producer has just as much place in the picture as does the larger operator. In our American way of life the small businessman has always had his place in the picture. Today, in my opinion, the stripper operator has a more important place than ever before. Twenty billion barrels of reserves is the generally accepted estimate of leaders in the industry and of those charged with the responsibility of insuring this country with oil for the future. It is estimated that only 12,000,000,000 barrels can be produced at the present price. If 4,000,000,000 barrels of this estimate is under stripper wells, then is it not the duty of this country, as well as the duty of the owners of these reserves, to see that this oil be produced?

Oil is vital to the war. Oil is vital to the peace. No one has ever argued this fact. If the stripper operator produces and owns 15 percent of the present daily production of the United States, and 20 percent of the oil for the future, do you not agree with me that he definitely does have a place in the picture? He not only has the problem of producing this 15 percent of the total daily output, but he has the responsibility to his Government in time of war of doing his part toward the war effort. If he had an integrated company, with pipe lines, gasoline plants, synthetic rubber plants, refineries, 100-octane gasoline manufacturing facilities—or a large cash reserve—he could hold on until the "lights come on again" and contemplate producing his secondary reserves tomorrow. But, the stripper operator is not that fortunate. He has only what remains after his expenses of operating are deducted from his income from his strippers.

In the Southwest, where I am privileged to operate, the price of oil is $1.25 per barrel for 40 gravity, average $1.19. You operators of this district have been perhaps more active than any other district in the fight that we have waged for a higher price for crude oil. It has been a privilege to work side by side with you. Yet, you have been in a more fortunate position when it comes to the price of oil. In case you do not operate in the Southwest, or in other sections of the United States, turn over in your mind the situation you would be in if you had received only $1.19 for your crude. Also consider the 1943 average price for stripper production: In Wyoming, $1.10 per barrel; Louisiana, $1.06 per barrel; Colorado and Kansas, $1.05 per barrel; Arkansas, 91½ cents per barrel; and California, 83 cents per barrel. Your wells in the Pennsylvania region average approximately one-half barrel of oil each per day.

In north Texas, where I live, we have 20,000 wells averaging approximately 2 barrels each per day. We are forced to abandon our wells long before they reach the half-barrel stage. We producers from other sections are glad you receive your price. I am mentioning this fact in order that you may for a few minutes picture what the stripper operators from other sections have had, and are continuing to receive, for their crude. I feel sure that many of you who have been listening to me to this point are saying to yourselves, "Why does he attempt to sell us on the matter of price. We are already convinced that crude is too cheap." I am simply attempting to impress on your and the public's mind the fact that the stripper operator is up against a real problem in producing oil under present conditions—oil that is vital to victory.

May I give you this illustration? One firm in northeastern Oklahoma recently called my attention to the fact that they had produced in excess of 905,000 barrels of gross oil from two different water-flood developments covering slightly over 400 acres of leases and that these two develoments were still $220,000 in the red. It is the opinion of those who have made a study of water flooding that the producers of this oil needed at least 30 cents more per barrel in order to break even on the development, to say nothing of what they are entitled to as a reasonable profit for their effort.

The smart boys who have fixed the present price for crude might say that this loss was due not so much to the price of crude as it might have been due to the fact that the territory under development did not justify the installation of the water-flooding method. However, I hasten to deny any such allegation because the results outlined above are typical of a great number of operations which have been undertaken in the midcontinent area within recent years. The best evidence of the fact that we are not getting a price that would justify the expansion of a water-flooding campaign in the midcontinent area is to be found in the following figures, which are taken from the records of one of the larger purchasers of water-flood oil in northeastern Oklahoma.

Since 1936, when water flooding was first brought into use in Nowata and Rogers Counties, this company has purchased a total of 27,105,000 barrels in that area. Of this amount, 17,000,000 represent water-flood production and 10,105,000 represent production from property not using the water-flooding method of production. At one time during this period this company was purchasing 12,716 barrels daily. The price of crude in this district was cut 20 cents per barrel which caused the producers to indefinitely delay additional water-flooding expenditures; and since that time the production in this area has dropped to 7,583 barrels per day, resulting in a net loss of 5,130 barrels per day of badly needed oil. I feel that this picture illustrates the direct relationship between an adequate price for crude oil and the amount of water-flood oil which can be made available for the market.

Many stripper operators are faced with the abandonment of their wells. We have made this statement many times before the authorities that have to do with price. Some have said to me that wells are not really abandoned. According to the incomplete figures covering the national stripper-well survey being prepared at this time by the Interstate Oil Compact and the National Stripper Well Association, more wells were abandoned in 1943 than ever before. Under these wells lie many barrels of oil that this country needs.

When these wells are abandoned, these reserves are lost forever, in most cases. Why? Because the price of crude oil will have to be, in most instances, three times what it is now if these reserves are to be redrilled. I have a list in my files of 3,000 wells in one State that have been shut down for more than a year. No; they are not completely exhausted. Many wells naturally reach the stage where they can no longer be produced without loss. All wells canont receive a price that will always keep them alive, but when wells are abandoned in the United States that could produce secondary recovery oil when we need it so badly, I feel that it compares with a war plant that is not allowed to produce its maximum of planes, shells, or ships.

The application of secondary recovery to stripper wells is largely an economic problem. I am of the opinion that we have advanced further in the technical side of this problem than we have in the economic side. The cost of secondary recovery oil is small compared to the intrinsic value of the extra oil produced, and it is a sad state of affairs that the price of crude oil is so low that it will not support the application of the best technology in the production of that oil. Under the present crude-oil prices, the use of secondary recovery is denied to most of us in the Southwest and in other sections of the United States.

Reliable engineers estimate that 1,400,000,000 barrels of oil can be produced from the small wells producing today under primary methods. Two billion six hundred million barrels can be produced by secondary recovery methods. Thus, when we talk about strippers and secondary recovery, we are shooting at nearly 3,000,000,000 barrels of oil, or reducing this figure to a simpler total, enough oil to run the war and our Nation for nearly 2 years.

If the extra oil will more than pay for the extra cost, then secondary recovery is feasible. If not, then all such primary wells will be abandoned long before the reservoirs are exhausted. If this abandonment of reserves were only a personal problem of the oil producer, then our Nation should probably not be interested.

However, when the Nation is running short of oil to power the war and its domestic machinery, then it should become of great concern to our people. In the survey now being made by the Interstate Compact Commission and the National Stripper Well Association, the questionnaires reveal no incentive exists to justify secondary recovery operations. We are met with this situation at every turn, and as a result valuable petroleum reserves are being lost. We find that stripper-well operators are flooding and repressuring their properties where the work was commenced prior to Pearl Harbor, but since then there has been a marked decline in the number of new installations.

On the other hand, there are instances where extensions have been made on projects previously in operation and represent only a small expenditure.

I am informed that as a general rule normal producing methods recover from 20 to 30 percent of oil in place, where repressuring is applied the total recovery with gas repressuring is 30 to 45 percent of oil in place, and the total production with normal and water flooding or normal repressuring and water flooding is 65 or 80 percent of oil in place.

We are shocked when a fire devastates one of our forests, but little concern is manifested by the loss through inefficiency of our petroleum reserves, a commodity that is irreplaceable and that during war and peace means so much to the life and welfare of our Nation. Does not the following describe our predicament:

"If you can pump your wells when all about you
Are plugging theirs and blaming O. P. A.
If you can keep your credit at supply stores,
And have your banker say you're still Okay.
If you can take the price the majors give you,
And meet the rent and pay your pumper, too,
And break yourself from jumping in a slutch pit
Each time a hunk of income tax comes due.
If you can take a worn-out Fort Worth spudder,
And drill a well to 15,000 feet,
And build a string of sucker rods from nothing,
And make one pump without a ball and seat.
If you know your Federal rules up to the minute,
And think that filling out these forms is fun,
Yours is the earth and everything that's in it;
And—what is more—you're an oil man, my son."

Secondary recovery becomes automatic when the price is sufficient. The stripper operator will continue to do his best. He is a rugged individualist or he would already have given up. He must not be overlooked by his fellow operator, by the major company, or by his Government.

Declaration of Chicago

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include the declaration of Chicago, unanimously adopted February 4, 1944, by the American Democratic National Committee. This declaration is particularly interesting at this time considering some of the statements that have been made in today's debate on the resolution to investigate the Government's seizure of Montgomery Ward. There are those who have said, "It can't happen here!" Well, it did at Montgomery Ward's.

Whereas our fathers established this Nation upon the principles of liberty set forth in the Declaration of Independence and guaranteed to posterity by the Constitution and the Bill of Rights; and

Whereas Thomas Jefferson later founded the Democratic Party, dedicated to certain fundamental tasks, among which were the following:

1. To maintain a wise and frugal Government.

2. To prevent concentration of the power of Government in Washington and the blight that flows from "the palsied hand of bureaucracy," thus to keep government close to and the responsible servant of the people.

3. To preserve the rights of minorities and to protect persons of all races and creeds against the tyranny of majorities.

4. To prevent any branch of Government from usurping the functions of any other branch.

5. To prevent regimentation of the people.

6. To maintain a government of laws and to prevent "a government of men."

7. To exalt individual initiative and incentive enterprise as the surest sources of personal happiness, national progress, and prosperity.

8. To preserve the American States "as the surest bulwarks against anti-Republican principles."

Whereas the present administration has persistently and flagrantly violated every such precept and has, moreover, surrounded itself with alien-minded advisers, who are destroying the American form of government, substituting a system of bureaucratic control over the lives and affairs of our citizens and injecting the doctrine of the "indispensable man"; and

Whereas millions of American youths are now risking their lives that human freedom may live: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we the followers of Thomas Jefferson will no longer stand idle while men, falsely calling themselves Democrats, destroy on the home front the very liberties for which our sons are fighting overseas; and be it further

Resolved, That we Jeffersonian Democrats, today gathered in the city of Chicago, invoke the ancient common law writ of right for the recovery of our inheritance. We hereby denounce the palace guard as trespassers, wrongfully in possession of the Democratic Party. We hereby summon the true followers of Thomas Jefferson to join in recapturing our birthright. To this end we issue the following plan of action:

1. We call upon the followers of Thomas Jefferson in every State of the Union, to select two members for each such State to serve on this temporary national committee. The committee is to meet, at time and place appointed by the chairman, to plan for a national convention for the purpose of adopting a Democratic platform and nominating Democratic candidates for President and Vice President of the United States.

2. In the said national convention each of the several States shall be entitled to the representation enjoyed prior to 1933 unless such has been altered by law. We recommend that the traditional "two-thirds rule" for the nomination of candidates be readopted as a safeguard against future attempts to subvert and destroy the Democratic Party.

3. In this great emergency we pledge ourselves by the grace of Almighty God to support the war effort to the utmost of national capacity until victory is achieved. We further pledge ouselves to reestablish in peace every liberty and privilege set forth in the Constitution of the United States.

Senator James J. Davis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARVE TIBBOTT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, in the district of Pennsylvania which I represent many thousands of citizens devote their skill and energy to the great steel industry. They are capable, patriotic, and sincere American citizens who, by their talents and by their labor, transform iron ore into the thousand-odd weapons of war which are so vitally needed by our Nation and our allies at this time.

One of Pennsylvania's outstanding citizens, who has himself mastered the difficult trade of the iron puddler, now represents the great State of Pennsylvania in the Senate of the United States.

JAMES J. DAVIS began working in the steel and iron mills at Sharon at a very early age. He became his father's first helper and under his tutelage learned the trade of the iron puddler. He was one of the early members of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers of America, in which organization he held a number of elective offices. And while his work in later years has carried him into other paths, he still remains a strong advocate of the fundamental trade-union principle.

Senator DAVIS' knowledge and insight into the problems of labor, employment, and related matters have long been recognized by outstanding authorities in the United States, and his years of service as Secretary of Labor and Senator from the State of Pennsylvania have shown him to be one of labor's outstanding champions—one who, indeed, has remained loyal to the men and workers with whom he toiled many years ago.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a most interesting article which appeared in the Philadelphia Dispatch under date of April 30, which gives an account of the skill which the senior Senator from Pennsylvania yet possesses in the time-honored field of iron puddling. I ask unanimous consent that this article be included in the Appendix of the RECORD, in order that the people and workers of Pennsylvania might be apprised that the senior Senator is still a master of his first trade, the present-day masters of which, together with the coal miners of the Nation, comprise the backbone of the great and powerful steel industry, which is now contributing so effectively to the war effort of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I might add that I am proud to be the representative of this group which has made possible the creation of the tremendous war machine which shall bring us and our people the inevitable victory in this struggle for the preservation of justice, right, and human decency.

SENATOR JIM DEMONSTRATES HIS PUDDLING TECHNIQUE

(By Ross Hill, Republican City Chairman, New Kensington, Westmoreland County)

When United States Senator JAMES J. DAVIS boasted before New Kensington Republicans recently that he could still do a good job of puddling molten steel, Dr. H. A. McMurray, county coroner, and I took him up on it. Well, I saw the sight of my life. We had been twitting the Senator as to whether he could still handle his old job. We challenged him to go down to the Penn Iron & Steel Co. and demonstrate. Dr. McMurray said, "Come and show us." A group of us, including some of the members of the New Kensington Council of Republican Women, Dr. McMurray, and myself and a group of newspaper reporters escorted the "Honorable JIM" to the mill.

The heat was on at what is termed a "high boil." A committee of oldtimers at the mill were selected to pass judgment on Senator JIM'S skill. When the Senator got to the furnace it was like an old fire horse smelling smoke—off went his coat, he slipped in the raising hook and began working.

The committee of workers were unanimous in saying that he handled the tools like a veteran. After bringing the heat to a high boil and running off the cinders and carrying the waste from the furnace, he moved on to another furnace close by which was drawing a full heat.

Three big round balls of steel, weighing about 200 pounds each, were being prepared for the roller. The Senator was challenged again as to whether he could handle the iron and prepare it for the roller.

Senator JIM reached for the tongs which were fastened to the roller on an overhead trolley. He reached into the furnace, tested the iron, brought it up to the fore plate on the furnace, got a better hold on it and off he flung that ball of 200 pounds of solid iron down to the squeezer. As the impurities were sloughed off it sounded like a cannon going off.

Sparks were flying and red-hot cinders scattered. You would have thought you were on the battle front. The rest of us standing around the furnace jumped back in alarm, but the old Senator went on down to the squeezer taking the ball of iron to be crushed into form for rolling.

An old-timer standing by grinned and rubbed the sweat from his head, saying, "You can tell a man who was brought up in the trade in his early days. He handles the tongs different from a man who has learned the trade after he was out of his twenties. Senator JIM can certainly do the job like an old-timer."

By that time we were all convinced that the Senator could still handle the tools with the skill of a veteran puddler. "How can you do it after all these years?" we asked him. The Senator grinned and replied, "It's just like learning to play baseball when you are a boy. After you grow older you may not be able to play as well, but you still have the knack and the spirit for the things you learned in your youth."

The meeting of the new Kensington Council of Republican Women was a great success. Senator DAVIS spoke for 40 minutes on "Free Enterprise in America." He used the town New Kensington as an example of how a great industry can change a little place along the river bank into a thriving city housing industries that employ hundreds of thousands of people. It was a great day for the Republicans in this district. As Mrs. Grayce Evans Daugherty said, "Our meeting was a big success; our Senator made an excellent speech, and it was the most enthusiastic crowd we have had for 12 years."

Financial Aid for Paving of City Streets Under Federal-Aid Highway System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, smaller cities and towns through which Federal and State highways pass are under constant expense, building and keeping up paved roads that are used more by the general traveling public than by the citizens whose property is adjacent to the highway, and who are assessed for the construction of the pavement.

The Grinnell (Iowa) City Council has recently adopted resolutions on this subject which I desire to call to the attention of the House, and I ask permission to extend my remarks in the REC-

ORD and include therein this set of resolutions asking for financial aid for construction of paving on city streets under the proposed legislation for a Federal-aid highway system:

Whereas as it has come to the attention of the city of Grinnell that the proposed highway bill S. 971 and H. R. 2426 now before Congress makes no provision for assistance of cities and towns under 10,000 for the construction of paving on city streets; and

Whereas the cities under 10,000 contribute considerable to the gas tax paid by car owners who use city streets the greater percentage of their travel; and

Whereas the cities and towns of this class can finance the construction of new paving only by assessing it against the adjacent property owners; and

Whereas this method of financing is not only unfair but is vigorously resisted by the property owners: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the city of Grinnell respectfully petition their Representatives in Congress to make every effort to amend this bill so that cities and towns under 10,000 will receive their fair share of financial aid from any highway bill passed by Congress.

Abuses of Executive Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

WASHINGTON, IOWA, April 28, 1944.

DEAR MEMBER OF CONGRESS: Just as a private American citizen, interested only in preserving personal liberty and independence for myself and other individual Americans in our private, business, and social lives as guaranteed by our Constitution, I write you this letter as one of our responsible representatives in this crisis when our constitutional rights are jeopardized as never before in our history. Save only for such action as Congress may take, the American people must remain silent and incapable of making an orderly protest until election time. Much harm can be done before that time by an executive who seems to have given himself over entirely to a program of bringing all of our activities, business and otherwise, under detailed Government control through agencies dominated entirely by himself and committed to the complete destruction of private industry and competitive enterprise.

Recent happenings have demonstrated beyond further serious question that Congress in the past has given our President grants of power never previously enjoyed by any one person in our history. This was done for an extended period before the war started to meet certain crises, both real and imaginary. It is also true that Congress has enlarged this grant of power to vast proportions during the past 3 years with a view of helping the war effort by so doing.

It appears now that the confidence of Congress has been misplaced, and that our President, influenced by persons and forces unfriendly to our American way of life, has not scrupled to abuse the power given him or to evade the limitations on these powers contained in that grant from Congress or as set forth in our Constitution.

A specific incident of this official misconduct is the taking over of a privately owned commercial establishment, not related to the war effort to further the interests of certain elements of organized labor engaged in a controversy with the management of that concern.

The arbitrary and autocratic action of the President in so enlarging and prostituting his war powers, must serve to unmask the executive department of this administration and reveal in its true light for the first time the vicious, and heretofore cunning, activities of this department of government designed to accomplish the transition of our democratic constitutional form of government to some type of totalitarian government conceived by the President and his advisory cliques.

In view of the fact that our Supreme Court has ceased to be the safeguard it formerly has been to protect the American people from impositions by ambitious and misguided executives, the public can expect little protection from that quarter to curb the present autocratic and unconstitutional activities of the President and his horde of bureau puppets, in their present activities of destroying private enterprise.

Now having had a taste of autocratic authority, we can expect to see the President and his cohorts repeat the performance with ever growing vigor, unless Congress takes forthright measures to curb the future actions of the President and his department for the remainder of his term of office.

The writer, because of our present concern with winning the war, hesitates to suggest impeachment as the proper remedy, although the power-mad excesses of the President are ample to subject him to that penalty. However, this inclination to spare the President this humiliating ordeal because of the immense load of responsibility he has chosen to carry alone, which may have turned his head but not his heart, in no manner should deter Congress, and you, Mr. Congressman, individually, from initiating action to recall these powers that are being abused by the President.

The writer suggests charitable consideration of the President because of his infirmities and his burdens, but this charity will cease to be a virtue when exercised by you if you fail to safeguard the private, personal, business, and social life of individual Americans from the mischievous conduct of the President and his underlings in destroying our American way of life.

You owe every man and woman in America, and particularly those who are fighting our battles on foreign fields, the duty of giving careful consideration to the matter herein suggested in this letter, and taking the course that is justified by the present circumstances.

Respectfully,

LOUIS J. KEHOE.

One Hundred and Fifty-third Anniversary of the Polish Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER G. ANDREWS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions adopted by an assembly of over 2,000 Americans of Polish extraction gathered at Dom Polski in Buffalo, N. Y., on April 30, 1944, in celebration of the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the Polish Constitution of May 3, 1791:

Whereas each May celebration brings to us a rebirth of courage and a renewal of our pledge to the ideals of freedom, we solemnly observe today, through the gloom of the moment, the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the adoption by the Polish Diet in 1791 of the world-famous Constitution of May Third, so justly appraised by the English statesman, Edmund Burke, as "the noblest benefit received by any nation at any time"; and

Whereas we draw our moral strength from that historic document which inspired our ancestors imbued with a feeling of intense national unity in the face of impending danger, to proclaim courageously to the world that "more than life and personal happiness, we value external independence and internal freedom"; and

Whereas we are approaching the decisive moment when the Allied operations will bring the liberation of Poland, the first member of the Allied Powers to resist brutal aggression over four and a half years ago, in result of which every tenth Pole has died for the cause of freedom, a record which no other nation has equaled in this cataclysm called World War No. 2; and

Whereas we are fully cognizant of the historic fact that the geographic location of Poland in the vast plain of central Europe between two powerful neighbors, opposite in their culture, both ambitious for territorial expansion, makes the need of a strong and an independent Poland an essential requisite for enduring peace not only in Europe but in the entire world of today; and

Whereas the Soviet Government has declared repeatedly that it stands for the establishment of a strong, independent, and a friendly Poland, and since it is easy to understand that the loss of 51 percent of Polish territory and 37 percent of her people, 85 percent of her oil and natural gas, more than half of her lumber, about half of her chemical industry, her potassium mines, phosphates, and most of her grain cannot possibly lead to a strong, independent, and a friendly Poland; and

Whereas it is a matter of historic record that Poland in the period of her greatest expansion, when her territory comprised more than double the 150,000 square miles restored to her after the First World War, Poland before the first partition stood out prominently in Europe as an illustrious commonwealth of federated republics enjoying unprecedented religious tolerance, liberty, and freedom based on Christian principles of social justice; and

Whereas sincere cooperation and mutual trust among the Allied Nations are indispensable for bringing on a final victory, we strenuously condemn all agitation and every suggestion of acts tending to divide and weaken the common front of the United Nations, especially at this critical hour in the prosecution of this war for freedom: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That as loyal citizens of the United States we solemnly pledge our unstinted support to the great President Franklin Delano Roosevelt and to our Government in their untiring effort to bring this war to a complete and an early victory conforming to the terms of the various declarations made by the United Nations for a just and enduring peace for all nations, large and small; to this end, we promise first, to increase our purchases of Government bonds, especially at this time of the coming Fifth Loan campaign; secondly, we pledge our increased contributions in money and work for the American Red Cross and other recognized war relief agencies performing missions of mercy to our men and women in the various services, as the zero hour of the Allied invasion approaches; thirdly, we further promise conscientious performance of all our duties at home, in war plants, or in other positions working for increased production of supplies, equipment and weapons with which to arm our sons and daughters in the fight for freedom and justice for all nations; and be it further

Resolved, That after the war is won and the proper moment shall arrive, we shall stand united in our most earnest appeal to the leaders of our Government in Washington and particularly to the President, and to the Secretary of State, to use their good offices as mediators on behalf of the righteous cause of Poland by supporting her determination to maintain the integrity of her territory so that the world may be assured of a lasting peace; and finally, be it

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of State, to the Ambassador of Poland in exile to the United States, and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Who Said Freedom of Speech?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 3, 1944

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Eugene L. Garey before the Economic Council in New York, April 18, 1944:

These are grave days and many vital problems confront us. What I am about to say should not be construed as reflecting partisan views, as it is not offered for that purpose. I want to talk with you about matters concerning which I have abiding convictions and which, I am sure, affect us all irrespective of party. I want to discuss with you dangerous changes which are taking place in our form of government—changes which have not been honestly or frankly advocated as desirable changes to which we should assent, but revolutionary changes which are being made without the knowledge or consent of our people.

And today seems to be particularly appropriate for such a discussion, because the 18th of April is a significant date in American history. That date, as you will recall, is the anniversary of Paul Revere's immortal ride on the eve of the Battle of Lexington and Concord—that historic ride which Longfellow described so beautifully in his poem recording that event.

It was at Lexington and Concord that the long struggle for American liberty began, and where, Emerson tells us, "the embattled farmers stood, and fired the shot heard 'round the world."

The time has come for us once more to figuratively fire a shot for liberty that will be heard around the world, because the struggle which began at Lexington and Concord is not ended. It will never be ended because there will always be some among us who, in the lust for power, will ever seek to destroy our liberties. Each generation must struggle to acquire liberty or fight to retain it.

We of this generation are now at our rendezvous with destiny. We are face to face with making a determination of whether this Nation shall be brightly clothed in liberty or darkly shrouded in dictatorship. On April 18, 1775, the rights of men were denied by government, the dignity of freemen and their inalienable rights were being trampled under the heel of a despotic government and Americans were called to defend their liberties. The Americans of that day well knew that life is a dangerous game, and they also knew full well that life without liberty is like a rope of sand that crumbles in the twisting. And consequently from the courage and from the "blood" and from the "sweat" and from the "tears" of the men of Lexington and Concord finally emerged a free nation of freemen.

God intended man to be free. The dignity and nature of freemen were the underlying concepts of this new government. This political philosophy fulfilled the divine command to "Render therefore unto Caesar the things which be Caesar's, and unto God the things which be God's." Hence, the American concept of government is that man was made to serve God—that government was made to serve man and to enable him to fulfill his divine destiny—and that in attaining these ends man was not made for the state.

The counter, self-labeled "liberal," philosophy—that the state is supreme and man exists only to serve the state—is not the American creed. It is the liberty-destroying philosophy of the totalitarian. It is a philosophy completely alien to our American way of thinking. It is a philosophy that begets the dictator. It is a philosophy that denies the sovereign power of the people and the inalienability of their rights and asserts that all power resides in the superstate. It is an alien ideology and concept of government imported from foreign lands and imposed there in an embittered and frustrated people who have never known liberty and its blessings. It comes from foreign lands where freemen have never trod and where economic and political slavery still prevail.

Yet that very alien philosophy is now gradually but surely being imposed on the American people chiefly by the employment of the communistic technique known as cessation of gradualism. That technique, as I understand it, means the unlawful seizure of power by the Government to accomplish its so-called reforms by bloodless revolution without resorting to constitutional methods because of the fear that resort to constitutional procedures would result in a denial of the powers desired. Whatever the technique be called, that method of unwarranted assumption of power is the technique employed in Washington today. These enemies of America are so obsessed with the beneficence of their own alien ways that they willingly kick the Constitution around and nullify its provisions in order to indoctrinate America with their own alien ideologies. Today we have not a single right that any Washington bureaucrat will respect if he desires and wants to ignore it.

We have been unassailable as a nation so long as we have held steadfast to the great principles of our American creed. Free enterprise and individual initiative have made us a great and powerful nation—a nation which has brought more comfort, more happiness, and more freedom to more people than any other form of government conceived by the human mind in the history of the world.

We have recently come a long way from the principles laid down for our freedom. The power-grasping bureaucrats and world planners will, if they can, destroy our American institutions of government. They will, if they can (and they have already made unbelievably great strides), convert the American Government into a totalitarian government. They are continuing and will continue, unless they are stopped and stopped now, to destroy free enterprise and individual initiative in this country. They are hell-bent on destroying the very foundations of free enterprise upon which our American successes have rested and, ironically enough, to which they have been compelled to turn for protection against the chaos engulfing the world today.

It is a sad but nevertheless a patent fact that in the present day both judicial doctrines and executive attitudes are manifestly not in accord with our institutions. Whether they are evolutional, as some contend, or revolutional, as I contend, they portend evil days for our Nation. We can see on every hand in high places in our Government constitutional limitations transcended, baneful official breaches of trust, and unwarranted assumption of power.

We can see on every hand executive and judicial departures from established principles of statutory construction to so great an extent as to cause these departments of government to exceed their constitutional functions in administering or enforcing the law. We find the bureaucrats deliberately seeking means of thwarting and circumventing the congressional intent and purpose in order to accomplish their so-called reforms and bring about a complete collectivist statism here.

Instead of following the law and the policy of Congress in accordance with the plain intent, these bureaucrats by farfetched and unfounded interpretations and administrative applications substitute their own laws, their own policies, their own will, and their own concepts of public good. Mr. Justice Felix Frankfurter, who trained many if not most of those now holding key and important posts in our bureaucracy, used these words in a recent decision: "The notion that, because the words of a statute are plain, its meaning also is plain is merely pernicious oversimplification." And consider, if you will, what an opportunity this Frankfurter dictum accords these archdisciples of this alien philosophy when it is recalled that in our present governmental set-up there are some two hundred forty-odd special courts, bureaus, and commissions which promulgate, interpret, and administer their own rules and regulatons and the various Federal laws directly affecting the lives, liberty, and businesses of our people.

The bureaucrats call their technique "administrative interpretation." I call it usurpation of power. I assert that their philosophy has created here the totalitarian state. The American system of representative government has been destroyed. We have lost the liberties guaranteed by the Bill of Rights.

George Washington said that the concentration of political power in any one unit of government is tyranny. And bear in mind, if you will, that it is not in mere isolated instances that this concentration of power occurs—it is a part of the maliciously conceived plot subtly and secretly to change our form of government without the knowledge or consent of the American people. Any careful observer of Washington trends will agree that that statement is not merely a bit of campaign oratory.

The spirit of Paul Revere must ride again. America needs to be again awakened and warned of what men, who have solemnly sworn to defend and maintain the very institutions which they are now so insidiously and covertly destroying, are doing to our cherished institutions.

The Federal Communications Commission is one of the most powerful bureaucratic agencies of our Government. It exemplifies in the most dangerous aspects the indoctrination and activatfon of the revolutionary changes to which I have been referring. Probably few if any of you have ever had any contact or business with this agency, and yet it plays an important part and exercises great influence on our national life—in our personal lives and homes—and in our businesses. We all listen to the radio, use the telephone, or send a telegram. Are you aware that the operations of all these communications systems are regulated and controlled by this Commission?

Thus F. C. C. is a powerful agency which is capable of destroying our liberties because in a democracy such as ours, the keystone of fee institutions is the unrestricted right of every citizen to express and exchange his thoughts, beliefs, and opinions with his fellow citizens by the spoken or the written word, so that a common way of life—a uniformity or community of thinking may be thus evolved. Democracy is premised on a meeting of minds on a common ground, and on the acceptance of a common ideology or philosophy. Any curtailment of the free exchange of ideas renders democracy impossible of accomplishment.

In the control by F. C. C. of the media of this free exchange of thoughts is the seed of dictatorship and the historic warning of the approach of tyranny. It must not be forgotten that tyranny first appears in the guise of benevolence. Freedom of speech as guaranteed in our Bill of Rights embodies "freedom from fear of government reprisal for what is said and for what is not said." F. C. C., however, completely ignores these basic constitutional principles, and also the statutory provisions which deny to it any power of censorship.

It is primarily through abuse of its licensing power that F. C. C. accomplishes indirectly and unlawfully that which it desires but cannot do directly or lawfully. Through the sometimes direct and other times covert threat to revoke licenses, F. C. C. censors by denying to some persons and programs the right to use the air, and by requiring that others be permitted on the air.

Freedom of speech requires that radio should be as free from government licensing regulation and control as the press. But in the case of radio we are confronted with a practical physical fact—the presently known useful radio spectrum is inadequate to accommodate everybody because there is a fixed natural limitation upon the number of stations that can operate without interference by one with another. Two radio stations broadcasting simultaneously on the same frequency cannot be intelligibly heard over receiving sets within the range of both stations. The chaos thereby resulting in the ether is characterized in radio as interference. With the expansion of broadcasting, this problem of interference threatened ultimately to destroy the usefulness of radio.

The problem of interference, which rarely arose prior to the First World War as there were more than sufficient frequencies for all the stations then operating, however finally became so acute that it became apparent that if radio was to survive Congress alone could remedy the existing chaos in the radio field.

And so we have the Government entering upon the regulation of radio to meet the national need and to prevent the loss of the potentialities and usefulness of radio to the Nation. From the necessity which required the Government to license and regulate the physical aspects of radio we have come a long way. A new and unlimited occasion to control and regulate a new business, and thereby influence and control the thinking and lives of the American people, was presented to the bureaucratic enemies of America, and they have been quick to seize upon and take full advantage of the opportunity thereby offered to control and utilize mass communications to further their "bloodless revolution."

Much bitter controversy has raged—and still rages—over the extent and meaning of the statutory words "public interest, convenience, or necessity" employed in the legislation creating the Commission. Everyone is agreed that certain powers were unquestionably vested in the Commission by the act. However, the Commission contends, and the Supreme Court about a year ago concurred, that its authority under the act is much broader and more extensive than those unquestioned powers.

So that you may envisage how far we have gone from the original need of legislation to regulate the physical aspects of radio, let me sketch briefly some of F. C. C.'s present powers. You will thus be able to comprehend the broad field available to F. C. C. to usurp power and function beyond its legitimate scope.

The regulatory functions of the Commission break down into two fields, communications by wire and communications by radio. Wire communications comprise telephone, telegraph, and the cables. Companies engaged in these communications are subject to regulation by the Commission as common carriers, which includes regulation of rates.

The field of radio communications is divided into three distinct types of service:

1. Common carrier radio communications: This includes domestic radio telegraph service, domestic radio telephone service, international radio telegraph service, and international radio telephone service. These services are subject to F. C. C. licensing authority as well as regulation as common carriers similar to that applicable to the wire communication services with which they compete.

2. The radio broadcast services: In the radio broadcast field, F. C. C. has licensing authority over the 900 stations which furnish standard broadcast domestic service. In addition, the Commission licenses the international short-wave broadcast stations and the frequency modulation stations. Then there are the television stations, and finally, the facsimile broadcast service, by which a receiver in your own home may, perhaps in a few years, bring you your morning newspaper.

3. Safety and special radio service: The safety and special radio services include ship radio services, aviation radio services, police radio services, forest fire wardens, etc., amateur radio services, and other special services, including, for example, the geological services which are used in prospecting for oil and minerals.

The Commission not only licenses the stations in all of these services, but it also licenses the operators of these stations.

The administration of these functions by the Commission has been widely and bitterly criticized and condemned—to an extent perhaps to which no other Federal agency ever has been subjected. This began with the inception of the Commission, and has justifiably grown in bitterness under the chairmanship of Corcoran's protegé James Lawrence Fly.

A traffic policeman for the air lanes is a vital necessity but, as in the case of other police agencies, F. C. C.'s legal function is and should be to preserve peace among the stations, to protect property rights, and not to terrorize, dominate, and control the business of free speech it was designed to protect. From the seed of need, F. C. C. has grown into a strange and weird fungus on our body politic. From an agency of protection it has become a menace and a destroyer.

In my investigation of the Commission, I found that, under the domination of Fly, whom a Washington writer has termed "a dangerous guy":

1. From the legitimate allocation and policing of wave-lengths, F. C. C. has become the sponsor of novel and illegal theories of governmental control and regulation and has illegally assumed enforcement of the Sherman anti-trust law in respect of alleged monopolistic practices in the communications industry subject to its jurisdiction, as witness the Commission's chain broadcasting policies and its handling of R. C. A. and the Postal Telegraph matters.

These F. C. C. policies, and others of like nature relating to other criminal statutes with the enforcement of which Mr. Fly had nothing to do, were not lawfully enforced through the courts—no charges were formulated or tried, but they were enforced without hearing by devious illegal means such as unlawful threats of refusal to issue licenses, and by compelling station operators to submit their proposed contracts for broadcasts to the Commission for prior approval.

2. The Commission was arbitrary and dictatorial in the enforcement of its illegal policy of prohibiting newspaper ownership of radio stations, a policy which it has now, after 2 years of enforcement, apparently abandoned. This policy was pursued notwithstanding that the Supreme Court had held that "Congress did not authorize the Commission to choose among applicants upon the basis of their political, economic or social views, or upon any other capricious basis."

At first these newspaper applications were denied by the simple device of pigeon-holing them without acting on them. Let me cite an instance of just how far Fly went to deprive one newspaper applicant of his lawful right to appeal to the courts for redress against his illegal action. The application was that of the South Bend Tribune, and because this was an application by a newspaper, Fly wanted to deny it and at the same time prevent an appeal to the courts. This was the scheme he employed. I quote from the confidential minutes of the Commission, dated February 26, 1941:

"Chairman FLY. I do not like the word 'decision' and I do not like the word 'is' five lines from the end. It looks like an order and I don't think it should be signed by the Secretary. I don't want to give them something to appeal from. I would call this an opinion and say 'was on —— date granted.'"

Note, if you will, this from a Government official—"I don't want to give them something to appeal from." Fly wanted to deny that newspaper its lawful rights and see that it couldn't get into the courts for redress.

For the purpose of granting political favor to friends who believed in his political ideologies, Fly did make certain notorious exceptions to his general newspaper ownership policy. I have in mind now particularly the Gordon Gray station and the Marshall Field station at Hammond, Ind., which surrendered its license after I started investigating it.

As another instance of the manner by which the Commission punishes those whom it regards as political enemies and rewards the politically faithful, let me mention Station WNNY at Watertown, N. Y.

In 1936 two groups of local businessmen applied to F. C. C. for a license for a radio station at Watertown, N. Y. Hearings were held, and the decision of the Commission was that "public interest, convenience, and necessity will be served by granting the application for Black River Valley Broadcasts, Inc., and will not be served by granting the application of Watertown Broadcasting Corporation." As a result, the Black River Co. was granted a permit, and spent about $16,000 erecting a tower and preparing a building.

Some weeks after construction began, on December 2, the White House forwarded to F. C. C. a letter from a Watertown citizen addressed to the President. This letter pointed out that several of the Black River stockholders were Republicans, and asked:

"What will that mean to the future of the Democratic Party in northern New York? Your seaway and utility program has been fought from the very start by these same birds to whom you are now giving this radio station. It is inconceivable. I don't think you know these facts or you would not permit such a mistake to go through."

Another letter to the President, also forwarded to the F. C. C., urged that the WNNY license be revoked to "assist those who are working for the seaway and other parts of your program."

The day after these letters were received by the Commission, on December 3, F. C. C. sent a telegram to the Black River Valley Broadcasts saying that their permit had been revoked—and this without a hearing and without any reason being stated. No explanation for such action has ever been given. A license has since been granted to the rival applicant—Watertown Broadcasting Co.—of whom the F. C. C. examiners had first reported "the record does not justify a finding that the applicant is legally qualified." This company is operating in Watertown today.

3. Himmler could well envy the Gestapo which Fly created under the respectable name of the War Problems Division, which the House Appropriations Committee asked him to discontinue because it served no proper useful purpose. No lawful authority whatsoever existed for the creation or activities of this unit—not even that modern day misfit called the Presidential Directive. Fired by nothing but zeal, this outfit proceeded for over a year to make a shambles of constitutional rights and privileges, and without warrant in law and without a hearing, threw people off the air against whom not even the faintest justification for such action can even now be advanced.

Let me cite one or two such instances. Take the case of Stefano Luotto, who was put off the air in November 1942 by the unlawful and coercive action of the F. C. C. Gestapo. It was only after fencing for more than an hour and after threats of citation for contempt were made that the House Select Committee, on March 30, 1944, elicited from the F. C. C. general counsel this statement:

"From the Commission's standpoint there is no reason why he (meaning Luotto) should not be permitted to broadcast."

And yet, believe it or not, for no valid reason whatsoever Luotto has been deprived of the means of earning a livelihood and to this day is still off the air. And keep in mind, if you will, that this man never had any charges preferred against him, never received and could not get a hearing after repeated attempts to do so were made, that F. C. C. denied responsibility for what it had caused to happen, never made the slightest effort to rectify the injustice it had caused, continued to a late day to find some reason to support what it had done, and had no more lawful authority to cause this man to be put off the air than has anyone present at this meeting.

Again take the case of Lido Belli. He was put off the air through the illegal and secret activities of the F. C. C. Gestapo. I say to you such action was entirely without justification in fact or in law. No justification has ever been advanced to this day to support such unwarranted action. After losing some $90,000, he was permitted a limited resumption of his business activities until he finally agreed to appoint an alien to control his business and to discharge old employees who were American citizens and hire other aliens in their places. He then and not until then became a proper person to go back on the air.

Again, without warrant or authority in law, Fly and his Gestapo became much alarmed and sought to compel broadcasts with a Russian slant to American citizens of Polish descent; they pondered and were deeply concerned over the effect the broadcast of Italian music would have upon citizens of Italian descent because such music would create "nostalgia for Italia"—I take that phrase from their own report—and the effect the broadcasting of Kathleen Mavourneen or the Wearing of the Green would have upon the heart of an Irishman. All of which I say to you as a matter of law neither is nor should be any of the Commission's business. And yet thousands of dollars of your money have been literally squandered on such illegal nonsense.

Among the many other unlawful activities of the Commission I found:

(a) That, again without legal authority and against the express wishes of the Army and Navy, F. C. C. was operating monitoring stations manned by men sorely needed in the military services and using equipment vitally needed by the armed services. Its action was confusing and impeding the war effort.

In a joint letter to the President, dated February 8, 1943, Secretaries Stimson and Knox stated that 5 months earlier the Secretary of the Navy had requested the Joint Chiefs of Staff to study the radio intelligence situation. As the result of this "thorough and comprehensive study," the letter recommended that "participation by the Federal Communications Commission in radio intelligence should be discontinued."

The Joint Chiefs of Staff reported in writing:

"Radio intelligence activities of the Federal Communications Commission tend to be less and less useful as the art progresses. This is due to integration into proper radio-intelligence system of large quantities of secret military information * * * which for obvious reasons cannot be disseminated to an agency such as the Federal Communications Commission * * * the attempted duplication by the Federal Communications Commission of work that is being more effectively done by the military has in fact endangered the effectiveness and security of military radio intelligence. In view of the foregoing it is concluded that the better prosecution of the war will be served by terminating all military and quasi-military radio intelligence activities of the Federal Communications Commission and confining such activities to the Army and Navy. The foregoing conclusions are supoprted by the views of the Army and Navy commanders in the field who are charged with responsibility for military action based on radio intelligence."

The normal run of patriotic Americans might consider this sufficient reason to surrender their judgment to that of the Secretaries of War and Navy and the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Mr. Fly, however, launched a stubborn counter-attack during the next 7 months—and won. On September 7, 1943, the President wrote a letter permitting F. C. C. to retain its radio intelligence activities and suggested that disputes between the Army and Navy and F. C. C. in the future shall be submitted for adjustment to the Board of War Communications of which Mr. Fly is self-constituted chairman.

In other words, the President said: Whenever you can't get along with Fly as chairman of the F. C. C. talk to him as chairman of the Board of War Communications.

The Congress, however, decided otherwise, and, within the last month, on the record of the House select committee, cut approximately $2,200,000 out of the F. C. C. appropriation. The taxpayers and the war effort thus have both profited as a result.

(b) The F. C. C. had required all radio operators and communications company employees to file their fingerprints with the Commission. In September of 1941, J. Edgar Hoover, F. B. I. chief, requested that these prints be turned over to the custody of his Bureau for checking and processing, as this agency had been designated by the President, on September 6, 1939, as the clearing house for all "investigative information pertaining to the national defense." For months repeated requests from Mr. Hoover and Francis Biddle, Attorney General of the United States, failed to induce Mr. Fly to surrender the fingerprints. Parenthetically, I might add that every radio operator at sea is a licensed radio operator in a very important post where he can do great and irreparable damage to the interests of the United States by communicating to the enemy the location of convoys and ships. The Navy wanted to know who were on these merchant marine ships. They asked F. B. I. to find out and that is what brought this subject up.

On January 2, 1942, Mr. Biddle wrote to Mr. Fly: "You explained that you had obtained the prints under a promise they would be kept confidential" and that the labor leaders, to whom this promise was made, would be asked to "release you." "The evidence is strong," said Mr. Biddle, "that messages have been surreptitiously transferred to our enemies by radio and that military attacks upon the territory of this country may have been furthered thereby." Did Fly then turn over these prints? He did not.

On May 6—5 months after Pearl Harbor—Mr. Fly wrote to Mr. Biddle: "I am today drawing the matter again to the attention of the labor leaders." Some 7 months after Pearl Harbor during which period the Nation's very life was in danger, Fly, even then under protest, began to transfer these records to the F. B. I. and it took nearly a year thereafter before they were all finally delivered. Three or four thousand of the persons whose prints were delivered had criminal records. Some 50,000 of the 250,000 prints, incidentally, were returned to F. C. C. as having been taken so improperly that they were useless.

(c) That there was an unlawful conspiracy between F. C. C. and the Office of War Information, O. W. I., to compel radio stations to use O. W. I. canned material or else. * * * F. C. C. unlawfully placed stations questioning this policy on 30-day licenses until they "saw the light," although the Communications Act contains no provision whatsoever for such a period of license in such circumstances.

The result of this Commission's nefarious activities is that radio has a weak heart, for all its powerful voice in America. It has no independence, no freedom, and lives in constant fear for its life. It dies a thousand deaths every Presidential campaign in expectation of the revenge of some politician or some political group.

Because of radio's fear for its life, the politicians kick it around in a fashion beyond belief. F. C. C. not only keeps radio terrified but punishes it for not being sufficiently terrified of other bureaucrats.

Fly will tolerate no public investigation of his stewardship. He resents the very idea of any accountability to Congress, whose creature he is; he will permit no criticism of his conduct and administration; no inquiry to ascertain whether the law under which he is acting should be amended in the public interest. He asserts immunity from all the legitimate processes of Government.

The F. C. C. is, after all, nothing more than a creature of Congress. It can be unmade as quickly as it was made. F. C. C.'s performance sums up to harassing radio management, doing administrative hatchet work on the political front and now moving toward reduction of radio to the last stages of regulation before outright censorship and Government ownership.

Congress had better act now to reverse this trend or one day soon the Nation will wake up with a muzzle on. I found a muzzle on many an official of the Government whose testimony I sought in my investigation.

I could detail without end instances to support my statement of the unlawful activities and the grasping of power by this Commission. Time prohibits more. I have already spoken too long.

Shall we close our eyes to what is happening in our Government? Shall we stand mute as step by step the lifeblood of our liberties is sapped? Must we be confronted with the totalitarian state as a fait accompli when we are so weakened that we can then do nothing about it?

Rather let us look up at the flag and again pledge renewed devotion to it and to the institutions which it represents and at the same time recall an old astronomer's words to his pupil Galileo, "Why should we who have so loved the stars, be frightened of the dark?"

Let us live recklessly as if today were our last, and fight as if we expected to live forever and would live in liberty or not at all. Let us rededicate ourselves to the cause of America. In the words of John Adams: "Live or die, sink or swim, survive or perish, I give my heart and my hand to this cause."

Lurking Dangers Which Coolidge Foresaw

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Los Angeles (Calif.) Examiner, of April 28, 1944:

LURKING DANGERS WHICH COOLIDGE FORESAW

The political genius of the American people has been recorded in the wise observations of its statesmen.

While there is general recognition of the enormous contribution made to the American constitutional tradition by such Founding Fathers as Jefferson and Madison, it is not always appreciated that each new President has his opportunity to add to or detract from the heritage.

As the years roll by the extraordinary devotion of the late Calvin Coolidge to constitutional restraints take on new significance.

The late President showed great forebearance in avoiding any semblance of abuse of power.

After his retirement, in referring to his return to office in the 1924 campaign, Mr. Coolidge wrote in the Cosmopolitan Magazine:

"Many people at once began to speak about nominating me to lead my party in the next campaign. I did not take any position in relation to their efforts. Unless the nomination came to me in a natural way, rather than as the result of an artificial campaign, I did not feel it would be of any value.

"The people ought to make their choice on a great question of that kind without the influence that could be exerted by a President in office."

At the same time, with prophetic wisdom, Mr. Coolidge examined the "indispensable man" thesis.

"Had I been chosen," Mr. Coolidge wrote in the same article, "for the first place (the office of President in 1920) I could have accepted it only with a great deal of trepidation, but when the events of August 1923 bestowed upon me the Presidential office, I felt at once that power had been given to me to administer it.

"This was not any feeling of exclusiveness. While I felt qualified to serve, I was also well aware that there were many others who were better qualified. It would be my province to get the benefit of their opinions and advice.

"It is a great advantage to a President, and a major source of safety to the country, for him to know that he is not a great man. When a man begins to feel that he is the only one who can lead in this Republic, he is guilty of treason to the spirit of our institutions."

And since this is a presidential year, which may bring a new face to the White House, it seems timely further to explore Mr. Coolidge's simple guidebook.

Warning against exploiting evils and weaknesses as a means to achieve personal power, Mr. Coolidge concluded:

"Perhaps one of the reasons I have been a target for so little abuse is because I have tried to refrain from abusing other people.

"The words of the President have an enormous weight and ought not to be used indiscriminately.

"It would be exceedingly easy to set the country all by the ears and foment hatreds and jealousies, which, by destroying faith and confidence, would help nobody and harm everybody. The end would be the destruction of all progress.

"The only way I know to drive out evil from the country is by the constructive method of filling it with good."

Thus the years magnify our recognition of the profundity of Mr. Coolidge's quiet insight.

As time passes Coolidge's stature grows, and the people can benefit by rereading his admonitions as well as his infrequent exhortations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I came upon a clipping today which gives an Associated Press story from Ceylon in the Far East, which is of interest to me and will be of particular interest to the people of Vandalia, in Fayette County, Ill., which I am proud to say is a part of the district I represent here in this Congress.

I call attention to it because it shows what the American boy, whether he be located in the great cities or the villages of this Republic, has been called upon to do and is doing so well in this war.

In this peaceful democracy of ours, a few years ago, there was little thought when this boy was growing up, that he would be the subject of a news article from the Far East and there was little thought that a time would come when he would play such an important part in world military affairs.

This short dispatch goes on to say that Lt. Richard P. Doran of Vandalia, Ill., is commander of the first all-American tank unit to fight on the Asiatic continent, a unit that was sent into action in northern Burma under Lt. Gen. Joseph W. Stilwell, and may I say that this unit has defeated the Japs, driving them ahead until it has recaptured a great expanse of that territory.

I am glad in my humble way to attempt to honor him by placing his name and calling attention to his unique distinction in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the House of Representatives:

[From the Centralia (Ill.) Evening Sentinel of May 3, 1944]

FORMER CENTRALIAN LEADS TANK UNITS

Lt. Richard P. Doran, son of Paul Doran, of Vandalia, a former oil operator here, is commanding the first all-American tank unit to fight on the Asiatic continent, it was learned today.

Lieutenant Doran's name was erroneously listed as Bocan in several news releases, but relatives state that he has written them of his experiences and has sent home pictures taken with Lt. Gen. Joseph W. Stilwell. The group is in Burma and during its first action Saturday of last week more than 100 rounds of shells were used in an hour's fighting, destroying two Japanese antitank guns, exploding an ammunition dump, and killing 30 of the enemy. Some of Doran's tanks were hit many times, but there were no casualties reported.

Lieutenant Doran's brother, Tommy Doran, is the husband of the former Nina Louise Kaelin of this city.

They Are Not Fooled

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the so-called common people are seldom deceived for long by political maneuvers.

Columnists for the larger papers frequently but reflect the views of the average man in the so-called sticks. They just express, perhaps in more elegant language, what the folks back home talk among themselves.

As indicative of what the home folks are thinking, read the following editorial by David Lawrence:

MONTGOMERY WARD—SEIZURE OF PLANT DRAMATIZES ADMINISTRATION-LABOR TIE-UP

(By David Lawrence)

The seizure by the Government of Montgomery Ward & Co. on the ground that it distributes products essential indirectly to the war effort would prove to be more than a labor dispute. It could intensify the attitude of hostility toward the present administration in the farm States and dramatize, as no other single event could possibly do, the tie-up between the Roosevelt administration and the labor unions.

The issue in the Montgomery Ward case is whether the Roosevelt administration, acting through the War Labor Board, can force a maintenance-of-membership contract on an employer even though the latter has reason to believe that the union has lost the membership of a majority of its employees.

Congress has never authorized any governmental agency to compel the signing of contracts either with or without maintenance-of-membership clauses. Such a piece of legislation would be bitterly fought by the labor unions themselves, who do not want compulsory arbitration or coercion of any kind but desire it to be left entirely to collective bargaining with, of course, the right to strike.

"NO-STRIKE" PLEDGE REWARD

Because the labor unions have, through their national organizations, proclaimed that they would not strike, the administration has felt that as a reward for this the membership of the labor unions must be maintained with the aid of the Government. In previous instances, where employers have declined to sign contracts containing maintenance-of-membership clauses, the War Labor Board has insisted, and the President has ordered properties to be seized and operated by the Government. The threat of seizure has, in most instances, been enough to force the employers to sign the contracts.

But a change came over the situation when the Smith-Connally law was passed last year. It contained a provision that the orders of the War Labor Board must conform to the National Labor Relations Act. This is generally interpreted to mean that the collective-bargaining process shall be preserved and that the determination of whether an organization represents the majority of the employees is to be carried on by the National Labor Relations Board in wartime as it has been in peacetime.

There has been no way, however, heretofore, to enjoin in the courts the orders of the War Labor Board with their multifarious commands supposedly derived from Presidential war powers. As a matter of fact, the President had no war powers except those actually delegated to him by Congress, but many an Executive order has been written on the assumption that in wartime the President can be a dictator and that laws can often be brushed aside without authorization from Congress.

The pendulum is swinging now. There is a trend toward court review, and there is a definite feeling that test cases should be brought to check the unrestrained use of governmental power. The Montgomery Ward controversy may result in just such a test case. The principle which has been espoused by the Montgomery Ward management—namely, that the National Labor Relations Board should determine whether the union in question has a majority—is accepted by the War Labor Board, but it insists that pending the outcome of that election the Montgomery Ward management should sign a contract renewing its old relationship. This, of course, is tantamount to saying that even through the status quo may be wrong, it should be maintained.

Normally, there is a great deal to be said in favor of maintaining existing relations, but in the Montgomery Ward case the maintenance-of-membership issue is the vital thing that may determine the outcome of the National Labor Relations Board case itself. In other words, by ordering a temporary or intermediate contract the union is given an opportunity by the War Labor Board to build up its membership so that when the National Labor Relations Board holds an election the union will have had a full opportunity to recruit new members.

POSITION TAKEN BY COMPANY

The Montgomery Ward management takes the position that Congress has not delegated any power compelling a maintenance-of-membership clause in union contracts, and the big mail order house, along with other large employers of labor, consider the maintenance-of-membership merely a steppingstone to a closed shop. President Roosevelt has declared that he would never order, nor did he believe that Congress would ever legislate, compulsory closed shops in America. This, he has insisted, must be the result only of voluntary agreements between employers and unions.

But in the case of maintenance of membership, which is considered by many employers as a modified form of the closed shop, the Government has been willing to bring its full powers of coercion into play. Inasmuch as Congress has not legislated on this subject and the administration has never sought legislation empowering it to grant maintenance of membership clauses to the unions, the raising of the issue through the courts has become inevitable.

It is most unfortunate that the administration still flounders without a constructive labor relations policy, and that the administration, which is so anxious to have the unity of the country in future programs of foreign policy, should be assisting in the breeding of isolationist votes in the Middle West.

For unhappily, when grievances on domestic matters become acute, they dwarf in importance international questions, and many a voter thinks of his ballot as one that should register his protest against the granting of special privileges by the administration to the groups with which it is politically allied. Back in the old days of the Republicans, people generally resented the same thing when the big corporations got their high tariff favors from the administration as a consequence of substantial financial contributions to presidential campaign funds.

When the Government seriously considers seizing a mail-order house to enforce a labor union contract on the ground that it is indirectly related to the war the result is that the issue will be discussed everywhere more on its political potentialities than on its merits.

Who Makes Our Foreign Policy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM I. TROUTMAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. TROUTMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of my colleague from Pennsylvania Hon. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR., over radio station WHN, New York, May 1, 1944:

Ladies and gentlemen, I wish, at the very beginning, to draw a clear line right down the middle and to put military strategy on one side of it and foreign policy on the other. My talk to you tonight is concerned only with foreign policy.

I am going to say to you that our foreign policy should be specific. I do not mean that we can anticipate every detail or that we can expect all of our views to prevail around the conference table with our allies, but before we sit down at any such table we ought to know what the American people want. We won't know unless we have had public discussion of specific problems. Broad generalities are not enough on which to base a lasting peace. Let me illustrate by quoting from an advertisement published by Time magazine this past week. What was said there as to Europe, and Germany in particular, poses the type of question for discussion. The same particularity should be directed to Japan and the problems of the Pacific.

I quote:

"The swift march of day-to-day events shows that general principles are not enough. We—meaning you—have got to make some specific decisions pretty soon.

"Right decisions will help to win the war. Wrong decisions will certainly lose the peace. The important questions have no easy answers. For example:

"When Old Glory flies over the Rhine—what then?

"One decision we must face is what to do with a beaten Germany.

"Do you want Germany divided into dozens of little states, as she was before Bismarck's time?

"Do you want to see pieces of Germany given to her neighbors as was done to ancient Poland?

"If so, do you want the Germans 'evacuated' from East Prussia to make room for Russian and Polish colonists?

"If Germans are allowed to stay where they are, do you want them treated like a conquered people or like equal citizens?

"Do you want Germans to rebuild the cities German Armies have destroyed?

"If none of these make sense to you, then what should be done with Germany?

"And, finally, how great a part are you willing that American leaders, American boys, and American dollars should pay in building a new democratic Europe that can live in peace?"

Who makes our foreign policy? In order to give you an idea of what some of your Representatives in Congress are thinking about this I have cast this subject in the form of a summary of my own efforts to find out what our foreign policy is. I believe it to be extremely important that we get an answer to our questions.

I came to Congress in January 1941. It is a part of my business to know what our Government is doing at home and abroad. I have done my best ever since to find out whether we have a foreign policy and what it is. As far back as May 27, 1941, I was saying in the House of Representatives:

"The great test of leadership—of American leadership—is near at hand. One hopes that the great moral forces which do certainly exist here and in England and in other democratic bastions of the world may somehow achieve a more endurable and a more worthy future for mankind.

"Our confusion ought to be resolved, through free discussion, into a workable pattern upon which Americans united can stand."

The New York Times, on Armistice Day, 1941, nearly a month before Pearl Harbor, reported my speech of the day before, as follows:

"HUGH D. SCOTT, Jr., the only Republican Representative from Philadelphia asked President Roosevelt today to give the Nation seven pledges, including one denouncing all aspirations for a fourth term, to win complete unity for the foreign policy now being pursued.

"Mr. SCOTT asked the President to promise he would:

" 'Save labor from those who would betray it and preserve the right of every man to produce for his country's defense.

" 'Put defense production under a single, responsible, capable head.

" 'Cut nondefense expenditures.

" 'Clean the Communists and radicals out of the Government.

" 'Disclaim here and now all ambitions for a fourth term. Let us be sure we are fighting for democracy and not for a dictatorship here at home.

" 'Keep out of local politics. A President dedicated to winning a war ought not to take time to meddle with the election of coroners and magistrates.

" 'Clarify the foreign policy. Let us know what we are fighting for and how far the administration believes and intends we should go. Is there going to be an American expeditionary force?'

"Then Mr. Scott added:

" 'Give us these assurances, Mr. President, and I am sure that the American people will give you a united effort, dedicated to victory, down whatever road you want to take us.' "

By April 21, 1942, after we had been at war more than 4 months, my concern continued as to the administration's intention to take the people into its confidence as to our essential aims after victory, and I said:

"This is no time for politics. Republicans and Democrats alike have a victory to win and an obligation to see that the fruits of victory are not lost."

In November 1942, just 1 year after this further plea for national unity, I said that I believed the recent elections indicated: (1) The demand of the public that we get on with the war; (2) a feeling of resentment at the concealment of truth when such concealment was not essential for military reasons. I repeated: "The public has not been taken into the confidence of the Government."

In September 1943 I remarked in a Philadelphia speech:

"The President and Prime Minister Churchill are relying on their skill at improvising solutions for situations as they occur, but Americans have not yet been given a glimpse of our foreign policy simply for the reason that we do not have a foreign policy to exhibit.

"Just as we have no domestic policy based upon equality of treatment for all, so we have no foreign policy founded on union of purpose and clarity of understanding. Our lend-lease dollars have not bought for us an overlordship of the peace conference. They can do much to win the war, but they cannot purchase the peace.

"Military decisions must obviously remain secret until they are put into practice, but our political intentions are the property of the American people.

"It is about time we had a foreign policy."

You will notice that I was continually making the basic point that any foreign policy determined upon by this country cannot and must not come down to the people from above in the form of Executive agreements which have not been examined by the people and their representatives. Rather, it must arise from considered public opinion to be truly a people's foreign policy.

If any advantage lies in secrecy, or in secret conferences secretly connived at, such an advantage must be sacrificed to the more impelling necessity for an informed thinking citizenry, for a public which knows where it is going, and what course the captain is steering through the turbulent waters of foreign relations. Leaders who withhold vital future plans from the public deny democracy.

I supported and actively worked for the adoption of the Fulbright resolution, adding these words of warning:

"I am glad this resolution has been presented to us. I hope in the future our Government will be more candid in giving us sufficient information as to its intentions toward the rest of the world. * * * Unless the Government informs the people it cannot complain if, having kept the facts secret too long, the public and its representatives balk at adopting such foreign policies as the administration may seek to force through the legislature.

"The people of America are reasonable. They will do the right thing and they can be trusted. They would like to trust their Government. It would be a lot easier for them if they felt the Government trusted them."

In October I was hammering away at the same thought:

"It is only natural for men in positions of authority to resent any criticism of their omniscience as they drive toward important goals, but unless we have a full and fair appraisal of the actions of our public leaders, even including the self-anointed ones, we will not have an informed public opinion."

On Armistice Day of 1943, as I had done in 1941 and in 1942, I spoke again on the same theme:

"We confuse these reports of highly satisfactory conduct of our military and naval forces with foreign policy. At the same time examination will clearly reveal that a consistent foreign policy does not exist and has not existed in this country during the past decade. * * * The Government cannot be the judge and the critic of its own policies. The people will judge and the people cannot deliberate without access to the facts. * * * Our foreign policy today appears to consist of the Atlantic Charter, the 'four freedoms,' and the partially revealed program of the Moscow Conference. I submit we are entitled to more than that, and I make the point on this day of armistice, the beginning of the long armistice, because the armistice is not over, and our debt to our honored dead (of both wars) is still undischarged. * * * An informed, intelligent, free people must arrive at a just, workable, and enduring compact among the nations."

Only the day before I had introduced the original resolution inviting Secretary Hull to address the Congress upon the results of the Moscow Conference. As you know the Secretary did so amid warm tributes to him as a distinguished American, but his report was, to say the least, disappointing to those of us who had hoped for something specific. Many Congressmen had been quite specific in outlining some of the questions in the minds of the American people which we thought should be answered.

On March 21 last I asked in the House of Representatives:

"What are some of the questions on which information is available but withheld. Just to state some of them will exhibit the need for more information, unless we are prepared to surrender, by default, our right to any share in the making of the conditions precedent to an enduring peace.

"Was it decided at Teheran that Germany is to be kept strong and substantially intact, a buffer between Great Britain and Russia?

"What of the German Army? Were decisions made on its continuation in strength, after surrender?

"Were not the terms of an eventual German armistice agreed on in principle?"

Up to this day no specific word has ever come from the President of the United States, but a 17-point program was recently announced by the Secretary of State. In my opinion, this was the Secretary's best speech. It was, however, significant generally for what it did not say. In this careful speech, it appears that our Government still does not fully trust the right people in France and is willing to trust a while longer the wrong people in Italy.

In the cautious words of our eminently respected elder statesman could be found nothing to inflame the peoples of occupied Europe to revolt at the time of invasion. There was notable lack of such specific promises as in the Wilsonian 14 points relating to restoration of nations and their frontiers. Are we not entitled to some information from our Government on specific matters, such as the following:

1. Have we become a party to a partition of Poland?
2. Will all of China be returned to the Chinese?
3. What are we going to do with the Pacific Islands?
4. Is there to be a League of Nations or not?

Every public pronouncement of the President and Secretary of State has skirted these politically troublesome questions by the use of idealistic generalities. When we promise an association of nations, using force if necessary, are we referring to the use of national armed forces or an international armed force? Why not frank discussion on this, led by our leaders?

President Wilson's 14 points end with this statement "We have spoken now, truly, in terms too concrete to admit of any further doubt or question." This was true. Peoples of Europe accepted the 14 points and German Army lost the support of the home front because the German people had specific promises upon which they believed they could rely. Wilson had spoken in concrete terms. Has Secretary Hull so spoken? Has the President so spoken?

On foreign policy pronouncements, we are tired of being beaten to the gun again, and again and again by other nations. We are entitled to expect that our President, in paraphrase of the words of President Washington, will raise a standard of foreign policy to which Americans may repair.

Our foreign policy does not even compare favorably with our pitifully unfortunate domestic policy. There is just one thing to be said for an inadequate and unfortunate domestic policy: Mistakes made on the home front can be corrected and the damage undone by a succeeding administration headed by competent men. Damage done in foreign affairs wrought through ignorance, vanity, secretiveness, or plain incompetence may lead us, without the consent of our people, into such deep involvement with other nations as to be irreparable.

A wise and clear-sighted foreign policy is the need of the hour. The American people should be told the facts of life as regards foreign policy and how we expect to avoid the catastrophe of another war through an acceptable form of international organization, established within the powers of the constituent governments and dedicated to the maintenance of the peace.

It is up to the President of the United States to take the people of the United States into his confidence.

It is later than we think.

Betrayal of Trust

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker—

When the soldiers went away to war in 1917 they had no idea that the war emergency would be used to foist prohibition on the country and when they came back they had a feeling that, expressed in their own way, "something had been put over on them."

Today, with the vast majority of the younger men of the country away from home, the administration is engaged in a betrayal of trust which far overshadows the experience in the World War.

In the guise of war emergency and after having given explicit pledges that the war situation would never be used to alter the status quo by permitting either labor or management to exploit the emergency for their own advantage, the administration has deliberately set in to put over the closed shop in America.

The administration denies vehemently that the maintenance-of-membership idea is a closed shop, but the element of compulsion remains. The fact is that, having elicited a no-strike pledge from labor, the administration has felt it necessary to pay labor for adherence to the job by giving it a maintenance-of-membership advantage.

There can be no doubt that if there were no war on the country would be besieged by an epidemic of strikes and that the maintenance-of-membership clauses would be won in very few cases. Economic warfare would result just as it has in respect to the closed shop.

Congress has never set forth as a national policy either the closed shop or maintenance-of-membership coercion. But notwithstanding this fact the administration has made maintenance of membership a cardinal policy and is willing even in the critical months of this war to stir up a bitter controversy and call in troops to enforce that basic labor advantage.

Perhaps the simplest way to put an end to capricious handling of governmental power is to put a criminal clause in the statutes so that any violation of the Constitution by an official will be subject to a severe penalty.

The above was not written by me. I just copied it, word for word, from an article by David Lawrence, publisher and editor of the United States News and who, on the whole, has said some very nice things about the President and the New Deal. David Lawrence, as well as many others, has had more than enough of dictatorship.

Having been so vigorously and severely criticized because of my criticism of the New Deal, it is encouraging to find, after 8 long years, a man like Lawrence and many other sound, influential writers, giving utterance to the same thought earlier expressed by me. It leads me, not to use the somewhat conceited expression, "I told you so," but to the conclusion that perhaps, after all, the danger to our free institutions was sensed, warned against, and all along has been realized by many who were not so outspoken or who did not have the opportunity to be heard.

Believing that action rather than words or investigations is needed, an amendment was on May 1 introduced by me which would make impossible a repetition of the Montgomery Ward & Co. case.

Citizens who are victims of arbitrary, unjust, unconstitutional administrative orders should have an adequate, easy, and cheaply available remedy through local courts, and administrative officers who willfully make and enforce such orders should be punished or ousted from their jobs.

Congress should no longer let some agencies run hog-wild.

As One American Sees It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following statement by a leading citizen in my congressional district:

DEMOCRACY OR NATIONAL SOCIALISM?

This is our only political issue. The war is not an issue. Our military staff is giving the war capable management. International affairs are not an issue. Most Americans realize there must be some form of international cooperation. It cannot be exactly defined until all of the cards are on the table. There is no contest between the major political parties. Patriotic Americans in all parties adhere to democracy.

What do we mean by democracy? We mean a government entirely subservient to the individual citizen, not a paternalism which regulates the affairs of the people. Democracy is not the dead level of "mediocracy"; neither does it make mendicancy respectable. Our forefathers took their woman, and an axe and a gun and headed back into the wilderness where they had to contend with savages, wild beasts, and an uncompromising nature.

"Times have changed?" "Old-fashioned democracy cannot meet modern conditions?" "The democracy of that day does not fit our needs?" "We are now an industrial Nation rather than agricultural?" That is adolescent drool which I heard from long haired undergraduates back in the gay nineties. We thought them amusing then, but they were still nuts in the 1930's and were able to do a quack doctor stunt for a people suffering from an economic stomach ache. The real Americans of today do not wish to be diapered from the cradle to the grave. That is not democracy. A bonnet and shawl do not make Hitler's wolf or Joe Stalin's bear Little Red Riding Hood's grandma—democracy.

From the beginning of "the great experiment," democracy, those suffering from delusions of grandeur have believed themselves ordained of God to manage the affairs of their fellow men. The present effort to undermine democracy is not new.

If we have any part of the patriotism of the boys in uniform we will defend democracy with all we have. The candidate, in the coming election, who has the guts to come out for an individualistic democracy can either win a glorious victory or he can go down to defeat as a great patriot along with those boys who, in their battle against national socialism, do not come home.

The Cabaret Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from the president of the Hotel Association of New York City:

HOTEL ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK CITY, INC.,
New York, N. Y., May 4, 1944.

Hon. MARTIN J. KENNEDY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN KENNEDY: The Hotel Association of New York City, Inc., representing 196 hotels with an assessed valuation of over $400,000,000, respectfully urges you to approve legislation that will eliminate the 30-percent cabaret tax, or at least bring it down to a maximum of 10 percent.

The present tax is adversely affecting our member hotels that provide dancing and entertainment for their guests. The 30-percent tax is compelling changes in entertainment policies, with a resulting loss of employment to entertainers and musicians. Some hotels have already eliminated entertainment and dancing during the dinner hour, and we know of one hotel that will not open its roof garden. Another is considering a like step unless relief is promptly provided.

The hotels of New York City, like those throughout the entire country, are cooperating in every way possible in the war effort. We are complying with every wartime request; are helping all organizations working in behalf of the members of our armed forces, such as the Red Cross, U. S. O., Travelers Aid Society, etc. We are willing to continue to do our part, but we sincerely believe, judging by our experience during the last month that, in the 30-percent cabaret tax, we are carrying an unfair and inequitable business burden.

Congress, in adopting the tax legislation, considered the 30-percent cabaret tax as a luxury tax. But our experience shows that the members of the armed forces are among the greatest victims of the tax. It is a well-known fact that many men and women in the service of our country come to New York for rest and relaxation. Many of them are here just prior to their leaving for foreign duty. This tax is depriving these people of the very thing they are seeking in their visits to New York. This is a situation, we are certain, Congress never intended to create.

We urge you, therefore, to use your influence to eliminate the cabaret tax entirely or reduce it to a maximum of 10 percent. This, in our opinion, will be placing the operation of the tax on a practical and sensible basis.

Sincerely,

MARTIN SWEENY,
President.

Let's Not Tax Our Boys in Uniform

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. TOLAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. TOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a resolution to amend the Internal Revenue Code in such a way as to relieve the men of the armed forces of the United Nations of a tax which, on the pay of an enlisted man or of a junior officer, can be a mighty big item, though in relation to the total revenues of the country it is nothing.

I refer to the transportation tax.

Under the law as it reads today the railroads and the Interstate Commerce Commission are authorized to set up special low-cost traffic for enlisted men, with a rate of 1¼ cents a mile for round trips only, when the men are on official leave, furlough, or pass, and traveling at their own expense.

In 1941, the Internal Revenue Act we passed that year added to section 3469, United States Internal Revenue Code, the following language:

Tax on transportation of persons: (f) Exemptions—(2) Exemption of members of military and naval service: The tax imposed by this section shall not apply to the payment for the transportation or facilities furnished under special tariffs providing for fares of not more than 1¼ cents per mile applicable to round trips sold to personnel of the United States Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard traveling in uniform of the United States; or to members of the military or naval forces of any of the other United Nations traveling in uniform of such nation, at their own expense, when on official leave, furlough, or pass, including authorized cadets and midshipmen, issued on presentation of properly executed certificate.

The tax we have assessed against transportation of persons is 15 percent of the value of the ticket.

To you and to me this tax is certainly something we feel; to the men in uniform it is almost prohibitive.

Naturally, most of the men who travel at their own expense take advantage of the special low fares on day-coach round trips.

That is why assessing full tax on first-class tickets is unfair—about the only time an enlisted man or a junior officer will want to go by Pullman at his own expense is when he is on emergency leave and has far to go.

The other day we read of an officer who received emergency leave to go to the bedside of his dying wife and arrived too late by an hour. This officer was flown to San Francisco, then had to cross the continent to New York by train. He paid 15 percent of the price of his ticket on an extra-fare train plus 15 percent of the cost of his Pullman seat in his frenzied dash half-way around the world.

It is in cases like this where my proposal will help out. I am indebted to my long-time friend, Harold M. Miles of the Southern Pacific Railroad, for this suggestion. He assures me he knows of no railroad which will object to relieving the soldiers and sailors of the tax when they are paying full first-class fare. All my bill does is to delete the language restricting tax exemption for servicemen to the special low tariffs and relieve them of all transportation tax, at all times, when they are in uniform, on leave, and paying their own way.

I have no slightest doubt but that the Committee on Ways and Means and the Members of the House will give this proposal their earliest possible approval so that the law may be at once amended and collection of this tax from servicemen stopped immediately.

The Montgomery Ward Seizure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to present my views on the seizure of the Montgomery Ward Co. in Chicago. The newspapers have already given this incident the very dramatic title "The Battle of Chicago." I regard this battle as a defeat for the people of America. Whatever the ultimate outcome may be, the action of our Government in this dispute deserves the severest criticism. It was shameful because it was unnecessary and unwarranted. The laws of our country are designed to protect the weak against the persecution of the strong. Our Federal Government had every means at its disposal for the solution of this problem. It could have ordered an election instead of waiting until after a crisis developed; it could have used the services of civilian authorities instead of calling in the Army; it could have permitted the head of this company to remain in his office without resorting to absurd physical violence.

I regard Montgomery Ward & Co. as occupying a position similar to that of thousands of other wholesale and retail business enterprises in our country. They are not in themselves manufacturers of war materials, and the reaction of the majority of Congressmen to this situation makes it apparent that the legislation under which our Government acted was not intended to cover a company of this kind.

If a war-goods manufacturer, producer, or mining company had defied the Government, a different question would be presented. This arbitrary action now becomes a new testing ground for the entire issue of big government versus private business.

H. R. 4479

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a speech which I made on May 4 at a meeting in Washington, D. C., under the auspices of the India League of America. The speech was in connection with H. R. 4479, a bill which I introduced to provide for the naturalization and admission into the United States of Eastern Hemisphere Indians and descendants of Eastern Hemisphere Indians under a quota.

I am including a resolution passed by the audience at the conclusion of the address:

Ladies and gentlemen, I have dropped into the congressional hopper the companion bill to Mr. CELLER'S. As you have been told here repeatedly tonight, this bill would naturalize some 3,000 Indians from India who are today living in America, and would allow not more than 75 Indian-born Indians to enter our country a year, where they could become American citizens.

Why did I introduce this bill? So far as I know, not one of the 3,000 Indians who might be benefited by it lives in Fairfield County. Nor, for that matter, will the good opinion which numbers of literate and patriotic Indians in far-off India may conceive of my colleagues and me do much to help any of us next November. Then surely you think we did not introduce this measure to get votes? Perhaps we should claim that this is precisely the case. The average politician generally does like to be in a spot where he can effectively deny that his actions or words are motivated by any selfish desire to be reelected. He thinks if he can but show that there is no connection between his legislative propositions and the local ballot boxes, he may be hailed as an idealist or even a statesman. But why does the average politician yearn above all things to be considered an idealist and a statesman? Perhaps because upon analysis it so often turns out that idealists and statesmen are even more popular—that is, better vote getters—than politicians. For Americans, by and large, are still a nation of idealists, and a people who prefer their legislators to be statesmen rather than demagogs.

But I would never deny the accusation that fundamentally in all I do and say in Congress I seek popular votes, which is to say—the free approval of the people who elected me. It seems to me that the very safety of our Republic lies in the fact that our politicians have never yet discovered a way of doing or saying unpopular things for very long and still being returned to office. Storm troopers and blackshirts, dictators and tyrants can, with the aid of billies and bayonets, get away with unpopular words and laws, words and laws against the best interests of all the people. But democratic legislators can't. This is the essence and strength of our representative form of government. That is why no politician should ever deny the accusation that he is seeking votes. For as long as he is seeking votes he is bound to seek public approval. And, in the long run, public approval is accorded only to those whose words and laws tend to benefit the community and the Nation.

I, therefore, say frankly that I introduced this bill because I think in the long run the majority of the people of my own Fairfield County, who are a pretty good patriotic cross-section of the United States of America, will approve of me for doing so, because they will know that it is to their best interests, as Americans, that it should be passed.

In short, the best way for a politician to get votes today and tomorrow is to behave like a patriot. And a patriot is a man who cares about the safety of American troops overseas, while we are fighting, and the good will of other peoples and nations, when we are done. We may build the post-war edifice of peace by force, but good will is the only cement that will hold the international blocks together. And I say that the reason that the people of my own State will be for this legislation is that they will understand that it was introduced primarily as a small but important safeguard for the lives of their sons in the China-Burma-India theater, and a small but important step forward in securing the friendly cooperation and respect of hundreds of millions of Asiatics in the post-war era.

Why especially then is it to the benefit of Americans that they should give an immigration quota to Indians from India which will allow approximately 75 Indians a year to come to our shores?

First, because it will strengthen Indian morale now, by showing the Indian people, Moslems and Hindus alike, that this Nation does not discriminate among its allies on a purely racial basis. There are 2,000,000 Indians under Allied arms today. Indian regiments are fighting in Italy. Indian regiments will cross the channel with Allied invasion troops. Indian divisions are today the backbone of the British armies fighting the invading Japanese around beleauguered Imphal. Upon their success largely depends the fate of Gen. Joe Stilwell and his American and Chinese troops, fighting in the heart of Burma. Upon the success of Indian arms greatly depends our ability to continue to supply China by air over the Hump. Indian troops guard all the sea and air and land portals of India. In their loyalty and prowess lies the ultimate security of all India and, therefore, to a great extent, of all China.

Today there are a half million American troops in the China-Burma-India theater. Perhaps a million more will be needed before the Japanese armies can be driven from the Asiatic mainland. American prestige and popularity and, therefore, the safety of American troops cannot fail to be enhanced by the passage of this legislation. For the admission of a mere 75 Indians a year will become a great and persuasive symbol that we have wiped from our statute books the stigma of Indian inferiority, and are willing to cooperate as democratic partners today and tomorrow with India's three hundred and ninety millions.

Do not think for a moment that Indians will not hear of this small but shining deed. There are radios and newspapers, of course, in India. But the whispers that travel through the bazaars of a hundred thousand Indian villages travel faster than either. If this legislation is passed, it will be whispered there—no it will be shouted in all of India—that Americans think no less well of Indian fighting men than they do of Chinese fighting men. For we have already erased from our laws the insult written there to our magnificent Chinese allies. We can do no less for our Indian ones.

Secondly, I believe, as do millions of Americans, that it is today and always will be to our best interests to practice the democracy and Christianity we preach, both abroad and at home. I know how deep is the prejudice among many of our people against all of God's sunburned sons of sorrow. The black, brown and yellow peoples of the world have long been looked down upon as inferiors by the white man.

But the luxury of prejudice, whether religious or racial, was one mankind could never really afford. Many of the worst and bloodiest catastrophies of history were rooted in these blind prejudices. Still, until now, the white man has somehow survived the evil results and dangerous implications of his own racial prejudices. Space and distance and a superiority of industrial and military might allowed him to do so. But this is a rapidly shrinking world. It has been shrunk to the size of an apple—an apple, alas, of discord, by the airplane and the railroad and the battleship and the truck and wireless and radio. Moreover, these mechanical inventions and mobile power units are no longer exclusively the sole property of the white races. Today it behooves the one-third of the world which is white skinned to think long and hard about its prejudices against the two-thirds whose skins are of a different color. It is high time, it is none too soon that we begin to make a little democratic and Christian sense in this matter of racial prejudice, if not for the sakes of our Christian souls, for the sakes of white skins.

It seems to me that this pending legislation is a step forward toward a recognition of this problem, an effort, however small, to do something in the direction of both skin and soul saving. We shall not be the losers either on earth or in heaven for admitting by this gesture the democratic brotherhood of man on earth which is eternally posited on the spiritual fatherhood of God in heaven.

Seventy-five Indian immigrants a year in a growing population of 135,000,000 Americans can certainly present no threat to our culture or our living standards. It is far too low a figure to matter either as a threat to domestic labor or to our national racial and cultural composition. Let me make it quite plain at this point that I am in favor of keeping it low. I have no wish to see my country flooded by peoples whose cultures and political backgrounds differ greatly from our own, whether they be Asiatics, Europeans, or Africans. For vast or even sizable numbers of peoples of alien turns of mind would be impossible for us to assimilate. But I consider this bill of mine and of Mr. CELLER, not so much an immigration bill, as a diplomatic and political measure against our present and future enemies. It bears precisely the same relation to our war effort and the peace effort that must follow, as the recent bill passed by Congress admitting a hundred-odd Chinese to our country.

I hesitate to say that one more reason I favor this quota for Indians is that we Americans might learn something from them, even though they are only a number of 75. Unhappily few people in America are fully aware that the great 6,000-year-old Hindu-Muslim civilizations of India have produced many of the world's greatest poets, philosophers, saints, scientists, authors, and artists, and notably few of its bloodthirsty warriors. But all Americans know that India has been for time out of mind a land of vast wealth. They know this because they know that Christopher Columbus' voyage was undertaken to discover a new route to the rich and fabulous Indies. They know that America might not have been discovered for several more centuries if India had not already been so famous in all of Europe. Surely there is something to be gained by our still young culture by opening our minds by this small gesture of invitation to 75 Indians to a healthy and useful recognition of India's ancient and powerful one. But it is also high time that we production-minded Americans faced the fact that this Nation of 390,000,000 of people is actually the eighth great industrial state in the world and potentially the third greatest—the first and second being, of course, the United States and Russia.

This fact has a vast import for the future of civilization. A country actually so strong and potentially even stronger cannot be ignored in our future calculations in foreign policy whether we think in geopolitical or power-political terms, which are today so much the fashion, or whether we think in terms of Christianity, democracy, and the humanities.

In terms of industrial facts and human figures, India is today a colonial possession of Great Britain. But tomorrow, or the day after tomorrow, she will become a free nation. This has been promised to her by the British themselves. The redemption of this promise will be one of the noblest and most constructive acts of statesmanship ever practiced by any nation. It will be similar in spirit to our procedure in the Philippines, but much greater in scope and in significance for the whole world. The temporary material sacrifice to Great Britain would be great—a fact we must never in the flush of our own strength and richness and comparative security forget for a minute. But in the end it would enrich Great Britain more than it would impoverish her. For it would, I believe, promote the cause of a long and prosperous peace in the Pacific as no other action taken by any other nation possibly could. As a member of the British Commonwealth, or as a totally independent nation, India would become not only a powerhouse of democratic thought in Asia but a vast and rich industrial market for the world. A free India would be a Pacific ally we Americans could cherish with enormous profit to ourselves and them. But whether Britain redeems her promise or not, the Indians intend one day to be free. Certainly one mighty neighbor of India's encourages, if not abets, this aspiration. That is Soviet Russia. I am not one of those who fear today that Russia and Russian communism will inevitably spread upon India. But I do fear that if India loses her faith in the political promises of Great Britain and the idealistic foreign aims of America, India and Indian communism will spread upon Russia. In short, an India too long thwarted of freedom by the western democracies might turn as her only alternative, to Russian communism and Russia itself for salvation and succor.

Japanese propagandists daily din into the ears of Indians that, although the Americans and British feel that Indians are good enough to die for them by the millions, they do not feel they are good enough for freedom; they are not even good enough for America to allow a mere paltry 75 of them to enter our country. Now, this is precisely what Communists in all countries, including our own, are saying, too, of the way be behave to our Indian allies. So Communists, Japs, and Germans all agree on this: We do not practice in foreign relations the democracies we preach. In the final analysis we can make liars of them all only by what we do and not by what we say when faced with such accusations.

Japanese propaganda in India today will suffer a mortal blow if we pass this legislation. And Indian Communist propaganda there tomorrow will find it harder to get off the ground, or rather out of the ground.

I hope, therefore, my purpose in introducing this legislation is clear. It is calculated primarily to help keep India in the columns of our democratic allies and friends, both today and tomorrow.

RESOLUTIONS PASSED BY THE AUDIENCE

Whereas this war is professedly being fought to achieve democratic equality among all nations; and

Whereas the nationals of India are objects of discrimination under our present immigration and naturalization laws; and

Whereas the United States has recognized the injustice to the Chinese people by lifting immigration and naturalization barriers against them; and

Whereas India is allied with the United Nations in the conduct of the war: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this audience assembled in the National Press Club Auditorium urges Congress to enact immediately pending legislation which would permit immigration under quota of nationals of India and make them eligible to United States citizenship.

Italy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a joint resolution which, if adopted by the Congress, will place Congress on record as favoring immediate resumption of full diplomatic relations between the United States and Italy and favoring the recognition of the present Government of Italy as a full and equal ally of all the United Nations. I attach the utmost military and political importance to this resolution, and I hope it will aid in bringing about a resumption of friendly relations between the United States and Italy.

The situation in Italy today is such that the Axis enemy, now occupying the major cities and rich industrial areas of northern Italy, may be struck a major military and political blow by the wise action of the leaders of the United Nations in giving diplomatic recognition to the Government of Italy and according it United Nations' status.

For the first time in 22 years the freedom-loving people of Italy have the opportunity to reconstitute themselves into a free and independent nation. All anti-Fascist and pro-democratic parties in Italy, clearly reflecting the expressed will of the Italian people in free and occupied Italy, are united behind the present government and form a major portion of its ministries. For the United States to resume diplomatic relations with Italy now will be to give the Italian people back their dignity and self-respect, to furnish the unequivocal guarantee that post-war Italy will not be a vassal Mediterranean state subject to the imperialistic whims of any nation. This action will make the whole Italian people realize that this war is a war of liberation for them and for all people.

Resumption of full diplomatic relations with Italy will aid materially the cause of the full mobilization of the Italian people to drive out the Axis enemy, to strike him and strike him hard in the front lines at Cassino with Italian soldiers, behind these lines with increased production of food and war munitions, and in the occupied areas by ceaseless and fearless guerrilla warfare and sabotage. It is through this action that the lives of many American and other United Nations soldiers may be spared on the beachhead at Anzio and on the Cassino front.

I have every confidence that my resolution coincides with the policies and convictions of President Roosevelt and other leaders of the United Nations.

Joint resolution requesting the President to establish friendly diplomatic relations with Italy

Whereas the President of the United States, acting with the full consent of the leaders of the United Nations, has pledged the Italian people the right to a free and democratic government of Italy of their own choosing; and

Whereas the present government of Italy is preponderantly composed of the representatives of the six political parties, comprising every current of anti-Fascist and prodemocratic sentiment in Italy; and

Whereas these politicial parties therefore reflect the will of the Italian people, not only of the liberated areas but of all of Italy; and

Whereas the presence of these Italian anti-Fascist and prodemocratic parties in the government of Italy offers clear assurance to the Italian people and to the world against unwanted forms of government in Italy, whether monarchial, dictatorial or imperialistic; and

Whereas the resumption of full diplomatic relations between the United States and Italy and the recognition of the present Italian government as a full and equal ally, entitled to lend-lease aid and to a proper role in the counsels of the United Nations, will release untold energies of the Italian people in both the liberated and occupied areas of Italy to give their fullest support to crushing the Axis, thus striking a hard political and military blow against Hitler and his agent, Mussolini, and shortening the war with consequent saving of the lives of thousands of gallant American soldiers now fighting on Italian soil: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby requested, to direct the Secretary of State to resume friendly diplomatic relations between the United States and Italy, to extend lend-lease aid to Italy; and to use his good offices to the end that the other United Nations resume diplomatic relations with Italy and that the United Nations recognize Italy as a full and equal ally.

Commando Kelly's Come Home

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem written by me, entitled "Commando Kelly's Come Home":

COMMANDO KELLY'S COME HOME

(Dedicated to Sgt. Charles Kelly)

There's a gnashing of teeth in Berlin,
There's a gnawing of nails in Rome;
The whole world with a heart tears Pittsburgh apart—
Commando Kelly's come home.

They've got honors galore for the Kelly
As he wings his way over the foam,
But above any other is the kiss of his mother—
Commando Kelly's come home.

There's a swell hotel suite that's not wanted,
For far sweeter than pure honeycomb
Is the house friends and kin crowd with neighborly din—
Commando Kelly's come home.

So here's to the One-Man Battalion,
As modest and brave as they come,
Who added new glory to our glorious story—
Commando Kelly's come home.

MARTIN J. KENNEDY,
Member of Congress.

Address of Secretary of Labor Perkins at I. L. O. Conference, Philadelphia, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from Philadelphia, where I have been serving as a technical adviser to the Government delegates—Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins and Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS—at the Twenty-sixth Conference of the International Labor Organization. The House approved request for leave of absence upon my designation to the post by Secretary of State Hull. All meetings are held at Temple University.

This is a tripartite conference with workers, employers, and Government represented. It is too early to report on the Conference. Much time was used in discussing jurisdiction and procedure, but now progress is being made in dealing with the many far-reaching and important points on the long agenda. One of the most serious problems still requiring considerable study and discussion is the framing of recommendations to be made to the United Nations for present and post-war social policy.

The procedure being followed at all meetings is most democratic both in form and in fact. The major committee deals with the basic questions concerning the future role of the I. L. O. in the world organization which will come with the allied victory.

This group is headed by Miss Perkins, has 72 members, including representatives of 36 governments, 18 employer delegations and 18 worker representatives.

Because of the procedure in voting, there is little chance for "steam roller" tactics. In the deliberations so far, Miss Perkins has avoided settling matters in dispute by vote, encouraging full discussions and changes in language until all members can agree. So far this method has worked and seems to be a wise one since the differences have been largely on details. It takes more time but leaves all delegates happier than if their proposals were voted down.

The committee which I have been serving on—Employment During Transition From War to Peace—has dealt with the major points that were controversial, so I have returned to the Capital until the Conference is ready to act upon this report. There was considerable debate on demobilization of soldiers and of those in war industries and other practical questions.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the address of Secretary Perkins setting forth the American Government's position on the matters of the agenda, President Roosevelt's letter to the Conference on its opening April 20, and the telegram of Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, read to the Conference on its second day:

Every nation in the world today accepts as axiomatic the idea that a man should be able to live as the result of the work that he does and the contribution he makes to society. We know that long-term mass unemployment can be prevented in any society. It must be accepted as a fundamental labor standard, that steady and regular jobs will be available for all who are able to accept work discipline and to achieve some minimum of skill and efficiency. Whatever devices may be necessary we must see to it that our economic organization is such as to provide the necessary millions of jobs throughout the world and increasing opportunity for the investment of the savings of the people in the further expansion of its economy. These jobs must be distributed among manufacturing, construction, trade, transportation, agriculture, and private and public services in reasonable and practical proportions. Above all there should be jobs for the production of needed and useful goods and services which can be consumed locally or traded profitably in the world markets.

While the availability of jobs depends primarily upon the maintenance of a dynamic equilibrium between production on the one hand and consumer purchasing power and investment demands on the other, we have all learned during the war the importance of flexible and efficient organization of the labor market as a means of reducing lost opportunities for employment. A free public employment system, serving the whole population, will be even more indispensable in the transition from war to peace than it was during the war. There should be no weakening of these services after this war. We welcome the opportunity at this conference to discuss means for improving national employment service through international collaboration, and to discuss ways and means of placing disabled persons in self-sustaining employment.

In the transition from war to peace we shall have to guard against the erection of barriers to employment. We cannot protect employment and labor standards by a hierarchy of preferences. The needs of individuals who are seeking work must be recognized. All nations should undertake that, in plans for the demobilization of war industries, special attention will be given to the needs of women for reemployment. The failure to do so will result not only in the exclusion from employment of women who need jobs but in a letdown of labor living standards.

In the transition from war to peace we must be clear-headed with regard to the means of preventing unemployment. Whenever unemployment has appeared as a phenomenon in the past, there has been a tendency to excuse or write down part of it on the assumption that there is no need for the product of as many people as are willing to work. Overproduction is a popular but untrue word. Actually periods of depression have been periods of real poverty, real lack of things when there was desperate need for the goods that might have been produced. Today, having partially appraised the needs of our own and other countries, we know that there will not be too many workers to serve those needs. We should never again allow trained workers and developed facilities available for the production of needed goods and services to remain idle, while the needs of large parts of the world's population remain unsatisfied.

But employment is not an end in itself. Free and informed societies recognize that the purpose of the employment relationship is to produce goods and services for consumption and to provide incomes for both employer and workers that will make an adequate purchasing market for the things that have been produced, or their equivalent, in trade. Improper employment or harmful employment should and can be avoided. Except in great emergencies, the current work of an individual should promote his future capacity to render service.

The improvement of the conditions of employment is therefore of essential concern. The International Labor Organization has a special and peculiar responsibility for developing those minimum standards that all of us accept as necessary.

Reducing hazards of work places;

The regulation of the employment of children;

Special safeguards for the employment of women;

Provisions for minimum wages and maximum hours;

The provision of rest periods and opportunities for leisure;

The establishment of comprehensive systems of social insurance and public assistance;

Provision for opportunity for development of collective bargaining.

The experience and techniques which the I. L. O. has built up, the faith that is put in it by the people of so many lands, and above all, its character as an organization in which representatives of workers and employers have an established right to participate, give it a strength which no newly created instrument could equal. I take it therefore that all nations gathered here, including the U. S. A. intend in the future, as in the past, to place primary reliance on the procedures of the International Labor Organization to develop and implement international labor standards.

We shall not satisfy the legitimate expectations of the people of the world, however, if we do not strengthen the organization and adapt it to meet additional responsibilities in the post-war period. No constitutional change is needed.

To equip the office more fully as an organ to offer advice and assistance to competent national authorities in the development of labor standards and administration:

To provide within the office competent technical investigators to make impartial investigations on the spot, under specified conditions, of compliance with accepted obligations; and

To develop regional conventions in some instances to supplement international conventions.

In particular, for example, we believe there should be further explorations of the possibility of setting specific minimum wages by international negotiation for particular industries or regions. We believe that the I. L. O. in the past has not given adequate attention to the problem of securing minimum earnings for those groups of workers who do not work for wages but sell the product of their labor. We believe that the role of the I. L. O. in connection with labor standards in dependent areas can be greatly extended.

We would also favor formal action by the United Nations, and such others as may care to associate themselves with their action, to extend the influence of the conventions and recommendations adopted at the International Labor Conferences. As in the past, member states should be free to ratify these conventions, or not, as they see fit. Only thus can we preserve the influence of the economic groups and avoid an insistence upon the rule of unanimity that has been so generally the practice in diplomatic conferences. But when a two-thirds majority of the accredited delegates from the member states have adopted an international labor standard, that standard should be held constantly before the eyes of the world and of all governments. Member states should adopt a requirement to report to the I. L. Office on the status of legislation, administration, and practice under collective agreements with respect to all matters covered by conventions whether they have been ratified or not. Such reports, incidentally, can be expected of Federal states, even on matters that may lie within the province of the component states and are therefore not submitted to the Federal authority for ratification.

The present moment seems to us a propitious one in which to implement the last 25 years of work by the I. L. O. Between 1919 and 1939 the conference adopted 63 labor conventions. At the time that each was adopted, it would have been impossible for all the nations of the world immediately to have ratified any one. Standards must be built up gradually. But I think we should ask ourselves whether the time has not come when some of these standards could be made more nearly universal.

We believe that within the framework of the peace settlements it should be possible to secure world-wide adoption of certain minimum child-labor standards. Those nations, for example, that have already established a 14-year minimum age for industrial employment should be able to ratify the 15-year minimum provided in convention 59; others should be able to accept the 14-year minimum in convention 5. We believe that all nations should be prepared to prohibit the underground work of women in mines in accordance with the convention adopted in 1935. We believe that in every country there should be minimum wage-fixing machinery and current knowledge as to what wages are paid and what hours worked.

Whenever international economic arrangements are being consummated—whether it be a matter of international loans, of the redistribution of merchant shipping, or an agreement with reference to air transport—the negotiators should bear constantly in mind the possibility of utilizing those negotiations and instruments as a means of improving labor standards.

But even though there lies behind us a record of great accomplishment in formulating international labor standards, though we have a chance at this time to associate the I. L. O. with those who will shape the peace in the United Nations, though we intend to use the I. L. O. to establish even better standards in the future, all this is not enough.

The United Nations are pledged to seek to achieve freedom from want for the mass of the population. In formulating these labor and social standards which are described on our agenda, we have an opportunity and an obligation to advance standards of living throughout the world through the instrumentality of the peace settlements.

How is this to be done? What role does the I. L. O. have in this great struggle to establish a socially just peace?

The political framework to maintain peace and an energetic joint program to raise production and consumption to the highest possible levels will reinforce each other. The resources of the world are inadequate to sustain it as an armed camp and at the same time to maintain its population in health and comfort. We have learned that improved working and living conditions contribute to social stability and thus to world peace.

Freedom from want requires productive capacity sufficient to satisfy the needs of all people. It requires an organization of the economy such that this capacity will be used and that the resulting product is so distributed as to insure at least minimum standards to all workers. Systems of social insurance and public assistance have the effect of putting purchasing power in the hands of those who do not for a variety of reasons achieve an adequate income through their own current efforts. Such systems make consumers out of otherwise indigents. To these things we are pledged.

At this stage in the world's history, man has a conscious choice. Good standards do not necessarily flow from productivity, but without high productivity, standards are bound to be low and even deteriorating. The opportunity before the civilized world at the present time is to choose to establish high social standards and high standards of living out of increased productivity and to develop that productivity with a view to enhancing human living. Our work in this conference should be directed to crystallizing that choice in the certainty that high levels of productivity will be enhanced by the efficiency arising out of good standards and that the building up of purchasing power on a broad scale through better incomes and better standards throughout the world will create markets to support the expanding production.

International collaboration toward this end will be facilitated, if the specific objectives embraced within the concept of freedom from want are defined and if the force of world opinion can be brought to bear continuously upon the problem of raising living standards throughout the world. Nations should agree that they will develop national policies and will cooperate in international policies which would seek:

To insure a high level of steady employment.

To encourage development of natural resources, technical progress, improved management, and training of workers, in order that labor may be employed under conditions of maximum efficiency; and to discourage the restriction of useful production.

To insure that all young persons have access from birth until they are fully grown to adequate food and medical care so that they may be healthy, strong, and vigorous; to housing conducive to family welfare; to educational and guidance facilities adequate to the maximum development and utilization of their personal capacities; to protection from employment at too early an age or under conditions detrimental to their health or welfare; and to social and recreational opportunities adequate to develop self-reliant, socially responsible individuals.

To establish minimum standards of employment to prevent the exploitation of those workers (whether employed or self-employed, in industry or in agriculture) whose opportunities for high wage employment are limited; and to make progressive improvement in these standards as their resources permit.

To provide for a regular flow of income to all those whose employment is interrupted by sickness or injury, by old age or by lack of employment opportunity.

To maintain the health of the population through adequate public-health measures and the safeguarding of work places and by providing that all individuals have the opportunity to receive adequate preventive and curative treatment.

Agreement with respect to such objectives should underlie and motivate all of the special international economic agencies that have been or may be created as part of the peace settlements. We welcome the recognition of these goals by the United Nations Conference on Food and Agriculture and by the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration.

The collaboration of the International Labor Organization in the pursuit of these objectives is vital. They are also objectives of this organization. They are the objectives of the groups here represented. Few of us here are technically competent to stabilize currencies, to arrange international loans, to develop more efficient production of foodstuffs. But we do know whether standards of living are rising or falling. We can distinguish whether a technical economic device is contributing to employment and a rising standard of living or is designed to limit production of needed commodities perhaps only to create great profits, greater than the necessity of fair returns or investment required. The International Labor Organization should appropriately discuss the various ways in which progress is being made toward the objective of freedom from want and should be able to communicate its suggestions for the more effective pursuit of this objective to each of the technical agencies whose activities will be indispensable to its attainment.

More than this, the I. L. O. is a suitable forum in which nations should review from time to time the total picture of their progress in social justice. As we set up a series of specialized technical economic bodies, there is danger that we may lose sight of our basic objective. It is not our object to progress in identical ways in all parts of the world. In some countries sanitation may be prerequisite to progress; in others food may be the greatest need; in others, housing, in others, a wider distribution of income; in others, the stabilization of employment. All that we are trying to do is to set in motion forces throughout the world which will insure that everywhere, year by year, in one respect or another, progress is made toward these goals. Where more appropriately than in the I. L. O. can that progress be discussed?

The I. L. O. has always been a forum for the discussion of social conditions and economic problems affecting the well-being of workers. The United States Government will propose that this function be extended and formalized:

"The United Nations, and such others as are willing to join us should agree to give information annually to the I. L. O. Conference in regard to the degree of achievement of the social goals they agree to set for themselves."

Such reports will be more fruitful if there is general agreement with respect to objective standards that should constitute the goals of economic and social policy and if there is some uniformity in the compilation of information with respect to the extent to which these standards have been approximated. We shall therefore wish to recommend a formal undertaking among the United Nations, to be adhered to in connection with the peace settlements, to develop, through appropriate international agencies, statistical measures and to maintain statistical and other information bearing on the enumerated goals of social policy, as well as on employment, national income, and the distribution of income. There should be close collaboration and full exchange of information between the I. L. O. and other international bodies established to promote economic advancement and social well-being.

There should be no conflict between technical progress and steady employment. Technical progress has made possible mankind's rise from misery. Under the best of conditions, it will still require decades of capital accumulation to produce the tools that are needed to free more than half the people of the world from the necessity of using back-breaking and pathetically inefficient methods of production.

Without a broad and developing base of efficient productive capacity, the ideal of achieving freedom from want involves perpetual makeshift. When one must choose between enough food and good medical care, drugs, or sanitation, no choice will be satisfactory, because nutrition is perhaps the most important principle of preventive medicine while poor health makes men inefficient producers.

It follows that the fundamental lines of economic policy must concern themselves with raising the productive capacity of populations and with insuring a full and effective use of productive resources. The population of the world can be better nourished while young children are freed from labor, for example, if agricultural machinery, fertilizer, breeding stock, and technical help are imported by poor regions so that more food can be produced with fewer hours of labor.

Their need for tools promises a market for the products of industrialized countries. This market will be profitable, however, only if the rest of the world is willing to buy part of the increased supply of goods that may be produced in hitherto underdeveloped areas so that payment can be made for the equipment needed. Thus an orderly and continuous expansion of world trade is an indispensable part of an international program aiming at the elimination of want.

Even were the objective of achieving freedom from want conceived by any government exclusively in the interest of the workers of that country, the program for economic development should be world-wide in scope. Geographical specialization of production, insofar as it is consistent with military security, has the same advantages in the international as in the national sphere. We shall limit the possible increase in the standard of living in the United States, for example, if we insist upon using part of our labor in the exploitation of inferior resources. Equally we shall increase the difficulty of furnishing regular employment to all workers in industrially advanced countries, if we fail fully to avail ourselves of the tremendous market for machines and technical assistance created by the needs of areas with undeveloped resources.

Nor is the development of a high level of national income a matter exclusively of national concern. Imports to the United States are high when our industrial activity is running at high levels; low, when we are in depression. Every country depending upon exports to the United States for its well-being—and there are many that are dependent primarily upon this market—has a vital stake in policies that we may or may not adopt. We equally are concerned that other countries do not permit depression to develop or follow national policies that would spread depression from other countries to our own. The cost of insulating ourselves against economic disturbances in the rest of the world is too high. Unless all of us are prepared to face permanent international conflict for raw materials and to curtail seriously the opportunity for free individual initiative—indeed, unless we are also willing to risk a sinking standard of living—we have no alternative other than to join together in a mutually advantageous effort to increase the production of all nations and to free markets sufficiently to consume the resulting product. Therefore the United States delegation will recommend that—

"The United Nations should agree in principle that the maintenance within each nation of high levels of employment and national income is a matter of international concern."

The International Labor Organization has been and will continue to be a powerful instrument for social progress. I am proud to have shared in the work in recent years. It is an instrument through which labor and employers have a direct and continuing voice in shaping world social economic development, and as such it will grow in influence in the years of peace that lie ahead.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 19, 1944.

To the Members of the International Labor Conference:

I send you greetings and a warm welcome. We are glad to have you in the United States. It is a privilege to welcome on our soil for the third time a general conference of your great organization.

The conference that opens today is most significant in the annals of international gatherings.

The mere fact that in the tradition of the founders of the International Labor Organization the conference still maintains its distinctive, democratic, tripartite character is in itself of significance.

As part of the regular constitutional machinery of the I. L. O., it also testifies to the vitality of one of the few international organizations which have continued to function throughout the war. The determination on the part of its member states that the I. L. O. should continue its activities during the war years is evidence of the indestructible tenacity of the democratic way of life. As representatives of the practical affairs of these nations—not only of their governments, but also of their workers and employers—you have come together to make plans and recommendations for the continuing improvement of labor standards and for raising the standard of living of the world's people. The task you are undertaking, even at the moment when the tide of war is mounting, bears testimony to the fact that the welfare of the world's population and their liberty are a first and an ultimate concern of those dedicated to root out from this earth every trace of Nazi ideas and Nazi methods.

We know that the conditions of a lasting peace can be secured only through soundly organized economic institutions, fortified by humane labor standards, regular employment, and adequate income for all the people.

Within the field of your activity the United Nations have no need to extemporize a new organization. The ways and means for obtaining this underwriting of a permanent peace are among the items on the agenda of your conference. In your recommendations will lie the foundation of those agreements in the field of labor and social standards which must be part of any permanent international arrangement for a decent world.

The Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, has already publicly announced that the Government of the United States is now working on plans for an international organization to maintain peace. He has also referred to the economic and other cooperative arrangements which must be made in order that the peoples of the world may have the opportunity through their own efforts to improve their material condition.

As part of these plans and international arrangements, I see in the I. L. O. a permanent instrument of representative character for the formulation of international policy on matters directly affecting the welfare of labor and for international collaboration in this field. I see it as a body with the requisite authority to formulate and secure the adoption of those basic minimum standards that shall apply throughout the world to the conditions of employment. As part of these arrangements, also I see in the I. L. O. an organization which shall serve the world for investigation and research, for discussion and debate. But more than that it must be the agency for decision and for action on those economic and social matters related to the welfare of working people which are practical for industry, and designed to enhance the opportunities for a good life for peoples the world over.

It is to the I. L. O. that we shall look as the official international organization where ideas, experience, and movements in the field of labor and social development may find practical and effective expression.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

The following telegram from Secretary of State Hull was read today by Otis E. Mulliken, Acting Chief, Division of Labor Relations, Department of State:

"I am happy to extend my cordial greetings to the twenty-sixth session of the International Labor Conference.

"You are not strangers in this country; your first session held in Washington in 1919 laid historic foundations for your work and your most recent session in New York in 1941 expressed the determination of free peoples the world over to carry this war on to victory and to restore and strengthen the liberty, the dignity, and the inalienable rights of man.

"You are meeting in a city in which many years ago our forefathers met in conference to pioneer these fields. From their debates emerged the Declaration of Independence which proclaimed the self-evident truths that all men are created equal and endowed by their Creator with the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

"A few years later, in another conference in Philadelphia, the Constitution of the United States was framed 'to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty' for themselves and their posterity. Twenty-five years ago the same 'sentiments of justice and humanity' led to the creation of the International Labor Organization. Designed to deal with those labor conditions which involve 'such injustices, hardship, and privation that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled.' The International Labor Organization also was designed as a great pillar in the arch of peace and security. It, too, proclaimed the need of tranquillity and the promotion of the common welfare.

"Just 25 years ago this month a little band of courageous and determined men were busy organizing the first session of this conference which was held in Washington in October 1919.

"No groups have larger stakes in both the economic and social aspects of international cooperation than those represented at the International Labor Conference. We are fortunate indeed to have the machinery of a well-established and experienced organization to facilitate international collaboration in matters directly affecting the interests and problems of employers and workers; the agenda of your present session shows both how far you have progressed and how far we have still to go.

"The interdependence of nations to which this conference draws dramatic attention has been driven home upon us with increasing force. We have learned that deep seated economic and social evils cannot be cured by the action of any one country alone. Accordingly, it is essential this conference should lay down a program which will increase still further the effectiveness of the International Labor Organization in the difficult days to come and to assist us in directing national and international policies to the advancement of the basic and permanent interests of all peoples."

Air Cargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, on March 23, 1944, the Detroit Board of Commerce and Wayne University, under the Edward S. Evans grant for air cargo research, sponsored in the dynamic city of Detroit an inter-American air cargo luncheon.

For the first time, fresh fruits and vegetables, vine- and tree-ripened, were flown from East, West, the South, Mexico, Central and South America to a central point. Despite the difficulties of wartime transportation, this demonstration indicated the post-war possibilities in the transport of fresh produce.

Distinguished guests spoke on the subject of aviation and air cargo transportation. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following speeches delivered at the luncheon. My own address on that occasion appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 31, 1944:

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS AND AIR TRANSPORTATION

(Address by Secretary Claude R. Wickard)

I deem it a great privilege to be accorded this place of honor on your program. I want to congratulate Wayne University, the Detroit Board of Commerce, the United Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Association, the air-transport companies, and others who have helped to make this unique luncheon and meeting possible. Also, I want to congratulate Col. Edward S. Evans, of Detroit, for his foresight and public-spirited interest in making possible the air cargo research fund here at Wayne University.

I believe that my allusion to this luncheon as being unique is entirely fitting. The fact that the very excellent fresh fruits and vegetables, including tropical varieties, served here today were flown to Detroit by cargo airplanes is sufficiently novel and prophetic of things to come to stir the imagination and arouse the interest of all of us. In addition to the delicious flavor and sun-rich color of these tree- and vine-ripened fruits and vegetables, their high-vitamin content is another important factor to consider from the standpoint of our health and general well-being.

Perhaps the radio audience is interested in knowing that we have some tropical foods here that are so rare the aid of the Department of Agriculture was solicited in preparing a special set of recipes for cooking and serving them.

The in-season products of soil, sunshine, and labor on our menu here today were flown in from our own Southern States, from the Southwest, and from the West, while the tropical foods came from the Caribbean area. To most of us this is symbolic of a new milestone in a phenomenal era of transportation progress. To our pioneer forefathers the mere mention of such an achievement would have seemed fantastic, if not miraculous. It staggers the imagination to try to reconstruct in our minds the degree of amazement that would have gripped those plodding surface travelers could they have been given a preview of such an event as this.

The telescoping of time and space presents to us a challenge and an opportunity. It is indeed gratifying to see Wayne University and the Detroit Board of Commerce sponsor this meeting which focuses attention upon a field that offers so many possibilities. I think we will all agree that, through air transport, there is a very real prospect of developing: One, a new and improved method of marketing some of our perishable farm products, benefiting both producers and consumers; and two, a new use for the vastly expanding air industry of this country.

There is an equally important advantage which would accrue to a highly industrialized community, like Detroit, through the development of such a program. The same cargo planes that bring in the perishable fruits and vegetables would, of course, transport industrial goods to the agricultural areas, thus providing a round-trip pay load for the planes and facilitating the exchange of products between rural and urban communities.

The importance to both industry and agriculture of speeding up the exchange of industrial and agricultural products is readily apparent. To agriculture it offers a quicker and surer market for some commodities. Likewise, such an exchange would assist in making available markets for industrial goods and jobs for factory workers, which means purchasing power in the hands of city people. Those of us in agriculture have long been aware of the fact that farm people can't prosper unless city people have the money with which to buy the things farmers produce.

With regard to air shipment of farm products, we realize that perhaps the greatest possibilities for new and more revolutionary developments lie in the post-war period. However, there is one extremely significant fact to bear in mind now. That is: The almost immediate possibility of inaugurating a program for the shipment, by air, of perishable farm products. This prospect is predicated upon the assumption that transport planes as they are now designed and built could be used as they are released from war duty, rather than to wait for newer designs that might be turned out sometime after the war. I am told that some surplus transport planes are already being made available to air lines, and it is reasonable to expect that after the war many more will be available.

An additional advantage, but by no means a secondary one, to consider in connection with the expansion of air transport is the possibility of providing employment for our highly trained pilots, aircraft mechanics, and technical and other personnel for aircraft as they come back from the war. Any development which offers greater use of transport or cargo planes I am sure is welcome news to those valiant airmen who are doing so much in this war.

Since these cargo planes are already being released from war duty it seems plausible to consider seriously the possible results if air-cargo service for the transportation of certain agricultural products were begun at an early date rather than to wait until some indefinite time in the future. We know that the farm commodities best suited, for the present, to air transport are those that demand high speed transit or special care in handling. Certain fruits and vegetables are of this type. If the airplane can get the produce to the consumer in a more palatable and nutritious form the consumer will gain by getting a better product and the producer stands to gain by obtaining a larger income because of the greater demand for his product.

One of the chief factors upon which the success of such a venture on a commercial scale depends is, of course, the comparative costs of air-cargo transportation and surface methods of shipment. In this connection, I should like to call attention to a study, recently published by Wayne University, on the subject Air Cargo Potential in Fresh Fruits and Vegetables. Copies of this report have been distributed to the guests here, and I am sure it offers interesting material for study. I should like to mention also a report on another study, conducted jointly by the Department of Agriculture and Wayne University. This report is called Post-War Possibilities of Air Transportation of Fresh Strawberries and Tomatoes. We realize that, for air transport, strawberries and tomatoes offer perhaps the most promising prospects of any of the perishable foods, but the possibilities are by no means limited to these two commodities. Information or experience gained in connection with strawberries and tomatoes will no doubt be useful in considering the air-shipment possibilities of other fruits and vegetables. Now I should like to report to you briefly some of the highlights of the findings, particularly of the study in which the Department of Agriculture cooperated.

Under conditions assumed in the study the cargo plane would have a pay load of four and a quarter tons of strawberries from Lakeland, Fla., to Detroit, for example, or the same weight of tomatoes from Miami to Detroit. When air-transport costs are compared with the fastest surface methods of transit now being used for these commodities air charges are 6 cents per quart higher for strawberries and the same figure per pound higher for tomatoes.

As now handled, most fresh tomatoes sold at retail during the winter months are picked when green in the field. After being picked green, they are wrapped and shipped to ripening plants in the large northeastern consuming centers. In the ripening plants they are unwrapped, and after ripening, are re-sorted and packed for sale. It is easy to see that by packing the tomatoes directly into consumer packages in the producing area labor costs are reduced and less handling occurs, thereby cutting down on spoilage and waste resulting from bruising in handling. These savings would tend to decrease further the net difference in transportation costs between sky hauling and surface hauling.

Still there is another significant factor to take into account when weighing sky hauling against surface hauling. That is a saving in both time and weight in packaging by using paper containers instead of wooden crates as now required. This may have two significant effects: One, by decreasing the weight of the container, the per-unit cost of transportation is reduced; and the other is that by packaging the food in the area where it is produced into consumer-size packages a saving is effected in labor costs, and waste from spoilage is reduced.

After considering the savings to be gained by air transportation there is reason to believe that tomatoes can be placed on retail counters in the winter season at practically the same price as those transported by surface carriers. They could not successfully compete, of course, with the locally grown, vine-ripened, in-season product.

In considering cargo shipment by air, we should not lose sight of the fact that the principal advantage to be gained, through faster transportation, is in the improvement of the quality of the product as it reaches the consumer. To bring strawberries, for example, from Florida to Detroit by rail express requires a minimum of 3 days, and by rail freight and truck, a minimum of 4 days. Tomatoes take slightly longer. By air, the time required is between 7 and 8 hours.

Think of what this means. Produce may be harvested during the forenoon of one day, precooled in the afternoon, loaded on the plane in the evening, transported overnight to the northern consuming centers and placed in the retail store less than a day after being harvested. This makes it possible to harvest produce in a much more advanced stage of vine or tree ripening with, in most cases, considerable increase in its palatability, vitamin content, and yield per acre.

There is ample reason to believe that movement of produce by air would make a significant contribution to the public welfare, not only from the standpoint of increased satisfaction to be derived from the pleasure of eating a better product but also from the standpoint of improved public health.

The fact that the public has spent tremendously increased amounts of money on vitamin pills in recent years might be an indication that the people would readily appreciate the value of getting more of their vitamins from fresh produce.

We know that vitamin C, for example, is a very important part of our diet. This vitamin, which is needed to build body tissue and bones and to fight infection, is found in abundance in fresh fruits and vegetables. And the fresher these foods are, the higher the vitamin content. Tests show that stored or slow-transit fruits and vegetables lose appreciable amounts of their vitamin C content, particularly at warm temperatures or when the produce is in a bruised condition.

For those who find pleasure in new and different foods, the possibilities of bringing in tropical varieties from the Caribbean area by air offer interesting prospects. In addition to supplementing our supply of perishable foods, this commercial tie-up with our neighbors to the south would, no doubt, do much to strengthen our good-neighbor relationships.

Before closing, I want to make it clear that we realize that the feasibility of this air-cargo-transport idea for perishable foods depends upon the answers to some problems yet to be explored. There are quite a few unknown factors in the practical application of this project. We are aware of the face that it is only through further study and the actual stocking of the produce in stores that a determination can be made as to whether or not the quality of the produce will be sufficiently improved through fast transportation by air to offset any premium in price to the consumer that may exist under actual commercial conditions. Should the optimistic view prove to be true, and the difference between air-and-surface transit charges be eliminated or otherwise entirely compensated for, I believe it is not trite to say that the sky is the limit for the future of farm-produce shipment by air.

As for the farmers of this country, I am sure they will be enthusiastically watching the developments in the air-cargo field. A favorable turn of events along this line could be a great boon to their business—particularly in the post-war period.

Forecast on Air Freight

(Address by E. S. Evans, founder of the Wayne University Research on Air Cargo)

This luncheon marks another milestone in the progress of aviation. The war has made us leapfrog many milestones. But from the standpoint of post-war aviation—and the consumer of air-borne goods—this is probably the most significant milestone since air-cargo transport has been discussed.

Picked Yesterday—Eaten Today

Ripe fruits and fresh vegetables are served here today which only yesterday vibrated on the vine thousands of miles from each other. "Picked yesterday—eaten today" will be the slogan of tomorrow. This marvelous concept in merchandising and transportation is not new. The Incas, at the time of the Spanish conquest of Peru, had fruits and vegetables from the lowlands served on their tables 24 hours after they had been picked in the gardens and orchards a hundred miles away. But the Incas had to depend for these delicacies on fast human runners. Today we look to the heavens for our swift runners, and not only just the favored few, but everyone will be able to enjoy the benefits of air transport.

Air Transport Versus Conventional Methods

The series of studies being made by the Wayne University is giving to the public for the first time a practical basis for more accurate comparison between air-cargo transportation and conventional methods. These studies permit a shipper at a glance to see whether it will pay him to ship by air or otherwise. Air lines can ascertain from these studies what business they can develop at various ton-mile charges. Thus, the whole picture of air-freight transportation takes on a tangible form that it has never had before. The railroads can adjust intelligently by using these charts of probabilities. A businessman can more accurately calculate the potentialities of air cargo. For the first time we can estimate aviation's proper place in cargo transportation.

Dreams and Realities

I have been accused of being an incorrigible optimist where aviation is concerned. In 1929 I had the pleasure of making a speech before the United States Chamber of Commerce in which I said:

"I believe that we are going to see great airliners—perhaps with a speed of 90 miles an hour—carrying 50 to 100 tons which will be used for transporting our freight. Those planes will burn low-priced fuel, and they will transport their freight cheaply enough for the businessmen of the country to use them."

Time has proved how conservative I was.

Conversion of Military Planes Wishful Thinking

I have now been asked to give a forecast on air freight for the radio. To do so, I shall have to debunk some popular conceptions about air cargo. Daily we hear that after the war the Government is going to sell its Liberators and Flying Fortresses for a song, and that buyers expect to convert them to air transport and reap a fortune. This is bunk. It would be like converting a battleship to a tramp steamer and economically just as impracticable. With such a conversion it would be impossible for the operator to meet competition from well-designed new air transports built specifically for cargo carrying.

And more important still, it would be disastrous to the engineering and commercial development of air transport and to the future of the air-cargo business to have the Government's military bombers tossed into the open market. It would be equally dangerous to have the present 15,000 military transports bargained off without the most careful study. Such a procedure would retard aircraft development for a decade. Military transports in limited quantities—some of which were originally taken over from the airlines and converted to military use—should, of course, be utilized to bridge the air transport gap until modern cargo carriers can be built and delivered.

Three Percent Only of Railroad Freight Is Air Candidate

It has also been said that air transports will put the railroads out of business. Bunk! The freight which may be expected ultimately to take to the air totals about 3 percent of that now carried by the railroad. If in the next 5 years or so aviation can "woo" 1 percent of this total freight, it will mark great progress in air transport.

AIR-CARGO TRANSPORTATION STILL IN INFANCY

To make a fair comparison of air transportation with the railroads, we have to go back to about 1850, when the railroads were still struggling with their engineering and operational difficulties. Today, in 1944, airplanes as a means of freight transportation are at about the same level of progress that the railroads were in 1850, or trucking was in 1915.

AIRPLANE DEVELOPMENT INEVITABLE—FUEL, GLIDER TRAINS, ETC.

To meet rail competition the airplane must improve in many categories. For instance, the use of Diesel motors, which would reduce the fuel cost of planes by about 80 percent. The Germans have used Diesel airplane engines for a long time. The Packard Motor Car Co. in the late twenties, under Captain Woolson, produced a small Diesel engine weighing about 1 pound to the horsepower, which flew successfully. His death stopped the development. The jet propulsion engine doesn't burn 100-octane gasoline. I am told it can operate on a comparatively cheap fuel mixture. Further progress in cheaper fuel should be expected.

In the field of gliders we have yet to build a locomotive of the air designed properly for the glider-train operation. Gliders, as freight cars of the future, are still in their infancy, and they lend themselves to many economies that have not yet been tried.

SHIPS VERSUS PLANES

I have been quoted as saying that ocean liners such as the Normandie or Queen Mary probably will never be built again. I believe this is true, but that flying boats will sweep the seas of cargo-carrying ships—that is bunk.

Ships are able to carry cargo for one-tenth of 1 cent a ton-mile, but seaplanes or large airplanes may never get their costs below 2 cents a ton-mile. Such a differential precludes the elimination of surface vessels. Flying boats, of which the Mars of today is only a small sample, will, according to Glenn Martin, carry 40 percent more net cargo than land planes of the same size, and, of course, will be able to alight on either ocean or inland waters. This is a field yet unexplored.

SEPARATE CARGO AND PASSENGER AIRPORTS NEEDED

We should have in the United States in all post-war commercial centers well-equipped cargo airports separate from passenger airports, and at all major crossroads there should be landing strips which can be used by small planes or in an emergency by large ones.

AIRPLANES OF TOMORROW

Let's be realistic about the present but optimistic about the future. Today we are only at the beginning of the development of air transport. I look forward to a tomorrow which will see jet propulsion airplanes flying at 550 miles an hour or more in the substratosphere, and at hardly less speed, with great cargo-carrying capacity, the flying wing. The glider freight train will fill a gap in air transportation because a glider can take smaller loads and by adding or subtracting gliders to the train adjustment can be made with greater economy to cargo demands. The cargo-carrying capacity of the helicopter will be consigned to the family shopping tour or suburban deliveries.

I remember my father telling me when I was a little boy that my grandfather was approached by Mr. Howe who wanted to sell him stock in a company for the making of sewing machines, and my grandfather decided that it was a foolish idea and that no woman would ever give up her needle for some gadget of a machine. My father regretfully told me that if his father had put a few hundred dollars in Mr. Howe's company he would have gotten returns of over a million dollars.

Let's not discount the air possibilities of the future.

FLYING CARGO

(Address by L. Welch Pogue, Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board)

In undertaking a series of studies in air transport, Wayne University and the Detroit Board of Commerce are to be most heartily congratulated in presenting the first of the series on air cargo potential in fresh fruits and vegetables. Here we have another of those commendable unions of business enterprise and educational institutions for the purpose of working out common-sense answers to new questions. Professor Larsen and his staff, working under the Edward S. Evans grant for air-cargo research, have pioneered in a new, a vital, and a very promising field. It is, and will be, common sense to ship by air if to do so makes money; and I have a very deep-seated feeling that, as further progress is made, there will be more and more flying cargo.

This study on air cargo potential in fresh fruits and vegetables has, as I understand it, a most commendable objective. Many studies are merely an analysis of what can be done under existing transportation rates and practices. Air transportation is obviously so young that it is unwise to cling to the rates and practices of a given moment. The approach in this study is to show what movements by air might be expected to occur in the field of selected commodities at varying rates. Thus it becomes possible to show the manufacturer, the operator, the shipper, and the consumer what can be done under varying operating conditions. If an operator then can show a manufacturer that if he can make an airplane which will carry a certain volume of a certain product at a stated cost, the manufacturer will have a new meaning given to his purpose and the operator can make his business plans accordingly. This is an approach calculated to permit the intelligent planning for future business expansion.

Merchandising by air is a subject about which you will hear a great deal from time to time in the future. The rates charged for the actual transportation are by no means the only things which the shipper must appraise in determining whether to ship by air. Incidentally, those rates are coming down very drastically and as they fall the volume of flying cargo will rise. I will mention only a few things which, in addition to the rates, relate to the pocketbook.

New markets will be available to perishables; new opportunities will be created for the marketing of goods whose salability depends upon timeliness. These are all important fields for flying cargo, but I am speaking primarily of types of savings. Packing can be less expensive, because it need not be so heavy as when shipping by rail or truck. If it is not so heavy, the transportation rates apply to a smaller-weight base. Much handling can be eliminated in many cases because an airplane can go directly from anywhere to anywhere. Breakage and spoilage will be reduced and, in many cases, eliminated. Insurance will be saved because the risk may be less and the time of coverage is drastically reduced. Inventories can be reduced when a consumer market is within hours rather than days and weeks of the wholesaler or middleman. In some cases, capital goods can be eliminated because one plant can serve a wider territory. Refrigeration, where required, may possibly be provided by nature, absolutely free, at 10,000, 15,000, 20,000 or more feet altitude, depending upon how cold you want the cargo to be. There are probably many other items that have to be analyzed before we can get the pocketbook answer as to whether the article can profitably be shipped by air.

I am not one of those who thinks that the airplane is going to eliminate the railroad and the steamship from the cargo field. It would not be hard to persuade me, on the other hand, that the principal impetus of air cargo will be in the development of new markets, and I can easily see how the shrinkage of the world by air transportation might result in such an acceleration of new market activity as actually to increase the cargo business of the steamship lines and the railroads. I say these things are possibilities; no one can be sure. I am reminded in this connection that it was thought as late as 1850 that railroads could not compete with waterways and canals except where speedy carriage was essential. I repeat, therefore, that however pleasant it may be to indulge in prophecy, the making of careful analytical studies showing what commodities will move at stated costs, is the practical and sensible way to get on with the development of flying cargo. I congratulate you and wish for you a succession of achievements in your studies.

THE AIRPORT AND YOUR COMMUNITY

(Address by Charles I. Stanton, Administrator of Civil Aeronautics)

In aviation, the impossible has a habit of becoming a reality overnight. Only 3 years ago, men who prophesied 1,000-bomber raids on Berlin were looked on as good candidates for the job of authoring comic strips. Today this "impossibility" has moved to the front page. At about the same time, the President's call for 100,000 planes a year was termed fantastic. Today the assembly lines are rolling them out at this "impossible" rate, and an increasing proportion of our output is made up of heavy bombers rather than light training or fighter planes.

You can see why it's risky to attempt forecasts in the aviation business. Such amazing things do happen that you're tempted to offer wild guesses. On the other hand, conservative estimates are dangerous, because any development programs based on them may be made obsolete by rapid aviation progress.

Now that aviation is our leading industry, with production valued at $20,000,000 a year, everybody realizes its importance to the future national economy, and you'll find self-appointed experts on the subject everywhere you turn. I hesitate to join this company. I admit I don't know all the answers. But as spokesman for the Civil Aeronautics Administration, I do feel it my duty to put forward a few suggestions based on the 17 years' experience of C. A. A. and its predecessor agencies in this field.

During that time we have made our share of mistakes and, I hope, learned something from them. We have also watched others make mistakes, and have learned a few lessons in this way. One phase of aviation in which mistakes have been plentiful enough to teach us quite a bit for future use is that of airports.

We have seen the creation of what were thought to be de luxe airports, only to find that advancements in aircraft construction made necessary longer approach paths and runways, while the growth of the surrounding metropolitan area made such extension impossible.

In other cases, we have seen airports so placed that the trip through surface traffic from airport to town wastes much of the time saved in traveling by air.

Where the city has been lucky enough to get its airport properly located—and too often this has been a matter of luck rather than planning—there may have been a lack of foresight in the provision of terminal buildings, hangars, and other facilities which supplement the landing areas themselves. The results, if not the cause, are readily apparent to the traveler, in such forms as time lost in way-billing him and getting his baggage off and on planes.

Today, our cities do not seem to be heading for a repetition of these mistakes, which were largely the result of underestimating the aviation potential. If anything, they are leaning toward building airports of size and cost, which take very strong imagination to justify.

I am not so much worried about possible overbuilding, however, as I am about the fact that many of us are too ready to go ahead and build without adequate attention to over-all planning. We may not repeat the specific mistakes of the twenties and thirties, but if we follow the basic mistake of allowing our airports to "jes' grow", like Topsy, we are bound to have trouble.

Airplanes move so fast, and there are so many of them even now, that we cannot, with safety, plan even the smallest airport, unless we take the broadest view of the sky traffic involved in a wide surrounding area.

Thus you can see that the air space affected by an airport is far greater than the ground area. In the case of certain locations in Detroit, for example, air space of both Canada and the United States is involved. An airport in the New York City area may affect the air space over two States.

Problems of this kind begin to arise when you talk of only one airport. Imagine the complications when you undertake to spot half a dozen or more fields in and around a big city, as you will have to do to accommodate private and commercial post-war traffic.

It is evident that if new airports are not to create traffic tangles they must be built in accordance with a comprehensive national plan. That is not to say airport building must be the exclusive domain of the Federal Government. The C. A. A. is not making a bid for bureaucratic aggrandizement.

We are merely offering to cities, counties, States, and other potential airport sponsors the benefit of our experience and advice. In the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 Congress directed the Administrator to make a Nation-wide survey of airport needs. Such a study was made and submitted, and in 1940 Congress made its first direct appropriation to the C. A. A. for airport construction, allotting $40,000,000. Since then we have been authorized to spend a total of $400,000,000 on airfields. All of this, however, was available for expenditure on airports which were certified as necessary for national defense by a board consisting of the Secretaries of War, Navy, and Commerce.

In this period of a little more than 3 years the C. A. A. program has been responsible for the construction or substantial improvement of 519 airports. We have increased the number of airports suitable for airline operation from 94 at the end of 1940 to 1,085 at the end of 1943. In the course of this work we have achieved many technical advances in matters of soil stability, paving materials and methods, drainage, and other problems of airport construction which, even though basic, had not been fully explored.

The program we are now completing is guided, as you probably know, by needs of the Army and Navy, with possible post-war use a deciding factor when there is a choice among sites which meet military requirements. Thanks to this program we now have about 3,000 airports, contrasted with some 2,300 at the end of 1940.

As we near the point where the needs of the armed services are satisfied, it is in order to look around us and determine whether the post-war needs of air commerce will also be adequately met by this net work of airports. The Civil Aeronautics Administration has been bringing up-to-date its survey of our national airport requirements, and we find that it will probably be necessary to double the present number of fields to accommodate the expected air traffic of the early post-war years. That is, we will need about 6,000 ports by 1950.

This immediately raises questions of concern to all. How is such an airport system to be build and financed? Should the job be undertaken by the Federal Government? Or by the State governments? Or by local authorities? Or by a combination of all three?

A major question of policy is involved here—one that you and the electorate of the country will soon be called upon to make, speaking through your duly elected representatives in the Congress.

I suggest that the Federal Government and the State governments become partners in building the Nation's post-war civil airports system in general accord with principles worked out in building our national highway system—admittedly the best in the world. If the President and the Congress authorize a Federal-aid airport program, funds could be apportioned to the States by the C. A. A. upon the basis of some accepted formula. Such a formula, we believe, should take account of four factors—(1) the area, (2) population, (3) number of registered aircraft, and (4) the existing number of accredited airports in each State. As in the Federal highway system, each State would have to match a specified percentage of its quota of Federal funds.

Airport improvements or construction projects would be selected and carried out by the State's own aviation agency. Only projects fitting the national airport plan would be eligible for Federal aid, and C. A. A. standards for location, lay-out, and construction for the class of airport proposed would have to be met.

Whatever agency finances and builds airports, a mass of advance planning will be necessary. In order that such material will be available without delay when the need arises, the C. A. A., in cooperation with State and local planning groups where they exist, has already begun studies leading toward preparation of a systematic plan for airports. We have had excellent results working locally with the Michigan Board of Aeronautics, in the persons of Thomas Walsh and George Roff.

As I have indicated, planning of buildings and other facilities is almost as important as planning of the landing areas themselves, and the C. A. A. has also started work compiling information in this field for the benefit of interested users. We entered this field because we found that while architects and engineers designing buildings for special purposes ordinarily have access to data compiled over a period of years of periodicals, book publishers, and others, such information was not available on airport terminals, highly specialized as they are.

Our airport building design unit is not ready, at this time, to offer suggestions, but is gathering information on existing airports and ideas from those experienced in airport operation. In this manner we hope to compile and analyze a fund of specific information that will enable us to advise communities what facilities their airport buildings should contain, what space these facilities require, and what relation they must have to each other to function efficiently.

Throughout this study, the importance of flexibility will be emphasized. Remembering that many cities once planned what seemed adequate airport buildings only to find them outmoded even before they were completely occupied, we will attempt to anticipate the possible needs of any airport over a period of years, and suggest building in such a manner as to provide for future expansion.

We hope to provide assistance on two other phases of airport planning to communities desiring it. Already under way is a study of airport management experience, from which we hope to assemble methods proven successful in keeping airports out of the red, a color which has marked their account books more often than not.

In the near future we also intend to begin a survey of the place of airports in community planning. It is obvious that airports have a close relationship to every phase of city growth. Proper integration with the local road system, for example, would provide a fast route from the airport to town, instead of forcing the air traveler to waste perhaps an hour's time crawling through heavy automobile traffic.

There are many more phases of city planning which are important to airport development. As aviation grows, we can expect to see the creation of multiple airports to serve varied community needs. Speaking hypothetically, for I have made no study of the situation here, Detroit in 1950 might need two or more terminals for air-line passengers, mail and air cargo, and perhaps twice as many for local private and commercial flying. Study might show the need for still a third type of port, a downtown landing place for commuters or others using helicopters. These really are city planning problems which need to be tackled.

I believe I have said enough to indicate how vital a role planning plays in sound airport development. We in Civil Aeronautics Administration stand ready to offer to all who want it every assistance within our power (and funds) in making and carrying through such plans.

GLOBAL EATING

(Address of Miss Eloise Davison, director, New York Herald Tribune Home Institute)

This is a history-making occasion. Four countries and eight air lines, extending from Canada to South America, have cooperated with Wayne University and the Detroit Board of Commerce to make possible this air-borne luncheon and demonstration.

Vine- and tree-ripened fruits and vegetables, some of which were picked only yesterday thousands of air miles away—still sweet, fresh, and almost warm from tropical sunshine—have been transported in commercial-sized shipments for the first time.

Five of our great growing States—lush California, sunny Texas, tropical Florida, Arizona, and good old reliable Pennsylvania—home of the Liberty Bell and the mushroom—have sent their most epicurean harvest for this event.

From Mexico, Central and South America, have been flown exotic fruits and vegetables once too perishable to ship.

Gathered here today are those whose decisions and enthusiasms are bound to have a far-reaching effect on every home. Here are air-line executives and aircraft manufacturers who are shaping the sky roads of tomorrow. Here are produce leaders who have entered enthusiastically into the post-war picture to bring new variety to tomorrow's dinner table.

If you could see the tropical picture this crystal room makes with its tables laden with exhibitions of unusual fruits and vegetables from the Caribbean and from far places in our own country, you would see the native fruits and vegetables in the form of model cargo planes.

The Imperial Valley of California has sent a glider, suggesting the glider freight train of the future out of compliment to Col. Edward S. Evans, father of gliding and founder of the Wayne University research on air cargo.

From Florida comes a flying boat made of strange and delicious fruits and vegetables.

The speakers are wearing leis of white, pink, and purple flowers with pendants of white orchids.

Before me is an orange filled with a mousse in which figs, dates, California walnuts and Brazil nuts make a happy alliance. This delicious concoction is called mousse tropicana.

When Colonel Evans, pioneer in air transportation established the Edward S. Evans grant for air cargo research, little did he think he would be pioneering in global vegetable plates and fruit cocktails.

This air cargo he brings today shows what the air age can really do to change our standards of eating.

Sigh if you will for the "good old days." Not me. We are on the threshold of a new era in eating. This luncheon today in aviation parlance is the "take-off." As the world shrinks in distance because of air transport, our habits and our dinner tables expand to become more cosmopolitan.

Our post-war vegetable plate may include hearts of palms from the South Pacific with chayotes from Guatemala—an exotic squash served here today. Dasheens from Florida—rich in starch—will alternate with the local potato. And, carrots for good eyesight in the air age when we shall all be driving helicopters and skycars (we hope).

The good-neighbor cocktail of tomorrow served here for the first time today contains mangosteen, said to be the most choice food in the world. Today's first cup will be manna dropped from the skies unto many post-war dinner tables. It has a juicy rose-tinted or creamy pulp divided orangewise and tasted to me today like a heavenly combination of pineapple, grape, peach, and strawberry.

Chayote, loquat, cassava, platin—it sounds like poetry—or a Berlitz course—they mean squash, plum, and baking banana. These are only a few of the exotic air candidates for our tables from Latin America in reciprocity for our good North American produce in the age of air to come.

But now alas! Time compels me to come to the end of this drool story.

THE FUTURE OF AIR TRANSPORT FOR FRESH FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

(Address by William Garfitt, executive vice president, United Fresh Fruit & Vegetable Association)

If there is any truth in the old saying that important events cast their shadows before them—and who can doubt its truth—this meeting is being held in the shadow of the greatest development in civilian transportation philosophy the world has ever known. For, were we not on the threshold of a mighty revolution in thinking and planning for the future transport of men and goods, this assemblage would never have been called together.

I have listened with rapt absorption to what our Secretary of Agriculture has said, not only because he has tempered his prophesies with the wisdom of sound experience, but because the future he looks forward to is the same future to which our millions of growers, and our thousands of distributors, also aspire. What we seek is merely a quicker, safer, more economical method of moving perishable commodities from their fields and groves to the kitchens of our hungry people.

The nature of Secretary Wickard's organization needs no explanation. Perhaps, however, ours will be better understood at a time like this for a few words about its functions and responsibilities. The United Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Association is a nonprofit organization of growers, growers' sales agent, shippers, and wholesale distributors of perishable-soil products. It has members in each of the 48 States, the District of Columbia, the provinces of Canada, and the Republic of Mexico.

Though it neither produces, buys, nor sells the products of nature with which it is concerned, it is interested in every phase of production and distribution, from the time the seed goes into the ground or the sapling is planted, until the product is ready for consumption in some market place a thousand or more miles from the spot wherein it was grown. Therefore, as with the United States Department of Agriculture, transportation is one of its constant and most absorbing problems.

How sincerely interested our people are in such a project as this can be judged in a measure by the brilliant display of winter-grown semitropical and exotic fruits and vegetables which have turned this meeting place into a veritable garden, and which have made today's repast a pleasant preview of what our senses may enjoy at all seasons of the year, as soon as air transport really comes of age.

We are indebted to Pan American, Eastern, Pennsylvania Central, American, Braniff, Chicago & Southern, and Transcontinental & Western airlines for flying these dozens of gorgeous exhibits thousands of miles in order that we may feast the eye, as well as the inner man, on this memorable occasion. These token shipments have been handled under most difficult wartime conditions as a foreshadow of what the future may hold for our industry.

We are also indebted to the thousands of growers and shippers who compose the Florida Citrus Commission, the Florida Vegetable Committee, the Texas Citrus and Vegetable Growers & Shippers Association, the Western Growers Association of Arizona and California—and other individuals and groups—for their cooperation in assembling and shipping these commodities that we may gain a clearer vision of the shape of things to come.

And while I am on the subject of acknowledgments, I wish to pay special tribute to Drs. Spencer A. Larsen and Jerome Thomas; to their associates in the splendid work being reported today; and to their chief sponsor, Mr. Edward S. Evans, for choosing fruits and vegetables as the subject of their painstaking research. We feel they have chosen wisely, as there is probably no class of freight commodities more likely to provide a substantial, year-round air tonnage than these products of nature.

Though I may sound unduly critical of what I shall refer to as the slide-rule method of projecting our industry into its air-borne future, I hope Dr. Larsen and his industrious aides will accept what I shall say merely as evidence of our eagerness to see our future course plotted by actual experience rather than by drawing-board projections. For any seeming criticism in my remarks, I apologize in advance to our hosts in general, and to Dr. Larsen in particular.

Secretary Wickard has mercifully spared his audience a great deal of the statistical side of his Department's responsibilities. I shall try to be as sparing. But, to those of you who occupy the consumer's seat in this parade of facts and prophecy, I think it justifiable to lift the curtain and give you a brief glimpse behind the scenes of one of the greatest branches of American industry—a branch which is so universally taken for granted that few laymen ever stop to give it more than a passing thought.

If I told you that the commercial production of fruits and vegetables for marketing in their fresh and natural state amounts yearly to something like 1,300,000 carloads, you might still have a rather nebulous vision of our business. But when I tell you that this vast quantity, if coupled into a single train of 44-foot refrigerators cars, would be 27,500 miles long, or one and one-tenth times round the earth—our business begins to look really big.

It should not be surprising, therefore, that the commercial grower and the terminal market distributor of fresh fruits and vegetables is keenly interested in any new or improved method of transportation. Our products must of necessity be grown where Nature is most generous. They must be marketed also of necessity where people live in the largest numbers. And there is an average distance of 1,400 miles between our chief areas of production and our chief centers of consumption.

As in the past, the bulk of our commodities will probably continue to move by surface transportation in the more than 125,000 refrigerator cars now plying back and forth over our quarter-million miles of railroad and in the thousands of motortrucks which will again infest our public highways, once the war is won, and tires, gasoline, and drivers again become plentiful. For the most part, I believe, fresh fruits and vegetables will continue to be surface-borne as long as railroads and highways continue to exist.

Perhaps some air enthusiasts will disagree with this prediction. Perhaps some have visions of the airways putting our railways virtually out of the long-distance-hauling business. And perhaps they are right, but I have yet to meet a thoughtful or experienced transportation authority who believes that more than a small percentage of all perishable freight will ever take to the air, though even a small percentage of it will give our air lines all they can handle for some years to come.

To illustrate, more than 600,000 carloads, or carload equivalents, of fresh fruits and vegetables are unloaded yearly in 63 of our consuming markets. These arrivals amount to nearly 10,000,000 tons. I am using Department of Agriculture figures. Now, with the maximum capacity of transport planes likely to be available at the war's close limited to 4.2 tons of net freight, it would take more than 14,000 airships each flying 3 weekly round trips to supply these 63 cities with all their fruits and vegetables.

But let us narrow the illustration down to a few cities for the sake of simplicity. Take New York as a classical example. This largest of all markets consumes yearly about 146,000 carloads—or more than 2,000,000 tons—of fresh fruits and vegetables. Based on 4.2 tons of pay load per cargo plane, this would mean more than 520,000 plane loads a year—or 1 landing at LaGuardia Field each 52 seconds, day and night, 6 days a week, 52 weeks a year.

To come a little nearer home, let us look at our second largest market—Chicago—which unloads more than 62,000 carloads of produce yearly. This is close to 1,000,000 tons—nearly 222,000 plane loads. Consequently, Chicago's municipal airport would have to accommodate only 710 plane arrivals each 24 hours—1 in every 2⅓ minutes. At that, I wonder where the passengers and mail would find space to land.

Now, let us take your own city of Detroit as our last illustration. This city gets along in normal years with a few more than 20,000 cars of green groceries. What its wartime population consumes is anybody's guess. However, Detroit's relatively small produce volume adds up to the sum of more than 300,000 tons a year, and this would mean more than 72,000 plane loads—1 every 6¾ minutes, 24 hours a day, 6 days a week, 52 weeks a year.

These figures are not pulled out of a hat. They are realistic calculations based on known data. I give them, not to discourage those who may be gazing at the sky as the arena of our next adventure in transportation—though the sky certainly has its limits—but as a caution that we will never get our commodities, or any considerable tonnage of them, up into the air until we learn to keep our feet on the ground. As I have said, we are facing a revolution in transportation philosophy; but not, in my opinion, the complete reversal of methods some air enthusiasts vision.

And, as Secretary Wickard has said, many commodities are now candidates for air transport. You would not doubt this if you had heard as I have in many conferences among fruit and vegetable men such questions as: "When will our transportation system be improved? When will we be relieved of this snail's-pace, 17-miles-an-hour movement of our refrigerator car trains? When can we be sure a 7-day schedule will not take 14 days? When will we escape the cost of precooling and icing? Will air transport solve all these problems for us?"

Gentlemen, I sincerely believe that air transport will solve some of them; that it will go a long way toward helping to solve others; but I believe it will never come into its own—will never earn an enviable place as a carrier of freight—until it ceases looking upon itself as a novel, romantic, and totally different mode of transportation, and begins psychoanalyzing itself from the standpoint of what it can contribute as a part—not as the whole—of a national transportation system.

If there are any among our air-minded friends who look upon the post-war era as an opportunity to rush in and nail down private air-transport monopolies, I am afraid they are relying too much upon the time-honored philosophy which has been applied to all pioneering enterprises in the past. That is, the man who gets there first and stakes out the first claim is entitled to perpetual rights in the area he has preempted for himself. I shall try to demonstrate that this thing is too big for any such preemption.

On the other hand, if some aircraft manufacturer is secretly developing designs for a cargo ship which will blitz the industry after the war by putting into the air a type of carrier—protected by exclusive patents, to be sure—which will make all other transport planes obsolete overnight, I doubt very much that he will come out with a cargo carrier which will turn his plant into another Pullman Standard Car Co. of the air with exclusive rights to manufacture or operate essential air-carrying equipment.

Gentlemen, I ask you in all sincerity, do you think anything like that will be possible? And, if it is possible, will it be permitted under the necessities of national security? For, unless we realize that the greatest impetus like to be put behind post-war commercial air transport will be that of national security, we are bound to leave this meeting, and many like it, only to awaken with a sudden jolt to the fact that, while we have been planning one thing the world has been planning something entirely different.

It is said—and with perfect justification—that this Nation will come out of World War No. 2, not only with the greatest aircraft-production plant on earth—equal, no doubt, to all other nations combined—but with the greatest trained flying, operating, and manufacturing personnel. And it is reasonable to suppose that thousands of competent young fliers and technicians will want to remain in a field in which they have received their training. There will be no lack of skilled personnel after the war—but how can it be used to the best advantage?

Commercial air transport will profit tremendously from concentrated war experience. No other industry has ever inherited such enormous impetus from the sacrifice of human lives—from the lavishing of billions upon the altar of trial and error, of waste, and destruction. Brilliant planning and leadership have made this the greatest military air power on earth. Our civilian planning and leadership must be equally brilliant and objective if our air future is to realize its destiny.

The smartest aircraft designers and operators will be those whose plans are most adaptable—not merely those whose plans are most opportune. The aeronautical industry has brilliant prospects if it establishes a reputation for stability, conservatism, and restraint. If it attracts as its leaders men of the caliber of Arnold, Spaatz, King, Doolittle, Rickenbacker, and Chenault, it will not have to fall back upon private monopolies to win the respect of its Government and its public.

There will also be no lack of support on our Government's part in keeping its thousands of heroic young pilots, navigators, ground crews, and grease monkeys gainfully employed at the jobs they know best. Any nation which lets its trained air personnel go to seed after the war unless forced to do so by the peace treaty—will be as guilty of courting self-destruction as were our politicians of another day who disbanded our Army, grounded our Air Force, and scuttled our Navy in the fond delusion that we had just ended the war to end all wars.

Gentlemen, I believe we can look to whatever administration this Nation has after the present war to be more realistic in the matter of national security than was our previous post-war Government. With this belief firmly in mind, I look forward to the coming post-war period as one in which air transportation will be developed under Government supervision—and possibly with Government financial aid—not as something to be tossed up for grabs, but as a means of national security first, and private gain second.

Radical though such a prediction may sound to a group of American businessmen, it is not as radical as it seems, for our country will have no choice in the matter, if it hopes to keep pace with the rest of the world in the domination of that one medium of transportation which has proved more valuable in warfare than any other—the air. So, whether we like it or not, we shall have to look to our Government to encourage, supervise, and control, as never before, our future use of the skies.

Our railroads and our highways serve incidental military uses, but the airplane is supreme as a future instrument of defense and attack. This, therefore, is bound to be our national and international policy of the air: We will send passengers and cargoes into the stratosphere bound for every home and foreign port. But, if another gangster nation—or any combination of gangster nations—is looking for soft picking, we will put the bombardier and the machine gunner back into our flying boxcars.

Our post-war commercial air policies must be closely integrated with military necessities. Our commercial air transport must be convertible instantly to the maintenance of international peace, just as commercial shipping must be convertible into a merchant marine. As this is bound to be the decision of our own and our allies' statesmen, our job will be to have the best and most effective flying forces in the world, devoted—if you please—to commercial uses, but convertible to defense.

I believe our people are to practical to be much interested in the romantic side of aviation. Though they are among the most enthusiastic patrons of air travel, they use it only because they find it more saving of their time. They cannot, therefore, be expected to take a great deal of interest in the air transport of their commodities, unless such air transport is made a part of a national transportation system, and not merely a new and romantic mode of moving cargoes from place to place.

Though we have been greatly confused by the mass of contradictory opinions and ambitions which have been poured in upon us, I believe our industry has in mind one fairly definite development it would like to see put into effect: That is, something closely resembling our present refrigerator car services—a refrigerator line of the air, if you please—a service whereby cargo carriers can be made available at any time and in any place where commodities need quick shipment.

I do not mean, necessarily, the construction of special refrigerated planes capable of carrying no other freight, for we do not know at this time whether refrigeration, pre-cooling, or many of the other factors of surface transportation will be needed when our commodities are taken into the air. I mean, merely, that any system—and I emphasize the word "system"—of air transport in which our industry can be expected to take much interest must have as its foundation the one prime requisite—flexibility.

There is still a tremendous amount of spade work to be done before we can begin offering the airplane as a substitute for—or even an auxiliary to—the railroad freight car. Your engineers and aerodynamic researchers have still a long way to go before the aeronautical industry will have much to sell. Will we require refrigeration? Can pre-cooling be eliminated? Is a different type of shipping container needed? Are terminal airports conveniently located?

All these and many more technical nuts will have to be cracked before you can say to us, "Here it is. Use it." And, until some of the problems have been solved by actual, practical flying tests, I believe it may be largely a waste of time to project by slide-rule and comptometer the percentage of this commodity or that commodity which is likely to move by air at this ton-mile rate or that ton-mile rate. In this great guessing game the $64 question is, "Will it work?"

Which reminds me to close with a little business parable—one that may appeal to you as having a slight parallel, at least, with the present tendency to project our air-cargo potential in the mathematics classroom, instead of in the element it proposes to invade. The story I am about to tell is not intended to be facetious. It is intended, rather, to emphasize a necessity concerning which I am sure you are already thinking. For what it may be worth in such a discussion, here it is:

The sporting goods buyer of a large department store received a sample shipment of rubber balls, whereupon he went to the merchandise manager to decide what to do about laying in a stock. Together they went to the big boss, who promptly called a conference of the advertising manager, the advertising agency, the sales manager, the traffic manager, the head window dresser, the display manager, and several others in the hope that together they could decide upon a promotional campaign for the new item.

After the conference had gone on for several hours without getting anywhere an office boy, who happened to pass through the room, asked, "Is the darn thing any good?" Thereupon the big boss turned to the merchandising manager and said, "George, we've overlooked that little detail. Hire the best research organization you can find and have this ball given the acid test. Spare no expense. Make it thorough. This great institution can't afford to promote an article about which it is in the slightest doubt."

So several research experts were called and the best of them was given the job of analyzing the rubber ball. Several weeks later he was ready to report, and the same group of executives was again called into conference. "We have put this ball through every conceivable test," said the laboratory chief. "We have tested it for weight, specific gravity, tensil strength, moisture absorption, heat resistance, spherosity, color, compression, purity, and 57 other indices. And here is our bill for $2,731.62 for making these exhaustive tests."

Impressed by this mass of scientific data, the store executives sat in silent awe. At that moment, however, the self-same office boy happened to pass through the room again. Glancing contemptuously, first at the ball and then at the assembled department heads, he asked, "If you want to find out whether that danged thing is any good, why the heck don't you try bouncing it?" With that he took a long drink of the water cooler and passed on about his business.

And that, gentlemen, is my parting query. If you want to find out whether air transport is any good in the movement of any part of 19,500,000 million tons of fresh fruits and vegetables, why the heck don't you try bouncing a few sample plane loads around the country? I think such tests will prove the practicability of air transport. But I am equally convinced that its practicability cannot be determined in the laboratory of the mathematics classroom.

Quite an Expenditure for Doubtful Need But May Be Justified as Precaution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, on roll call vote today on the Dewey resolution to provide a House committee of investigation to examine into the matter of the seizure by our armed forces of the Montgomery Ward properties in Chicago, I felt constrained to vote "yes," but with no enthusiasm. It is difficult for me to see the need for the House to appoint such a committee and to go to that amount of expense, as the Senate has already taken some such action, even going further than the House committee is authorized to go.

It is true that such is our duty as a Congress, not only to write the laws but to see that they are properly administered without permitting authority to be usurped or laws maladministered. However, in this case I think that a committee of one House might have been sufficient. Again, while this is in line with our congressional duty and obligations, I feel that in this particular case it is of doubtful propriety because the matter has already been referred to the courts. It is also the duty of Congress to avoid exercising the judicial function, or interferring with the judicial function. If the military has gone beyond its legal authority the courts of the land are authorized to speak and no doubt will do so.

Yes; we in Congress are obligated to protect the rights of property and also the rights of private citizens, but if a bull headed business executive of such a large establishment as Montgomery Ward is motivated by his private peeves into such actions as will jeopardize the national safety in time of war, it may become a close question as to which obligations are greatest and which rights most demand protection. Montgomery Ward's property rights are distinctly secondary to the rights and welfare of the American Nation in time of war—a situation which a congressional investigation may reveal. It is, then only as a precaution against the abuse of executive power—which I seriously doubt this is—that I can consent to vote what otherwise seems a useless expenditure.

Land Erosion in Oklahoma

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, the State of Oklahoma has 44,341,120 acres within its boundaries. Of this vast amount of land a little in excess of 8,000,000 acres are classified as timberland; 1,667,763 acres are in meadow; 10,210,000 acres are in pasture; and there are 13,854,290 acres which are in cultivation.

Erosion has already played a disastrous role in Oklahoma and has caused 1,854,069 acres to be abandoned from cultivation. There are not figures available to show how many acres in pasture have eroded beyond their usefulness.

One million five hundred and forty thousand acres of tillable lands are affected by blow sand. There are approximately 795,000 acres which need protection by levees—430,880 acres could profitably be irrigated.

To accomplish this great task of alleviating and repairing damage would require the following: Terracing on 9,000,000 acres, regrassing and reseeding on 4,900,000 acres, construction of 170,000 farm ponds, construction of 8,500 small lakes, construction of 3,400 miles of drainage ditches, construction of 6,000 miles of levees, construction of 62,000 trench silos and adequate irrigation laterals and canals to serve 430,006 acres.

To do this job it is estimated that an expenditure of $175,000,000 would be required over a period of 15 years.

A total of 4,500,000 acres are planned for conservation treatment and 2,500,000 acres have already been established in soil-conservation practices. To treat the unprotected land so that it can be used permanently and profitably, these quantities of labor, equipment, and materials are among the resources expected to be required: 5,000,000 man-days of skilled labor; 26,000,000 man-days of unskilled labor; 4,000,000 man-days of assistance by experienced technicians; 3,500,000 days of work with light tractors; 600,000 days of work with heavy tractors; 23,000,000 days of work with horse-drawn equipment; 155,000,000 seedling trees for windbreaks, shelter belts, and post plantings; 104,000 miles of fences.

In terms of units of construction equipment, it will require the following for the State of Oklahoma to do the soil-conservation job ahead of it:

Tractors	1,033
Graders (large)	665
Graders (small)	1,000
Fresnos	1,700
Power shovels and drag lines	600
Trucks	1,400
Pick-up trucks	1,500
Centrifugal pumps	400
Road-patrol machines	500
Scarifiers	340
Sheep-foot rollers	300
Concrete mixers	500
Brush mowers	1,134
Grass seeders	2,000
Bulldozers	835
Carry-alls	370
Limespreaders	350
Terracers	114
Land levelers	50
Fertilizer attachments	245
Air compressors and drills	400

Also a great amount of small tools and implements.

This report has been prepared in cooperation with the organized soil-conservation districts in the State, the extension service of Oklahoma A. and M. College, and the United States Soil Conservation Service.

As an example of a typical post-war plan of an organized soil-conservation district, there is appended hereto a copy of the post-war plan for the Greer County Soil Conservation District.

There are at this time great quantities of construction equipment, such as that listed above, which is being used throughout the State of Oklahoma and neighboring States, on Army and Navy bases and other war facility installations. There is also a large quantity of construction equipment impounded at various places within the State of Oklahoma, and elsewhere, which is not now in use.

It is not the intention of this report to recommend the taking of this equipment from vital war uses, but it is felt that arrangements should be made now for securing this badly needed equipment for distribution to organized soil-conservation districts throughout the State of Oklahoma immediately at the cessation of the war.

We would further suggest that if there proves to be inadequate quantities of equipment available within the State of Oklahoma, or the United States, that arrangements be made for the return of construction equipment that has been sent to foreign countries during the period of war.

It is believed that now is the time to make arrangements for the acquisition of this equipment and, if it must be purchased, some type of Federal assistance in the way of long-term loans, or a combination of loans and grants, should be worked out.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call your attention to a typical post-war plan of a typical soil-conservation district, as follows:

POST-WAR PLAN FOR GREER COUNTY SOIL CONSERVATION DISTRICT

I. INTRODUCTION

The general welfare of all people living within the boundaries of the Greer County Soil Conservation District is dependent upon the soil resources, as there is no manufacturing, oil industry, or other sources of income. Realizing "A nation, state, county, or individual is only as rich as its soil" we have prepared this plan setting forth the needs of the district for technical personnel, equipment, and labor to establish a well-rounded conservation program on every farm.

The district was organized in the summer of 1941 and began operations in September of 1942. Conservation plans have been worked out on 94 of the 1,800 farms within the district. There has been no farm plans completely established due to the fact that the district has been in operation for only a short period of time.

Personnel and equipment have been very limited and we feel that the rate of planning and establishment of conservation practices should be stepped up if the productivity of our soils is to be maintained.

We realize that the present job is to win the war and the conservation practices which have been established on the land have done much for the war effort, by increasing food production. But after the war is won and the Nation returns to peacetime activities, a war should be declared on the evils of erosion. Therefore, if any Government machinery should become a surplus, this machinery that is suitable for use in the construction of conservation measures should be made available for that purpose. Also should a public-works program be necessary, which we hope is not needed, the use of this labor should be given first priority to be used for the construction of conservation measures on the farms which will conserve our soils. Not only the people of this district but the people of the Nation as a whole must put forth every effort to retain our soil resources.

II. DESCRIPTION OF THE DISTRICT

The Greer County Soil Conservation District, comprising all of Greer County, lies in the southwestern part of Oklahoma, and is bordered on the west by Harmon and Beckham Counties, on the south by Harmon and Jackson Counties, on the east by Jackson and Kiowa Counties, and on the north by Beckham County. The district covers 644 square miles, or approximately 407,680 acres. There are approximately 1,800 farms in the district, with an average of 117 acres in cultivation, the rest is in pastures, woodlands, waste land, town sites, and roads. The district headquarters is located at Mangum, Okla.

III. EROSION CONDITION, FLOOD DAMAGES, AND CONSEQUENCES

The land of Greer County Soil Conservation District has been damaged from water and wind erosion to a very great extent, ranging from slight on the nearly level to severe on the rolling to steeply rolling cultivated land. The steep rough pasture land has been damaged to a very great extent by overgrazing. More land is being left idle each year due to water and wind erosion and this condition will increase until conservation practices are applied to the land of the district as a whole. About 3 percent of the cropland has been abandoned and about 10 percent more should be retired to pasture in applying a well-balanced conservation program. The remaining 87 percent of the cultivated land can remain in cultivation for a long period of time with moderate to high yields if proper conservation measures are applied in time. The nearly level land of the district, which is about 30 percent of the land in cultivation, can be protected by simple conservation practices. The remaining 70 percent will need moderate to intensive treatment.

The heavier soils are affected very little by wind erosion, while the sandy soils are affected by both wind and water erosion. Due to erosion and cropping of soils of the district they have lost about 30 percent of the organic matter or nitrogen.

The pastures and range land of the district make up about 49 percent of the district, about 50 percent of which is severely overgrazed and is causing erosion to take place at a very fast rate. The overgrazing causes gullying which will take mechanical treatment and a large amount of labor to control. Much of the pasture land is rough broken land and contains outcrops of gypsum rock and shale which have very little cover. Such pasture land should be stocked at a very low rate to maintain an effective cover as these areas cause damage from silting of ponds and to land subject to overflow.

The increased erosion has caused an increase of the water run-off, which has increased flood hazards. Floods have deposited silt and sand on rich bottom lands, silted up ponds and stream channels, and spread noxious weed seed, such as Johnson grass, Russian thistles, cockleburs, and others.

The population of Greer County was 20,282 in 1930 and decreased to 14,500 by 1940. The greater part of this decrease is from farm areas and has been due to erosion, which caused lower production. When one drives through the district, one sees many abandoned homes in the more severely eroded areas. These eroded farms require a large unit for the farmer to make a good living.

IV. BENEFITS OF A SOIL- AND MOISTURE-CONSERVATION PROGRAM

The primary purpose of a soil- and moisture-conservation program on every farm is to decrease erosion and increase and maintain yields. Already a number of farmers have stated that this has been done on their farms even though only a part of the plan has been applied to the land.

Reports from various neighboring districts indicate that production has been increased from 14 to 30 percent on row crops, such as cotton and grain sorghums, and 10 to 25 percent on small grains. Similar increases have been obtained by applying conservation practices on pasture lands.

Additional benefits which may be expected are as follows:

1. Maintain or increase present standard of living among farm families.
2. Permit more people to make a living on the farm.
3. Provide better social conditions by maintaining a more stable rural population.
4. Reduce silting and flood damage.
5. Return abandoned lands to production of grass and cultivated crops.
6. Keep farm land in crop production that would otherwise be abandoned.
7. Reduce crop loss on flat land caused by excessive run-off from areas above.
8. Help decrease roadside erosion.
9. Help maintain well water.
10. Stabilize the urban income and population.
11. Offset crop damage from droughts by storing moisture in the soil during the rainy season.

V. LIST OF SOIL-AND-MOISTURE-CONSERVATION PRACTICES APPLICABLE TO THE DISTRICT

These practices are recommended since farmers' experience in the district has proven them to be very effective in controlling erosion and conserving moisture:

1. Cover crops.
2. Crop rotations.
3. Contour planting.
4. Crop-residue management.
5. Cropland with effective cover.
6. Green-manure crops.
7. Emergency tillage.
8. Terracing.
9. Strip cropping for wind erosion.
10. Tillage for impounding water.
11. Terrace outlets.
12. Application of barnyard manure.
13. Establishment of small irrigation systems.
14. Drainage ditches.
15. Planting old permanent pasture.
16. Planting permanent pasture or range.
17. Establishing small irrigation systems.
18. Fencing to protect erosion-control measures, for gully control, and to secure proper land use.
19. Roadside-erosion control.
20. Proper stocking of pasture and range.
21. Proper season of use of range.
22. Rotation grazing of pasture and range
23. Deferred grazing.
24. Pond management for erosion control and fish production.
25. Farm and ranch ponds.
26. Supplemental pasture.
27. Development of springs and wells.
28. Contour furrowing.
29. Clearing and grubbing.
30. Mowing grazing land.
31. Rodent control.
32. Fire prevention and suppression.
33. Maintaining feed reserves.
34. Stream bank erosion control.
35. Woodland and shelterbelt plantings.
36. Protection of post lots and shelterbelts.
37. Leveling fence row drifts and hummocks.

VI. LAND USE ADJUSTMENTS

Data from the conservation surveys of the district and farmers' experiences indicate that about 13 percent or 27,000 acres of cultivated land should be retired to permanent grass cover. The larger part of this acreage is in the area around Wildcat School. The remaining acres are sandy sections of the district, some of the steep rolling cultivated land along the breaks, and other small areas throughout the district. There are another 15,000 acres which are in the critical state of erosion. If erosion measures are not applied on these 15,000 acres within the next 10 years they, too, should probably be retired to permanent grass cover.

In the sandy areas of the district approximately 2,500 acres of shelter belts should be planted to protect this land from wind erosion. These shelter belts not only protect the land from wind, but serve as post lots, firewood, and wildlife areas.

Due to shallow soils, steep slopes, and size and shape of areas, there is very little pasture land in the district which could be put into cultivation.

It does not appear at the present time that a Government land-purchase program is needed, as the surrounding farmers of the eroded areas are generally able to purchase the submarginal farms and are able to establish the needed conservation measures.

There is very little land available in the district for settlement by families from outside of the district. However, the district should be able to take care of all the returning farmers from the armed forces.

VII. RESOURCES NEEDED

Technical personnel

To get sound conservation programs on the land, it has been demonstrated that plans need to be developed for individual farms that consider all of the conservation needs of those particular farms. A sound conservation plan which will maintain the fertility of the land includes a multiple of practices which have to be applied over a period of years. In other words, conservation of the land is a continued process.

The welfare of the people is dependent upon the need of getting soil- and moisture-conservation practices established at such a rate to where the productive capacity of the soil is not lowered to such an extent that the present standard of living cannot be maintained. To reach this goal, the district will need the following Soil Conservation Service personnel: three farm planners, two engineers, one conservation surveyor, seven aides.

This amount of personnel will be needed to get the maximum benefits of the equipment and labor which are listed elsewhere. The present soil-conservation personnel consists of one farm planner and two aides.

Equipment

Farmers' experiences have indicated that the equipment they have on hand will not permit them to establish soil- and moisture-conservation practices at a rate which is rapid enough to maintain the soil fertility. It has been definitely proven that additional equipment can profitably be used by the farmers on the following practices: Terrace construction, terrace outlet waterways, farm and ranch ponds, pasture seeding, pasture sodding, roadside erosion control (public and private), diversion ditches, contour furrowing, trench silos, harvesting seed, mowing sage and brush.

In order to establish the above-mentioned conservation practices, the farmers with the assistance of an adequate technical staff as listed elsewhere will need the following equipment: 13 tractors, 60 horsepower or greater; 10 graders, 10-foot blades; 6 bulldozers; 4 carryalls, 6-cubic-yard capacity; 1 tractor, 30 to 35 horsepower, crawler type; 9 power mowers; 15 farm tractors; 3 Bermuda grass harvesters; 5 Bermuda grass planters; 8 grass drills; 2 combines (all harvesters).

In addition to the above equipment the following is needed to transport labor, move equipment, supervise labor and equipment, and service equipment: One 10-ton trailer; eight 1½-ton trucks; one 2-ton truck; two 1-ton trucks; eight ½-ton trucks (pick-up); sufficient hand tools such as shovels, picks, post-hole diggers, etc., will be needed for the laborers.

Labor

The following practices will require labor in excess of available farm labor: Terrace outlet waterways, farm and ranch ponds, planting native grass, roadside erosion control (public and private), fencing areas for exclusion for erosion control, sodding diversion ditches, gully control, woodland planting, harvesting seed, sodding pasture land.

Skilled operators for the equipment and skilled and unskilled labor needed for the establishment of the above practices are as follows:

Skilled operators	39
Foremen	2
Truck drivers	12
Foremen (labor)	5
Mechanics	2
Blacksmith	1
Unskilled laborers	72

Group conservation projects

The individual farmer can apply practically all of the needed conservation measures on the land. However, a group project for roadside erosion control may be needed occasionally to get effective erosion control. Such a group project would not require additional technical personnel, labor, or equipment.

VIII. DISTRICT ORGANIZATION CAN CONDUCT THIS PROGRAM

The district organization is a result of the Oklahoma soil conservation district law. It is a democratic organization being organized by popular vote of the landowners and operators. It is governed by a board of five farmers, of which two are appointed by the State soil conservation committee and 3 are elected by popular vote. The only purpose of the district is the conservation of soil and water and soil resources.

The State law provides that the district supervisors may call upon various Government agencies and may accept money, equipment, or material as a grant to be used in establishing conservation measures on the farms.

Since the district has been in operation it has become very popular with the farmers and businessmen. It is now considered the organization that the people of the district go to when they want assistance in solving conservation problems. It is the belief of the district supervisors that the district can logically conduct this program.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, Maj. Richard I. Bong, a product of the C. A. A. war trainees school, has distinguished himself as few air pilots have in the remarkable record of 27 Japanese planes shot down in combat. This is one more than the World War No. 1 record of Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker, who, individually, shot down 26 planes in combat.

Major Bong, a most quiet and reserved officer, and seemingly nerveless fighter pilot, has little regard for the new Japanese pilots now appearing in his theater. He calls them dumb, or something, and says they are easy to shoot down once you can catch up with them.

Thousands of instructors and war trainees find themselves today without hope of ever serving in the Air Corps in any manner, and many of these thousands had the same ambitions to try to accomplish or surpass the record of Major Bong. With the recent decision of grounding and placing all of these men in the Army as privates, regardless of their hours of flying time and experience, these thousands of so-called forgotten airmen will never see a chance to fulfill their desire and ambition unless they are taken into the Regular Army Air Corps with commissions and placed in whatever department of the Air Corps they could serve best.

Survive or Perish, They Write Unity in the Skies Around the World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, during my short stay in Arizona at Easter time I was privileged to speak at the graduation exercises of a splendid class of pilots at Williams Field in Arizona on April 15. Touching on their careful air training for possible usefulness in peace following the war I pointed out the part our heroes and especially the survivors of this terrible conflict may play in uniting the parts of a broken world and spreading unity around the globe. My remarks to the graduates follow:

Colonel Grills, members of the staff, friends and loved ones of the members of the class, and all men of Williams Field, this is a significant day not only in the education and training of you members of the class but in your lives as well. Not only is it significant to you but very significant to your country. I have no doubt that your training for air service has been of a high order. We have not only justifiable local pride but a national pride in Williams Field and in the men of Williams Field. At Washington we have watched the splendid work of this great field with solicitous care and appreciation. I have had great concern for Williams Field for I have watched it grow from the desert.

Men of the graduating class, your total training for the wings of an eagle has at least a twofold prospect—and both prospects are of momentous concern to your country's future. In this day of war perhaps I should not speak of but one of these prospects, as the war is necessarily uppermost in our minds. And yet, notwithstanding the frightful hazard of your great commission, it is our prayer and hope that you will survive the ordeal of battle and that your air service training will bless our land during a long period of peace so long as you shall live and serve.

To those who are earth-bound the impetus of air navigation is a never-ending marvel. Some weeks ago Congressman JENNINGS RANDOLPH, of West Virginia, chairman of a committee of which I am a member, flew into Washington Airport in a unique manner and several Members of Congress were there to meet him. Why did we go to all that trouble? Because it was an epoch marking flight, though not apparently so to the hurrying throngs. He flew the first plane into the Nation's Capital fueled by gasoline made from coal. Some recent legislation, of which this merely hints, will open up new vistas in peacetime as well as wartime aviation.

WHO WROTE E PLURIBUS UNUM?

How much influence does the inventor or the scientific explorer have upon human destiny? How does the Edison compare with the Jefferson in shaping the trends of history? We are so near Thomas Jefferson's birthday, and because we give much credit to statesmen and the political side, we are apt to think that great political leaders shape the course of history. Let us not take a too limited view. Now, what is one of the most significant things in American history and who did most to bring it about?

I need not tell you that one of the most significant accomplishments in America's great destiny was the welding of diverse racial elements and social ideals into one political union. Early Americans united so that out of many we became one. The founders of our Republic wrote "E pluribus unum" on the coin, in the law, and across the face of our history. Who were the architects of this united country?

EARLY STATESMEN HAD AID

Of course the eminent men who met in old Independence Hall at Philadelphia in the summer of 1787 drafted the fundamental law which provided a more perfect union. I greatly honor them and would not detract one bit from their glory; however, others had a part in the final result. One afternoon during that summer at Philadelphia the Constitutional Convention took a short recess and most of the members went down to the river's edge to watch a curious experiment. A poor ragged inventor was trying to show the world that a boat could be propelled by steam. Those statesmen saw the first successful application of steam to water transportation in our history without realizing its great import.

Who had most to do in binding this vast country into one Nation—the ones who wrote our laws, or the ones who applied steam to rapid transportation by land and water? Who wrote "E pluribus unum" across America? I will take time for only this one illustration for I can but mention that 100 years ago Morse gave us the electric telegraph and four decades ago the Wright Brothers gave us the wings which you have so well burnished. Thus statesmen and scientists have enlarged and united America into a glorious country through the years of peace.

VICTORY IS YOUR IMMEDIATE OBJECT

Men of William Field, and all men and women of America's armed forces, your immediate objective is to preserve your country from the greatest danger which ever beset it. We know you will do it, and having preserved America for a glorious future, what a wonderful training you have had to enable you to have a meaningful part in that future. God grant that you may survive to play your rightful part in the uniting the parts of a broken world. After this war it is yours to write E pluribus unum, not only across a continent, but in the skies around the globe.

But why discuss works of peace now in the midst of this terrible war? You are trained to fight and you are well trained. Perhaps I am not enough of a Christian to advise you as a Christian, but even so, I would have you each afire with Christian wrath. You will meet a ruthless foe, who knows no mercy. I do not advise you to act in a spirit of vengeance but rather in a fighting spirit of right. The Lord Himself has fought the forces of evil, and you may have a part with Him. And what a glorious part yours is to be—in the skies.

IN THIS SPIRIT FLY AND FIGHT

It is no evidence of weakness if you have the spirit of Lt. John Gillespie Magee, who wrote High Flight. Less than a month ago I had a long talk with Lieutenant Magee's godly father, who glories in the Christian spirit of his noble son. Lt. John Magee wrote in letters of fire across the skies of battle these great words:

"I've topped the wind-swept heights with easy grace
Where never lark, or even eagle, flew;
And, while with silent, lifting mind Ive trod
The high untrespassed sanctity of space,
Put out my hand and touched the face of God."

It is not a sign of weakness, rather it is a sign of righteous strength if your prayer is the same as that of Sgt. Hugh Brodie when he said:

"Almighty and all present Power,
Short is the prayer I make to Thee,
I do not ask in battle hour
For any shield to cover me.

The vast unalterable way,
From which the stars do not depart
May not be turned aside to stay
The bullet flying to my heart,

I ask no help to strike my foe,
I seek no petty victory here,
The enemy I hate, I know,
To Thee is also dear.

But this I pray, be at my side
When death is drawing through the sky,
Almighty God who also died
Teach me the way that I should die."

Men of Williams Field, I am but one of your countrymen sending you forth to fight, and some perhaps to die, for the preservation of your country and our heritage of civilization. If you die, I shall feel personally that you died in my stead as literally as I do feel that in case of my own son, Lt. David Murdock cut down while leading infantry in Sicily. I am, and shall always be, sacredly obligated and consecrated just as one ransomed from horror. No doubt your parents and loved ones feel exactly the same deathless obligation.

Promises are often in vain; sometimes deeds are in vain. Surely your loved ones are unalterably bound by this sacred obligation to see to it that any sacrifices you make are not in vain. God be with you and keep you.

REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, it was with sadness I received word this morning that Catherine Smith, the wife of Alfred E. Smith, Governor of New York four times, and once a candidate for the Presidency, died this morning. I have known her personally for many, many years. She was a woman of outstanding loyalty, ability, and charity. The city of New York, the State, and the Nation has lost a great citizen.

Catherine Smith was one of those great women whose modesty was proverbial. She made a true companion to Alfred E. Smith and was a devoted wife and mother. Her interests were centered in her home and she offered her husband that fine companionship which was a haven in the storms of public life which Al Smith encountered in his public career. He could always return home secure in the knowledge that his loving wife was there to greet him and that his children had been properly taken care of. She relieved him of all the drudgery which is the lot of many men and proved her worth in the success which her husband found as legislator, governor, and businessman.

To Governor Smith and his family we wish to offer our sincerest condolences and words of sympathy.

Absentee Voting by Citizens of the State of Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER A. RAMEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include Senate bill 284, passed by the General Assembly of Ohio, the purpose of which is to allow everyone in the State of Ohio the privilege of voting a complete ballot.

I am making this request in behalf of Hon. George Thompson, member of the general assembly from Lucas County in the Ohio House of Representatives:

[Ninety-fifth General Assembly, special session, 1943–44]

Senate Bill 284

A bill to facilitate voting at the elections to be held on the seventh day of November 1944 by persons absent from their voting residences and serving in or with the armed forces of the United States or serving in the merchant marine of the United States, or serving in the armed forces of an ally of the United States, and to suspend sections 4785–86, 4785–92, 4785–93, 4785–94, 4785–95, 4785–96, 4785–98, 4785–105, 4785–110, 6064–32 and 6212–62 of the General Code during the period of time in which this act is in force and effect, and to repeal section 4785–141 of the General Code, and to declare an emergency

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio:

SECTION 1. Any provision of the General Code of Ohio to the contrary notwithstanding, any person serving in the armed forces of the United States, or in the merchant marine of the United States, or serving in the American Red Cross, the Society of Friends, the Women's Auxiliary Service Pilots, or the United Service Organizations, and attached to and serving with the armed forces of the United States, or serving in the armed forces of an ally of the United States, who will be 21 years or more of age on the 7th day of November 1944 and who is a citizen of the United States, may vote absent war voter ballots in the elections held on that day in the precinct in which he shall then have a voting residence in Ohio, as provided in this section. If he resided in the State of Ohio at the time of the commencement of his service in the armed forces of the United States, or in the merchant marine of the United States, or in the armed forces of an ally of the United States, he shall have a voting residence at that place in the precinct in which he so resided provided the time during which he continuously resided in Ohio immediately preceding the commencement of such service plus the time subsequent to such commencement and prior to the 7th day of November 1944 shall be equal to or shall exceed 1 year.

Such absent war voter ballots may be obtained by applying therefor to the clerk of the board of elections of the county in which such person's voting residence is located in one of the following ways:

(a) Such person may make written application therefor. He may personally deliver such application to the clerk or may mail or otherwise send same to the clerk. Such application need not be in any particular form. It need only contain words which, liberally construed, indicate that he requests such ballots, that he is engaged in one of the services as hereinabove specified, that he has a residence in Ohio, and sufficient information to enable the clerk to determine the precinct in which it is located. If he desires that such ballots be mailed to him, such application shall state the address to which they should be mailed.

(b) Application to have such ballots mailed to such person may be made by the spouse, father, mother, grandparent, father-in-law, or mother-in-law, brother, or sister of the whole blood or half blood, son, daughter, adopting parent, adopted child, step-parent, step-child, uncle, aunt, nephew, or niece of such person. Such application shall be upon a form prescribed by the secretary of state and provided by the clerk upon request therefor, and shall be subscribed and sworn to under oath by such applicant. Such application shall contain:

1. Full name of person for whom ballots are requested;

2. Statement that such person is serving in the armed forces of the United States; or in the merchant marine of the United States; or in the American Red Cross, The Society of Friends, the Women's Auxiliary Service Pilots, or the United Service Organizations, and attached to and serving with the armed forces of the United States; or in the armed forces of an ally of the United States;

3. Statement that such person has a residence in the county and information as to the precinct in which it is located;

4. Statement that applicant bears a relationship to such person as hereinabove specified;

5. Address to which such ballots should be mailed;

6. Name and address of person making the application.

Applications to have absent war voter ballots mailed to an elector, as provided for in this section, shall not be valid if dated, postmarked, or received by the clerk of the board of elections earlier than the 1st day of January 1944 or if delivered to such clerk later than 12 noon of Saturday, the 4th day of November 1944.

The board of elections of each county shall provide, and on the 9th day of August 1944 it shall have ready for use as absent war voter ballots, official national party column ballots, party column ballots, nonpartisan ballots, and issues ballots as referred to in section 4785-99 of the General Code. Such ballots shall be of the same kind of paper, and shall be the same size and in the same form, style, and text as the board will provide in accordance with law for the use of all voters who will vote in person at the polling place in each precinct on the 7th day of November 1944: Provided, however, That such issues ballot shall contain only such issues as shall, prior the 25th day of July 1944 have been lawfully certified to the board for submission to the voters of the county or of any political subdivisions or taxing units thereof at the election to be held on the 7th day of November 1944 and which such board shall on the 9th day of August 1944 be lawfully required so to submit.

On the 9th day of August 1944 the clerk of the board of elections shall mail, in the manner hereinafter provided, such absent war voter ballots then ready for use as in the preceding paragraph hereof provided for, and for which he shall have received valid applications prior to that time. Thereafter, and until 12 noon of Saturday, the 4th day of November 1944 the clerk shall, promptly upon receipt of additional valid applications therefor, mail to the proper persons all absent war voter ballots then ready for mailing.

If, after the 9th day of August 1944 and before the 7th day of November 1944, any other issue is lawfully certified to the board of elections for submission to voters at the election to be held on the 7th day of November 1944 the board shall promptly provide a separate official issue ballot for each such issue, and the clerk shall promptly mail each such separate official issue ballot to each person serving in the armed forces of the United States, or in the merchant marine of the United States, or serving in the American Red Cross, the Society of Friends, the Women's Auxiliary Service Pilots, or the United Service Organizations, and attached to and serving with the armed forces of the United States, or serving in the armed forces of an ally of the United States, to whom he shall have previously mailed other absent war voter ballots as in the two preceding paragraphs hereof provided for.

In mailing absent war voter ballots to persons, as in this section provided for, the clerk shall use the fastest mail service available therefor, but he shall not mail same by registered mail. He shall place such ballots in an unsealed identification envelope, gummed ready for sealing, which shall have printed on the face thereof a form as follows:

The clerk shall keep a record of the name and address of each person to whom he mails or delivers absent war voter ballots as in this section provided, the kinds of ballots so mailed or delivered, and the name and address of the person who shall have made the application therefor. After he shall have mailed or delivered such ballots he shall not mail or deliver additional ballots of the same kind or kinds to such person pursuant to a second or subsequent request therefor unless such second or subsequent request shall contain the statement that an earlier request had been sent to such clerk prior to the first day of September, 1944, and that the absent war voter ballots so requested had not been received by such person prior to the first day of October 1944, and provided the clerk shall not have received an identification envelope purporting to contain marked absent war voter ballots from such person.

Upon receiving his absent war voter ballots the elector shall fill in answers to the questions on the face of the identification envelope and write his usual signature in the proper place thereon; then he shall exhibit his ballots, unmarked, to some commissioned office, noncommissioned officer not below the rank of sergeant, or petty officer, or other person authorized to administer and attest oaths, to whom he is known. He shall then, in the presence of such officer or other person authorized to administer and attest oaths, and in the presence of no other person, mark such ballots in such manner that such officer cannot see how they are marked, fold each ballot separately so as to conceal his markings thereon, deposit them in said identification envelope, and securely seal the same. Thereupon he shall swear to or affirm the oath upon said identification envelope and have same properly attested by such officer. He shall then place said identification envelope within said return envelope, seal same and mail it to the clerk of the board of elections to whom it is addressed.

Any commissioned officer, noncommissioned officer not below the rank of sergeant, or petty officer, in the armed forces of the United States or its allies, or any member of the merchant marine of the United States designated by the Administrator of the War Shipping Administration for the purpose of administering and attesting oaths to facilitate voting by members of the merchant marine of the United States, shall be authorized to administer and attest oaths required by this section.

If, after the 8th day of August 1944, and before noon of the 7th day of November 1944, a valid application for absent war-voter ballots as in this section provided for, is delivered to the clerk by a person making such application in his own behalf, the clerk shall forthwith deliver to such person all absent war-voter ballots then ready, together with an identification envelope as in this section provided for. Such person shall then immediately retire to a voting booth in the office of the board, and shall there mark such ballots. He shall then fold each ballot separately so as to conceal his markings thereon, deposit them in said identification envelope, and securely seal the same. Thereupon he shall fill in answers to the questions on the face of the identification envelope, write his usual signature in the proper place thereon, swear to or affirm the oath upon said identification envelope and have same properly attested by a proper official of the board. He shall then deliver said identification envelope to the clerk. If thereafter and before the 7th day of November 1944 any additional separate official issue ballots are provided by the board the clerk shall promptly mail each such separate official issue ballot to such person at the address specified by him for that purpose.

Upon receipt of envelopes bearing the designation "Official election war ballot" prior to noon of the 7th day of November 1944, the clerk of the board of elections shall open same but shall not open the identification envelope therein contained. All sealed identification envelopes bearing the designation "Absent war-voter ballot" in the hands of the clerk at the time the election supplies are delivered to the presiding judges of the precincts, as provided by law, shall then be delivered to the presiding judges of those precincts, respectively, in which the absent voter's voting residence is located, as indicated on such envelopes. Any additional identification envelopes bearing the designation "Absent war-voter ballot" received by the clerk prior to 12 noon of the 7th day of November 1944, shall be delivered by messenger to the presiding judge of the appropriate precincts between the hours of 12 noon and 6:30 p. m. of the 7th day of November 1944.

Envelopes bearing the designation "Official election war ballots" received by the clerk after 12 noon of the 7th day of November 1944, shall not be opened or counted, but shall be preserved in such envelopes unopened for a period of 30 days after the 7th day of November 1944. Thereafter they may be destroyed on order of the board of elections unless the secretary of state shall order them preserved for a longer period of time.

As soon as the polls are opened on election day the judges of election shall examine the information contained on the face of each identification envelope bearing the designation "absent war-voter ballot" to determine if it shall appear therefrom that the voter whose marked ballots are contained therein has the qualifications prescribed in the first paragraph of this section. At such time any duly appointed challenger, or any of the judges or clerks of election may challenge the vote of such absent voter on the ground that he does not have such qualifications. If a majority of the judges find that the voter has the qualifications required, and that the information on such identification envelope has been properly subscribed and sworn to by the voter, and that his oath has been properly attested as provided for in this section, the presiding judge shall open the identification envelope without defacing the written or printed matter thereon, remove the enclosed ballots without unfolding them, and deposit them in the proper ballot boxes. The name of each such voter, followed by the words "absent war-voter ballot" shall be written in the poll book or poll list together with such notation as will indicate the kinds of ballots the envelope contained. All identification envelopes bearing the designation "absent war-voter ballots" received by any presiding judge between 12 noon and 6:30 p. m. on the 7th day of November 1944 shall be examined and the ballots therein shall be voted or not counted in the same manner as hereinabove provided for other absent war-voter ballots.

If any challenge as hereinbefore provided for is made and sustained the identification envelope of such voter shall not be opened and shall be endorsed "not counted" with the reasons therefor, and such envelope shall be returned to the board of elections along with any other contested ballots. All identification envelopes from which ballots shall have been removed and voted shall also be returned to the board of elections at the close of the polls.

SEC. 2. At 10 a. m. of the 11th day of May, 1944, the board of elections of each county shall meet and canvass the vote cast at the primary election held on the 9th day of May, 1944, and shall declare and certify the results thereof in the manner provided by law. The executive committee of each political party participating in said primary may have one representative present during the canvass of the vote.

Each board shall promptly certify in duplicate to the secretary of state, upon forms prescribed by him, the results of the votes cast for each candidate whose nomination or election is determined by the votes of electors of the State-at-large. The secretary of state shall thereupon promptly canvass the votes cast for such candidates in all of the counties of the State, shall declare the results thereof, and shall issue certificates of nomination or election to those of such candidates entitled thereto.

Each board shall also promptly certify the results of the votes cast for each candidate whose nomination or election is determined by the votes of electors of a district comprised of more than one county but less than all of the counties of the State, to the board of the most populous county in such district. The boards to which such certifications are made shall thereupon promptly canvass the votes cast for such candidates in all of the counties in their districts, shall declare the results thereof, and shall issue certificates of nomination or election to those of such candidates entitled thereto.

Each board shall also, after canvassing the vote for each candidate whose nomination or election is determined by the votes of electors of its county, promptly declare the results thereof and issue certificates of nomination or election to those of such candidates entitled thereto.

In the absence of such acceptance the nominee's name shall not be printed on the ballot.

If the petition nominates a candidate whose election is to be determined by the voters of the State-at-large, it shall be filed with the secretary of state. If the petition nominate a candidate whose election is to be determined by the voters of a district comprised of more than one county but less than all of the counties of the State, it shall be filed with the board of elections of the most populous county in such district. If such petition is filed with the secretary of state, he shall promptly transmit to each county board of elections such portions of the petition as purport to contain signatures of electors of the county of such board. If such petition is filed with the board of elections of the most populous county of a district, such board shall promptly transmit to each county board of elections within such district such portions of the petition as purport to contain signatures of electors of the county of each such board.

All petition papers so transmitted to a board of elections and all nominating petitions filed with a board of elections shall, under proper regulations, be open to public inspection until 6:30 p. m. of the 10th day of July 1944, during which time the board shall examine same and determine the validity or invalidity of the signatures thereon. Each board shall, not later than the 10th day of July 1944 return to the secretary of state all petition papers transmitted to it by the secretary of state, as hereinabove provided for, together with its certificate certifying its determination as to the validity or invalidity of signatures thereon, and shall return to the board of elections of the most populous county of a district all petition papers transmitted to it by such board together with its certificate certifying its determination as to the validity or invalidity of signatures thereon.

Objections to nominating petitions may be filed by any qualified elector eligible to vote for the candidate whose nominating petition he objects to, not later than 6:30 p. m. of the 14th day of July 1944. Such objections shall be filed with the election officials with whom the nominating petition was filed. Upon the filing of such objection the election officials with whom it is filed shall promptly fix the time for hearing same and shall forthwith mail notice of the filing of such objection and the time fixed for the hearing of same to the person whose nomination is objected to. They shall also forthwith mail notice of the time fixed for the hearing to the person who filed the objection. At the time so fixed such election officials shall hear the objection and determine the validity or invalidity of the petition. Such determination shall be final.

SEC. 4. Any person nominated in the primary election held on the 9th day of May 1944 or by nominating petition as a candidate for election at the general election to be held on the 7th day of November 1944 may withdraw as such candidate at any time prior to the 20th day of July 1944. Such withdrawal may be effected by the filing of a written statement by such candidate announcing his withdrawal and requesting that his name be not printed on the ballots. If such candidate's declaration of candidacy or nominating petition was filed with the secretary of state, his statement of withdrawal shall be addressed to and filed with the secretary of state. If such candidate's declaration of candidacy or nominating petition was filed with a board of elections, his statement of withdrawal shall be addressed to and filed with such board of elections.

Such certification must be accompanied by the written acceptance of such nomination by the person whose name is so certified.

If a person nominated in the primary election held on the ninth day of May 1944 as a candidate for election at the general election to be held on the 7th day of November 1944, whose election is to be determined by the voters of an election district comprised of more than one county but less than all of the counties of the State, shall withdraw as such candidate prior to the 20th day of July 1944, the vacancy in the party nomination so created may be filled by the district committee of the political party which make such nomination at said primary, at a meeting called for such purpose. The chairman and secretary of the county central committee of such political party in each county in such district shall comprise such district committee. Such meeting shall be called by the chairman of the county central committee of such political party of the most populous county in such district, who shall give each member of such district committee at least 2 days' notice of the time, place, and purpose of such meeting. If a majority of the members of such committee are present at such meeting, a majority of those present may select a person to fill the vacancy. Such meeting shall be called by the chairman of such committee, who shall give each member of such committee at least 2 days' notice of the time, place, and purpose of such meeting. If a majority of the members of such committee are present at such meeting, a majority of those present may select a person to fill the vacancy. The chairman and secretary of such meeting shall certify in writing and under oath to the board of elections of such county, not later than the 24th day of July 1944, the name of the person so selected to fill such vacancy. Such certification must be accompanied by the written acceptance of such nomination by the person whose name is so certified.

Such certification must be accompanied by the written acceptance of such nomination by the person whose name is so certified.

If a person nominated in the primary election held on the 9th day of May 1944, or nominated by petition, as a candidate for election at the general election to be held on the 7th day of November 1944 shall die the vacancy so created may be filled by the same committee in the same manner as provided in the four next preceding paragraphs for the filling of similar vacancies created by withdrawals, excepting that the certification, when filling a vacancy created by death, may not be filed with the secretary of state or with the board of elections of the most populous county of an election district later than 6:30 p. m. of the 28th day of October 1944, or with any other county board of elections later than the 2d day of November 1944.

If a person holding an elective office shall have died subsequent to the 10th day of March 1944, and prior to the 20th day of July 1944, and if, under the laws of Ohio, a person may be elected at the general election to be held on the 7th day of November 1944, to fill the unexpired term of the person who shall have died, the appropriate committee of each political party, acting as in the case of a vacancy in a party nomination as in the first three paragraphs of this section provided for, may select a person as the candidate of its party for election for such unexpired term at the general election to be held on the 7th day of November 1944, and certify his name, and thereupon such name shall be printed as such candidate under proper titles and in the proper place on the party column ballots used at such general election.

SEC. 6. The secretary of state shall, on the 25th day of July 1944, certify to the board of elections of each county in the State the forms of the official ballots to be used at the general election to be held on the 7th day of November 1944, together with the names of the candidates to be printed thereon whose election is to be determined by the votes of the electors of the State-at-large.

If, after the 25th day of July 1944, and before the 29th day of October 1944, a certificate should be filed with the secretary of state to fill a vacancy caused by the death of a candidate, as in section 5 of this act provided for, the secretary of state shall forthwith make a supplemental certification to the board of elections of each county in the State amending and correcting his original certification provided for in the first paragraph of this section. If within such time such a certificate should be filed with the board of elections of the most populous county in an election district comprised of more than one county, such board shall forthwith make a supplemental certification to the board of elections of each county in such district amending and correcting its original certification provided for in the second paragraph of this section. If, at the time such supplemental certification is received by a county board of elections, ballots carrying the name of the deceased candidate shall have been printed, such board shall cause strips of paper bearing the name of the candidate certified to fill such vacancy to be printed and pasted on such ballots so as to cover the name of the deceased candidate, before such ballots are delivered to electors.

SEC. 7. Official printed ballots shall be provided by the board of elections for each polling place for the elections to be held on the 7th day of November 1944, and for any special elections to be held at any prior time in the period of time during which this act is in effect. In addition to the names of the candidates, all ballots shall contain spaces, as required by law, for writing in other names. The number of ballots to be provided for each precinct, for use at any election, shall be determined by the board of elections having jurisdiction. Sample ballots shall not be supplied by the board of elections but when printed shall be printed on colored paper and the words "Unofficial sample ballot" shall be plainly printed in bold-face type across the face of such ballot.

SEC. 8. All ballots which county boards of election shall be required by law to provide between the 10th day of May 1944, and the 8th day of November 1944, shall be printed in black ink on No. 4 sulphite bond white paper of 13 pounds weight per ream. Each ballot of each kind of ballot shall have attached thereto at the top thereof two stubs, each of the width of the ballot and 1¾ inches in length. The stubs shall be separated from the ballot and from each other by perforated lines. The top stub shall be known as stub B and shall have printed on its face "Stub B." The other stub shall be known as stub A and shall have printed on its face "Stub A." Each stub shall also have printed on its face "Consecutive Number ———." Each ballot of each kind of ballot provided for use in each precinct shall be numbered consecutively beginning with number 1 by printing such number upon both of the stubs attached thereto.

On ballots bearing the names of candidates such names shall be printed in eight point bold-face upper-case type, and an enclosed blank rectangular space shall be provided at the left of each candidate's name. The titles of offices on such ballots shall be printed in eight-point bold-face upper- and lower-case type. Headings shall be printed in display roman type. Where the names of several candidates are grouped together as candidates for the same office, there shall be printed on such ballots immediately above the names of such group of candidates, the words: "Vote for not more than ——— (filling the blank space with that number which will indicate the number of persons who may be lawfully elected to such office) ———."

National party column ballots and party column ballots shall have a blank circular space three-fourth of an inch in diameter below the device and above the name of the party at the head of the ticket or list of candidates. The heading of each party ticket, including the name of the party, the device above, and the circle between the device and such name, shall be separated from the rest of the ticket by a heavy line, and the blank circular space shall be defined by heavier lines than the lines defining the blank spaces at the left of the names of candidates. The circle shall be surrounded by the following words: "For a straight ticket mark within this circle."

Each party ticket shall be separated from other party tickets and shall be bordered on each side by a heavy border or a solid line at least one-eighth of an inch wide, and the edges of the ballot on each side shall be trimmed off along such border or solid line.

SEC. 9. Upon presentation not later than 6:30 p. m. of the 30th day of June 1944 of a petition to the board of elections of the county wherein the district or any part thereof, as defined in section 6064-31 of the General Code, is located, signed by qualified electors of the district concerned, equal to 15 per centum of the total number of votes cast for Governor at the last regular State election in such district, the board of elections shall proceed as follows:

1. Within 5 days after such presentation, determine the sufficiency of such petition and, in case of overlapping residence district petitions presented within said period, determine which of such petitions shall govern the further proceedings of such board. But if the district be located in more than one county, the petition shall first be transmitted to the board of elections of each of the other counties in which any part of such district may be located, for investigation and report with respect to said matters and things, in such rotation as may be determined by the board of elections to which the petition is presented; and each of such other boards of elections shall make such report within 5 days from the date of transmission of such petition to it; in which event the time within which the final decision of the board of elections to which the petition shall have been presented must be made shall be extended accordingly.

2. If the petition shall be found sufficient and, in case of overlapping residence district petitions, after the governing petition shall have been determined, the board of elections to which the petition has been presented shall order the holding of a special election in the district for the submission of the questions in section 6064–33 of the General Code specified, on the 7th day of November 1944, and shall certify such order to the board or boards of election of any other county or counties in which any part of such district is situated.

3. Give notice of such election in each county in which any part of such district is situated, in the manner and within the time provided by law.

When, within 5 days after the filing of a residence district petition pursuant to this section, another residence district petition is filed with the same or another competent board of elections, which includes territory covered by the petition first so filed, that petition shall govern which applies to the territory containing the lesser number of election precincts, if otherwise sufficient; and if such second petition covers the same territory as that covered by the first, such second petition shall be disregarded and the first petition shall govern, unless the first petition is insufficient.

SEC. 10. The question of the sale of beer as defined in section 6212–63 of the general code, by holders of C or D permits, may be presented to the qualified electors of an incorporated municipality, a residential district of a municipality as hereinafter defined, a township in which no incorporated municipality exists, or to the qualified electors of that part of a township outside of an incorporated municipality, for their adoption or rejection.

The question to be submitted shall be, Shall the sale of beer as defined in section 6212–63 of the general code be permitted within the district, municipality, township, or part of a township outside of the municipality?

The exact wording of the question and form of ballot as printed, shall be determined by the board of elections in the county wherein the election is held, subject to approval of the secretary of state of Ohio.

Upon presentation, not later than 6:30 p. m. of the 30th day of June 1944, of a petition to the board of elections of the county wherein such election is sought to be held, requesting the holding of such election, signed by qualified electors of the district concerned equal to 35 percent of the total vote cast for governor at the last regular State election in such incorporated municipality, residential district of a municipality, township in which no incorporated municipality exists, or of that part of a township outside of an incorporated municipality, the board of elections shall submit such question to the electors of the district concerned, at the general election to be held on the 7th day of November 1944.

If a majority of the electors voting on said question vote "Yes" thereon, the sale of beer as defined in this section shall be permitted in the district concerned, subject only to the provisions of law. If a majority of the electors voting on said question vote "No" thereon, it shall be unlawful for any C or D permit holder to sell beer within the district concerned until at a subsequent election similarly called and held, a majority of the electors voting on said question shall vote "Yes" thereon.

No such election shall be held oftener than once in each 3 years.

A residential district shall be held to mean any two or more contiguous precincts in the residential portion of a municipality.

SEC. 11. The provisions of sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 of this act shall cease to be in effect on and after November 8, 1944, and the provisions of sections 4785–86, 4785–92, 4785–93, 4785–94, 4785–95, 4785–96, 4785–98, 4785–105, 4785–110, 6064–32, and 6212–62 of the general code are hereby suspended until the 8th day of November 1944.

SEC. 12. Section 4785–141 of the general code is hereby repealed.

SEC. 13. This act is hereby declared to be an emergency measure necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, and safety. The reason for such necessity lies in the fact that a large number of the citizens of Ohio are absent from their homes serving in the armed forces of the United States, or in the merchant marine of the United States, or serving in the American Red Cross, the Society of Friends, the Women's Auxiliary Service Pilots, or the United Service Organizations, and attached to and serving with the armed forces of the United States, or serving in the armed forces of an Ally of the United States, in various parts of the world. Because of such absence they might, under present absent-voter laws, be unable to vote at the November elections in 1944. This act will make it easier for them to vote at such election.

Army Air Force Convalescent Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, much has been written and many speeches have been made relative to the reconditioning of disabled members of the armed forces. Medical men realize the mental condition of the patients who day after day lie in bed and count the cracks in the ceilings and the nails in the walls with nothing else to do. It was at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., just outside of my own city, St. Louis, where a real rehabilitation and convalescent training program was started. It has spread now until it is a major program in the Army Air Force. It is to be hoped, Mr. Speaker, that realizing the value of this program, other branches of the service will adopt it.

I have just read a very interesting article in the Army-Navy Journal of May 6 on this subject entitled "The A. A. F. Convalescent Program." Under the permission granted me, I include this article as part of my remarks. It follows:

Pioneering in this field, in December 1942, the Army Air Forces established a convalescent program for the ordinary sick soldier in the station hospital designed to return him to duty, not only in first-class physical condition but with a period of training behind him instead of enforced idleness.

The convalescent training program, which has been in operation at Army Air Forces hospitals for over 16 months, has a remarkable record of reconditioning, utilizing convalescent time to the utmost, and returning men to duty or starting them on the road to civilian life with a definite objective and a well laid groundwork of training. Now in operation at all Army Air Forces station hospitals and at convalescent centers in strategic locations throughout the United States, the program is of the utmost flexibility and meets the requirements of the individual, not only with carefully planned physical training in keeping with his condition but with training along lines which he has followed or will follow in the future.

Under the program the average patient at an Army Air Forces station hospital engages in light exercise of some type within 48 hours after an operation. As he improves, the strenuousness of his exercise increases until he is taking part in competitive sports. It is not unusual to see men with an arm or leg still in a cast playing volleyball or softball, thus avoiding the atrophy of unused muscles which would accompany the usual idle period of convalescence.

As to the training and study which he gains under the program, cadet training and basic training centers now give full credit and recognition to the military training gained in this way. Thus, the patient has had no period of mental idleness. If in a training phase when hospitalized, he continues his studies under special instructors, themselves often patients, he quit possibly may return to duty on the same training level as the other men of his squadron.

The hospitalized soldier differs from the hospitalized civilian in that there is no period of taking it easy after leaving the hospital. He must remain there until able to assume his regular duties. Not only is this lengthy period utilized to the fullest extent but the combined physical training and study has been found to result in shortened periods of convalescence, a reduction in hospital readmissions by sending men back to duty in better physical condition, and often in elimination of the necessity of sick leave. The result of the teaching is an increase in the soldier's military knowledge and in his general knowledge.

Lt. Col. Howard A. Rusk, Chief of the Convalescent Training Branch, Medical Services Division, who had been an instructor of medicine at St. Louis University before becoming a medical officer, was Chief of the Medical Service at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., station hospital, when he first put the program into operation. In December 1942, Maj. Gen. David N. W. Grant, the air surgeon, ordered the program installed in all A. A. F. hospitals. Colonel Rusk was assigned to duty in charge of the over-all program.

Convalescent centers are located at Fort George Wright, Spokane, Wash.; Fort Logan, Colo.; Albuquerque, N. Mex.; Nashville, Tenn.; Coral Gables, Fla.; St. Petersburg, Fla., and at Mitchel Field and Pawling, N. Y. At these centers returned casualties undergo a physical, emotional, and psychological assay and are properly assigned in the program by medical officers trained in this work. Then under the combined program the reconditioning begins, special treatment and instruction if the man returns physically handicapped, psychiatric treatment and guidance if necessary. His vocational training may include such subjects as radio, photography, metal work, woodwork, aircraft identification, and synthetic training devices. His educational review may include languages, mathematics, armed forces institute courses, agriculture, bookkeeping, typing, and teaching methods.

While primarily intended to return the men to duty, and the greater percentage are so returned, either to their former duties or to duties suitable to their present physical condition, those whom it is found necessary to send back to civilian life have had the opportunity to plan their future and are turned over to the appropriate agency with a substantial background of training.

Being based on the individual needs and abilities of the patients the educational phase of the program is one of the greatest variety. Keeping up with the latest techniques and research on military subjects they study camouflage, land mines, booby traps, first aid, defense against chemical attacks and military sanitation. Some patients while still confined to their beds are disassembling and assembling motors, generators, aircraft instruments, and weapons. According to a recent survey over 600 different subjects are now taught in the program, subjects ranging in scope from basic military subjects to highly technical investigative research.

Hardly a subject in which a man has had training, desires training or evinces interest in is overlooked. Many of these subjects are those for which the man would not have had time in his routine training. Almost no morale or disciplinary problems arise where patients are kept busy both mentally and physically.

A summary of the convalescent training centers shows that the service is conducted with the following possibilities of the disposition of patients in mind: Return to original A. A. F. assignment; return to A. A. F. in a different assignment; return to assignment within the Army; return to civilian life as a socially and economically self-sufficient individual.

"It is fitting," says General Grant, "that the A. A. F. should have adopted as the basic philosophy behind its convalescent training program this phrase, 'The debt of disability shall be paid in the currency of opportunity.' To accomplish this we have preached that the soldier must be to us a name, an individual, and not a mere serial number to be filed away or shelved when his usefulness appears to be at an end."

Gen. Henry H. Arnold, commanding general of the Army Air Forces, has stated:

"Our responsibility for the Air Forces soldier does not end when the bombs are dropped over the target."

Address by Hon. Marion E. Martin Before the Maine State Republican Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OWEN BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 8 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Marion E. Martin, assistant chairman of the Republican National Committee, before the Maine State Republican Convention in Bangor, Maine, on Friday, April 14, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There has been a great deal of discussion about the advisability of changing horses in the middle of the stream. My advice is, "Let's change horses and cross the stream." It certainly is the only way we are ever going to get across. We have heard that argument now for 8 years, and unless we make the change this year, we may hear it for another 20. The only reasons given by the opposition to back up this argument are that we are in an emergency—and how familiar that phrase is—and that we need the New Deal President to remain in office in order to carry on the war and to work out the peace after the war. Peace negotiations are, however, time-consuming, and it may take 10 or 20 years to write the peace.

The first statement can be disposed of very quickly. Political leaders do not make the decisions of military strategy. Those decisions are made by trained military leaders. Military science is an exact science and the President has no training in that field. If our military campaigns are to be conducted along political lines, we are doomed to failure. Military operations are conducted by military leaders, and they would not be changed if there were a change in political leaders. They achieve positions of prominence not by party affiliation but because of ability. They serve as Americans, not as Republicans, Democrats, or new dealers. In a Republican administration, political preferment would not be given to any military man—ability would be the criterion for advancement.

The second point demands more careful analysis. If the fact that Mr. Roosevelt is the only one who can carry on peace negotiations is a compelling reason for electing him for the fourth term, then we must face the fact that we must continue him for 5 terms, 6 terms, or even 10 terms in office because the peace will not be written overnight. It will be a long process of negotiations, adjustment, and readjustment. We will be fortunate if this does not extend over a period longer than 15 years. Do we want to stay on the same old horse for that length of time? No, let's change horses and cross the stream.

In our system of government, the conduct of foreign relations is primarily an executive function, the State Department being an adjunct of the President. Continuity of policy, however, is provided by the State Department and the United State Senate. If the policy we are pursuing is an American and not a personal policy, we will not have to worry about its being changed. Our foreign relations would be much better if they were conducted on a less personal and a more objective basis—if they were conducted with greater regard for the opinions of the experts in the State Department and less regard for the opinions of the little coterie of the President's personal friends who have had no training or experience in that field. The State Department has a continuity and perpetuity which give a security and nonpolitical, nonpartisan slant to our foreign relations. Our foreign policy should be long range and not dependent upon the personal reaction of our President toward Stalin, Chiang Kai-shek or anybody else. It should be long range and American in viewpoint rather rather than short range and personal.

If Mr. Roosevelt's policies are so personal that only he can carry them out, then certainly they are not wise for this country. If the policies are sound and best for the country, our trained career men in the State Department should be in on the secrets, and be able to advise with Mr. Roosevelt's successor so that there will be a consistency in policy and so that America's prestige and welfare will always be maintained. If they are not sound, the quicker we have the change the better.

There's one thing certain, and that is that in view of the record we are taking an awful lot on faith when we, even for a moment, admit that Mr. Roosevelt has provided—or assume that he can provide—better leadership in the international field than he has in the State or National field. Leopards don't change their spots. The minute the President boards a clipper or a warship, no metamorphosis of character takes place. He is the same Mr. Roosevelt who did, even as late as May 14, 1940, show astonishing lack of understanding of national defense needs, even though he had all the information concerning world developments. At a press conference on that day, when questioned about a two-ocean Navy, he replied that the two-ocean Navy "is an entirely outmoded conception of naval defense, and it has been since about 1847 when we first acquired California. I just never discuss two-ocean Navy in one way or the other, because it is not sensible to talk of naval defense in those terms."

Further, he said:

"It really, honestly is an outworn conception that nobody who knows anything about defense would ever use. Nobody has ever used that term that knew anything about defense. Such a conception is just plain dumb."

The tragic consequences of President Roosevelt's failure to recognize the necessity of a two-ocean Navy was clearly demonstrated in the public statement on October 19, 1942, of Admiral Ernest J. King, our commander in chief of the fleet and Chief of Naval Operations. He said the United States "is fighting a two-ocean war with just about a one-ocean Navy." "We have got to hold on," he said, "until we gain some strength." Much to the credit of the Navy and American industry, the picture today is very different. We can boast now of a seven-ocean Navy—a Navy unequaled by any other nation in the world.

Aside from the demonstrated weakness of not recognizing the implications of world conditions, the President also made the mistake of talking big and doing little. It is fundamental that the foreign policy of a country should be backed up by the strength and will to carry it out. But, beginning with his famous quarantine speech of 1937, the President began to throw the moral support of the United States against the Axis aggressors. Yet complementary steps were not taken to strengthen our national defense forces by which he would be able to enforce those policies which he announced. Moreover, he did just the reverse. By shipping oil and scrap iron to Japan he made it possible for our enemy to rearm. He also made it difficult for our political ally, China, to carry on her battle with Japan. It is a just criticism of Mr. Roosevelt's lack of vision in the pre-Pearl Harbor era that he talked big but did very little to equip the country to carry out the threats he was making.

These are but two elements of the whole national defense picture. They are evidence of President Roosevelt's proven lack of foresight in the past. Lacking such foresight when he had all the information at his fingertips that would have enabled him to judge the seriousness of the world situation, why should we give him the benefit of the doubt and believe that he would show any more foresight in preparing for peace than he did in preparing for obvious war?

If we are to believe that the President was prepared for the proximity of war, that he had a well-defined war policy in relation to the military, the navy and the critical supply situation, what interpretation can be placed on his pronounced disarmament leanings, his disregard of diplomatic warnings regarding Japanese threats, and his press conference characterizations of impending war queries as irrelevant?

The facts are indisputable to show that the President scuttled the 1933 London Economic Conference. As an aside, he now has set up various conferences similar in composition to the London Economic Conference, to deal with segments of the economic problems. If 10 years ago the system was bad and unable to cope with comparatively simple problems, why would there be much hope that the more complex problems of today can now be solved that way? No—the system was all right then and it is most unfortunate for the world that President Roosevelt scuttled the London Economic Conference, thereby accentuating the economic stresses and strains that produced this present war.

It is also true that the President favored downright disarmament during the whole time war clouds were gathering, that he delayed preparations for adequate defense, that he ridiculed the urgency for a two-ocean Navy, that he was dilatory in recognizing the potentialities of air power, that he pursued a tardy course in the acquisition of war materials, that he actually assured the American public not to become "discomboomerated" by foreign developments and, moreover, that he was not on guard regarding Japanese threats.

These deficiencies constitute incontrovertible evidence that the President was not competent to evaluate and to counter the warlike trends of the pre-Pearl Harbor period. He erred, too, in failing to portray frankly to the people the status of world conditions.

In view of this record, it is a natural consequence that the people should question the "official" acts since the Pearl Harbor tragedy—but the post-Pearl Harbor record is shrouded in darkness. The American people have not been kept informed of the official foreign transactions and intents of the Roosevelt administration. Neither have those acts which have been given the spotlight of publicity been convincing, nor have they encouraged the public to think there is a clear national policy.

What assurances are there, therefore, that an administration that had a vacillating, day-to-day foreign policy in the pre-war days has thereby demonstrated an unquestioned right to be entrusted with the future planning of America, with the winning of the peace?

There is also ample evidence that just as the President is not frank with the people of this country, neither is he frank with the leaders among our allies, nor are they frank with him. Certainly, there was no meeting of the minds as far as the Jewish homeland in Palestine was concerned. Neither has there been a meeting of the minds as to the release of publicity in connection with the disposition of the Italian Navy. We could hardly say there was complete cooperation between Russia on the one hand and Great Britain and America on the other, when Russia recognized the Badoglio government. Certainly, there was not frankness when Russia split itself up into 16 independent Soviet Republics. Neither is there evidence today of what our relations are or are to be with the Balkan countries.

This is all a far cry from "open covenants, openly arrived at." These are but a few of the available examples of the weakness typical of the present administration, the lack of foresight and forthrightness which must be demonstrated if we are ever going to cross the stream.

I do want to say that one of the most intelligent steps taken by the Republicans in Congress was initiated by our own Congressman ROBERT HALE. He led a group of 24 freshman Congressmen, who called upon the Secretary of State in an attempt to find out what our foreign policy was. Apparently they were unsuccessful, but if 24 Members of the House of Representatives, who are close to the scene and who are making a conscientious effort to get information; 24 outstanding legislators who have cooperated in all measures necessary for international collaboration, are unable to get a definition of our foreign policy, then why should we, the rank and file, fall victim to a lot of hocus-pocus that we approve a foreign policy about which we know little, or that we can't change horses because it would break the continuity in the foreign policy?

What we need is more forthrightness in dealing with each other. We should point with pride to the pronouncement made by our Republican leaders at Mackinac, in which our Governor Sewall had a large part. This pronouncement reads as follows:

"Responsible participation by the United States in post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations to prevent military aggression and to attain permanent peace with organized justice in a free world."

The Mackinac statement was the logical sequel to the White-Vandenberg resolution previously espoused by our able Senator WHITE. It was the first definite and specific commitment on foreign policy by either party. It was the lead which was followed later when the Congress adopted the Fulbright and Connally resolutions. The Republicans supplied the vision. In so doing, they proved their capacity for leadership in foreign affairs.

I have covered this field at some length because of challenge made at the Democratic State convention and because there has been so much confused thinking on this subject.

There is, however, one additional item that needs be taken up briefly, namely, the statements by the friends of the President that the name of Roosevelt carries so much weight and prestige in foreign countries that for the good of the world, we need maintain him in office. Certainly, if that is the case, it is an indictment of the New Deal because they have been selling Roosevelt rather than America abroad. There is, too, the very important consideration of whether their statement holds water. If my information is correct, the French people do not look upon Mr. Roosevelt as their great savior. Certainly, also, there can be two opinions regarding Mr. Roosevelt among the Yugoslavs and the Greeks. Also, if it is the name rather than the country that is important, we would have to establish a dynasty in order to maintain our position and prestige in foreign affairs.

We realize the great responsibility that is going to be America's because of the position which we have earned in the leadership of the world's social and economic development. Sad to say, however, there are many in our national life at the present time who overlook the very fundamental fact that in order to continue that leadership and to be strong internationally, we must be strong nationally. We cannot dissipate our wealth and resources in following a policy of profligacy and still maintain our strength and the respect of our fellow nations. We cannot create full employment in the world unless we have full employment here. We cannot provide healthy environment for others unless we have a healthy environment for ourselves. The only thing that we can share—and profit in our sharing—is our ideals of service and cooperation. We cannot buy friendship. We can only set an example. Dollar diplomacy creates jealousies and animosities. Only through true and intelligent consideration of other countries, their problems and aspirations, can we build a sound good neighbor policy throughout the world.

It is a national characteristic to favor the underdog. We have, therefore, butted into the problems of little nations with an emotional fervor, sometimes with little regard for the equities involved. It is well to champion the cause of the weak, but weakness in itself is not always a virtue, just as bigness per se is not a vice. Moreover, when we espouse their cause and hold out hope and promise to them, we must be prepared to deliver. We must not make the mistake we made in Greece when we encouraged her to believe that we would give her supplies, but which we couldn't deliver. So while we believe in world collaboration, let us ever be mindful of the fact that such collaboration should be based on considered judgment rather than on emotions. In order to carry out any policies so conceived, we must be strong internally as well as externally. We must speak with authority. We must perform on our promises. We must be respected.

We cannot be strong internally if we are torn by two conflicting political philosophies. For some time, we have traveled a road, part socialist and part capitalistic. Just as we could not be half free and half slave, we cannot embrace at one and the same time two diverse economic and political philosophies. We are fast approaching the time when we must decide whether we are to continue under our American economic and political system, or whether we are to go into a Fascist, Socialist, or some other totalitarian form of government.

In making this decision, we should always remember that it is the combination of our political and economic systems that has provided the greatest Nation ever known to man. We, as a people, have the greatest freedom, the greatest happiness and the greatest opportunities of any people at any time. I believe it is those things which our soldiers are fighting to preserve. It is our responsibility to recognize that fact and to do everything that we, as individuals, can to protect that system internally, while they are protecting it externally.

I am proud that women the country over are recognizing this fact. I am proud of the interest that they are taking in government. I am particularly proud of the contribution that our own Congresswoman Margaret Smith is making to the country, to the party and to our sex. Her success brings greater recognition and opportunity to all women. She is a pioneer. Because of the work she is doing as a pioneer, other women will find doors open so that they, too, can make contributions to the welfare of the country.

We place great emphasis on the part that women are playing in this election. It is not, I am sure, to be interpreted that we mean men to suffer by contrast. It is only that women have been a "sleeping giant" and that they have been awakened by war. Their wrath is mighty. They are taking an interest in politics hitherto unknown. They are determined to wipe out the New Deal. At the same time, however, they want to continue some of the programs so necessary to a changing world. They are of the opinion that just because a thing is old, is no reason why it is acceptable. Just because a thing is new, is no reason that it is undesirable. They are eclectic in their thinking—they want to preserve the good and discard the bad, regardless of the sponsorship.

Women want to build on the solid philosophy of Americanism represented by the doctrines of the Republican Party. They do, however, want to have it adjusted to 1944 thinking. We realize that our social structure has changed in many respects and that just as some of us cannot get into our graduation dresses, we can no longer go back to the period in which those dresses were made. We demand 1944 implements to meet 1944 problems. We are confident that the Republican leadership will provide them for us. We are happy to be united for Republican victory which will spell future happiness and security for America. We are getting across the stream!

Preservation of Jewish People of Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 8 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] at Carnegie Hall, New York City, on Saturday, April 29, 1944, at a rally sponsored by the Emergency Committee to Save the Jewish People of Europe.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We are living in an era which history will remember as the period of greatest cruelty, of deepest anguish, of death and desolation for the peoples of the earth. Human beings created in the image of the Father have enlisted the devil as their lieutenant and plunged the world into turmoil. They let loose the four horsemen who have now been riding the skies for almost 5 years, obliterating the flower of humanity, sacrificing millions of souls upon their satanic altar of greed and lust. So many men, women, and children who wanted, more than anything else in life, to live in peace with their families and loved ones, are now buried in unmarked graves throughout the four corners of the globe. Rivers, nay, oceans of blood are flowing freely—forever to stigmatize this century with the mark of Cain. Parents are crying for their dead children. Children find themselves orphaned in a world being consumed by fire and sword.

Who is there to measure tragedy? Is the death of one different from the death of others? Is pain of one different from the pain of others? Is torture of one different from the torture of others? Yet in this world of ours, among the tortured and the beaten, among all these people who yearn for freedom and peace, now fettered with the chains of slavery, there is one whose death, whose torture, whose pain, whose anguish is worse than those of their unfortunate neighbors.

I speak of the Jew, of Europe's Jew, for his death is a hopeless one, his death is a useless one. Others there are Poles, Greeks, Frenchmen, Dutchmen, Slavs, Russians, Englishmen, Americans, Chinese, and more who are dying. They die with the knowledge that soon, soon a new day will dawn—the black clouds of despair will disappear, the light will shine once again. For them the sun has set but they know full well that a new sun will soon arise. Day follows night. But the Jew—Europe's Jew—what has he to hope for? What new sun will rise for him? What ray of light can he see through the thick walls of misery under which he is buried? Will he ever be reunited with loved ones? His loved ones weren't merely torn from him—his loved ones were torn from life itself. Even Europe's Jew who still lives and fights in all the underground movements of that unhappy continent, in the guerilla units, in the Polish forests, in the partisan units of the Yugoslavian mountain strongholds, even he is not permitted to fight as others do, for himself—but only as himself for others. The Jew, in the field of battle, in discrimination and torture, is recognized as a Jew only by the enemy. Democratic governments do not recognize him as such and thus far have not permitted him to fight in his own army; thus denying him the privilege which is due to every human being and to every member of all nations. He is recognized as a Jew only when he manages to escape and demands to enter his homeland, Palestine. By official decree of the British Government, the Jew is the only human being on earth who is not permitted to enter Palestine. Ladies and gentlemen, in the name of decency and justice, such things must be stopped.

The souls of close to 3,000,000 Jews who have already died in Hitler's hell, cry out to us: "Remember us," "save those who may still be saved—rescue those who may still be rescued. Open the doors of Palestine where they may go and give their all toward building a better world."

Palestine has been promised to the Jews as their national home. Only the greatest military necessity should be allowed to slow up the realization of this promise. The United States is a partner to that promise. If, for military, or even political reasons, it is not expedient to establish that national home or commonwealth at this time, then they should certainly be permitted to enter temporarily until such time when peace comes once again to tortured humanity and the fate of the Jew will be decided as well as the fate of many other peoples. But for the present, now—not tomorrow, but now, the gates of Palestine must be flung wide open so that each and every Jew who manages somehow to escape will be welcomed and nursed back to health and normal society.

I stress Palestine because rescue is merely a problem of geography. Of course, all Christian countries, all civilized countries should permit those who manage to escape into their territories a temporary haven until the time comes for permanent adjustments. Even if our own country were open to all escaping Jews, it would be of little immediate help, because of the barriers of many other countries they would have to pass and the ocean they would have to cross. The rescue, therefore, has to proceed along shorter and safer routes. These lead to Cyprus, to north Africa, to Turkey, and to Spain. One route, however, is shortest and surest. It leads to Palestine.

Palestine is the closest and most practical haven for the escaping Jews. Bulgaria is nearer to Palestine than New York is to Miami. It is only a few days away from the Axis countries by short, quick water routes, by train, or even by bus. The Jewish population of Palestine is the only population in the world that is ready and eager to receive Europe's Jews. The Jews of Palestine enjoy more food than any other group of people of like numbers anywhere in the world outside of North America. They have better homes, more hospitals, more schools, more doctors, and more nurses than any other people of like number anywhere in the world. This food, these hospitals, doctors, nurses, homes, and schools, they are anxious to share with their relatives who are trapped in Hitler's hell. And there is immediate room in Palestine for hundreds of thousands. Palestine today is suffering from a serious labor shortage and must have a great number of additional workers so that she may increase her already proud and conspicuous contributions to the Middle East war effort. Thus it seems there is no justification for keeping the doors of that country closed to Europe's Jews. There certainly is no justification for the anti-Jewish descrimination laws which exclude the Jews alone from entering Palestine. These people, to whom Palestine means life or death, are the only ones in all the wide world prohibited by law from entering Palestine. Decent humanity can never erase from its mind the thought of thousands of Jews, who had already entered that country, sent back to their death or to far-off disease-infested islands. Need I remind you of the Struma, the Parita, and that far-off island in the Indian Ocean, Mauritius?

The War Refugee Board which the President created, is doing a magnificent job. I am given to understand that as a result of that Board, many lives have already been saved. But I do not believe that that Board can accomplish what it was intended to accomplish—the rescue of hundreds of thousands—unless Palestine be opened as a haven. When a house is on fire with people trapped on the roof and there exists in our possession safety nets into which these threatened people may jump and save themselves from the consuming flames of the conflagration, it would be sinful for us to withhold these nets because we are not certain to whom they belong. We must permit these people to jump into the nets and then, after they are saved from certain death, decide who are the real owners of the nets. Palestine is that net of safety into which so many of them may jump. It would be contrary to the laws of God and man to withhold them from Europe's trapped Jews. As to whom Palestine shall ultimately belong, that question must be decided at the peace conference after the fires are extinguished and the people, more or less, safe.

I, for one, don't believe that these Jews will be able to return to Europe after the war. It would be asking too much of people to return once again to the territories where their loved ones were so brutally murdered; to walk the streets where crimes beyond human imagination were enacted; to rebuild homes wherein wives, daughters, and sisters were dishonored, children murdered, parents decimated before their every eyes. No, that is too much to ask of any human being! These people must be transplanted into a new life, a new environment, a land which gives promise to a new and better future, where they can rehabilitate themselves spiritually as well as physically, for one cannot be done without the other. I, therefore, wish to make myself clear.

When I say that Palestine should be opened as a haven of refuge, I, for one, do not feel that it should remain a mere temporary haven. I only say that now, while the Jew is being tortured and killed, we should put aside all political considerations and permit him to enter that land until such time when the United Nations will be in a position to solve the Palestine problem. That ultimately a Jewish state will be established, I am certain. It is a precept of my very faith—the Mormon faith teaches me that, as well as the belief that this Jewish state will be there—in Palestine—on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean; there where their warriors fought and their prophets dreamed—where their psalmists sang and their mourners lamented—there where eternal truth was created and sent to the four corners of the earth—there this "tribe of the wandering foot and weary breast" must find a haven of peace and rest. And some day, in the near future, a free Hebrew nation, nursing its wounds of freedom's battle, will stand together with all the freedom-loving nations of the earth over the ashes and ruins of the common enemy's forts and strongholds, beneath the unfurled banners of liberty, including the blue-white banner of Israel—that ancient symbol of Jewish eternity. And then, and only then, shall the swords be beaten into plowshares—and spears into pruning hooks and nation shall no longer lift up sword against nation, and man shall no longer be afraid of man. We shall then recognize that we are all brethren—all of us—all races and all creeds—that we are the children of the One Heavenly Father.

Address by Senator La Follette on the Tenth Anniversary of the Progressive Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LAFOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 8 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on May 6 and 7 the Progressive Party of Wisconsin held a convention at Milwaukee, Wis., on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of its formation. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address which I delivered to the convention on May 6.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Seventy-one years ago a young man drove up to Madison from a farm in Primrose, Wis. He drove that 20 miles with a horse and wagon to find out what preparation he needed in addition to his country schooling to enter the university. While in Madison he heard Chief Justice Edward G. Ryan deliver an address to the graduating class of the University of Wisconsin. Speaking in the assembly chamber of the capitol, the voice of this great chief justice shook with emotion as he warned the students that a new and dark power in the form of corporate wealth was looming up in the United States: "The question will arise, and arise in your day, though perhaps not fully in mine, 'Which shall rule—wealth or man; which shall lead—money or intellect; who shall fill public stations—educated and patriotic freemen, or feudal serfs of corporate capital?'"

The prophetic words of the chief justice had an enduring influence on that young man from the Primrose farm. The question arose in his day, and he dedicated his life to the answer that freemen should rule in this country. He, and the men and women who built up the progressive movement, fought steadily against this dark power of the greed of corporate wealth which began to loom up in their generation.

When this fight began the reactionaries controlled both great parties. The Progressive movement gradually won the Progressive elements in both parties. Working through the Republican Party within the State, Progressives made Wisconsin the leading laboratory of the Nation in the battle for the rights of men and women as against the vested interests of special privilege. They fought together that free patriotic men should rule—and not organized wealth.

By 1911 the progressive victories in this battle for the public good and the rights of the people had been so remarkable that after a visit to Wisconsin an ex-President named Theodore Roosevelt, was inspired to write an editorial entitled, "Wisconsin: An Object Lesson." In concluding this editorial he said, "After my visit I felt like congratulating Wisconsin upon what it had done and was doing, and I felt much more like congratulating the country as a whole because it has in the State of Wisconsin a pioneer blazing the way along which we Americans must make our civic and industrial advance during the next few decades."

This was true prophecy. The history of the decades after 1911 now shows that most of the advances which have been made in dealing with civic and industrial problems were along the trails blazed by the pioneering movement of Wisconsin.

At one National Republican Convention after another the Progressive State of Wisconsin presented minority platforms which represented the cooperative thought and work of the ablest Progressive leaders in Wisconsin and other States. These platforms were all based upon sound research. Many of the planks urged national legislation based upon principles which had been actually tried out and found effective in Wisconsin.

Again and again these Progressive platforms were jeered at, voted down or laid upon the table by the reactionaries who dominated the National Republican Conventions. But the Progressives were not discouraged. They had faith in the people. They carried their battle back to the voters of the different States.

Through La Follette's Magazine and from the platform in speeches the roll call was read on the record votes of reactionary Congressmen and Senators. Many of them were defeated. Progressive Republicans or Progressive Democrats took their places at Washington. Slowly but steadily the Progressive planks which had been hooted down at National Republican Conventions became the law of the land. By 1920, 11 of the 13 planks submitted by the Wisconsin delegates in 1908 had become Federal laws, and 15 of the 18 propositions submitted in 1912 had been written into the Federal statutes.

When we look back upon the extraordinary achievements which history now records as largely the work of Progressives in this State and in the Nation we often forget how many battles were lost before these outstanding victories were won. But some are still living who recall the beginnings of the Progressive movement and participated in its battles year after year. They know that each achievement was the result of a long educational campaign carried on at first by a courageous minority which finally grew to be an awakened majority. None of the victories was easily won. None was the work of one man alone. They have all been the product of the continuous cooperation of many men and women working together for a common ideal.

This kind of patriotic public service cannot be performed by fair-weather liberals—those who like to shop around for personal political bargains. No; this kind of service calls for high courage and personal sacrifices. The men and women who made these sacrifices in the past, and those who have made them in more recent years have all done so because of a determined purpose that freemen should rule this country.

They know that the price of liberty is eternal vigilance. The courage to carry on this long fight against what often seem great odds springs from an enduring faith. It is a faith in the ability of the men and women of this country to solve the problems of a complex industrial civilization and at the same time to maintain a government of the people, for the people, by the people.

To serve as an instrument for action in this same enduring faith the Progressive Party was organized in this State 10 years ago, on May 19, 1934. It was organized in the midst of the economic crisis of the depression which both the Republican and the national Democratic parties had failed to prevent or remedy during the years they had been in power.

In our modern industrial civilization depressions are neither acts of God nor inevitable disasters. These disasters are largely made by the shortsighted greed and the blind selfishness of the great monopoly corporations. Seeking excessive immediate profits regardless of the common good, these vast monopoly corporations and cartels limit production through the power of monopoly and interlocking financial manipulation. This policy creates huge fortunes for the few, but it brings unemployment, insecurity, and the disaster of black depression to the many.

Since in our time a depression is a man-made disaster of the greedy few it could and should be prevented by the united intelligent action of many men. The terrible depression that followed after World War No. 1 could have been avoided had the political parties in power heeded the warning and followed the program advocated by the Progressives.

The Progressive Party came into being because the progressive-minded people of Wisconsin knew they needed a more effective instrument to express their will in meeting the tragic problems of this terrible depression. During those dark years this party accomplished a great deal within the State. Had the Legislature been solidly Progressive even more could have been done within the State. It was the cooperation of reactionary Republicans and Democrats in the Wisconsin State Senate that defeated some important measures like the Progressive Governor's works program.

But many of the problems created by the economic crisis could not be solved solely within the boundaries of any one State. In the national field the Republican Party was in power until March 1933 when the Democratic Party took over and became responsible for our national policy.

In the national effort to deal with the problems created by the depression the Progressives furnished courageous and outstanding leadership. They advocated and fought for policies and legislation designed to assure and maintain individual political freedom, economic opportunity, and economic security for every American citizen. When the Democratic administration sponsored legislation directed toward these ends the Progressives cooperated. But when the Democratic administration broke its pledges to the American people and turned its back upon many of our unsolved economic problems the Progressives dared to criticize the party in power and to tell the people of this country what was happening.

The high hopes which the Democratic Party held in 1933 for many sincere Democrats and Liberals have been dimmed.

The bright New Deal with its tarnished record of failure to carry through many of its promises of a constructive program is a casualty of war as the forces of monopoly and reaction strengthen their power within the administration. The Progressives can be thankful that they have maintained their independence and have not allowed some political pied piper to lead them into the Democratic Party in Wisconsin.

At present the indications are that the Republican Party is still dominated by eastern big business and eastern financial interests just as it was in Hoover's administration. If the Republican Party comes into power at the next election and fails to meet the problems produced by this war as it did those of the last war, Progressives will again have cause to be thankful they have maintained their independence and refused to be lured into that political party as well.

We are, I believe, living through a great crisis in the history of the United States. The decisions made in dealing with the economic problems created by this war will affect our destiny for generations to come. Already many decisions have been made on the domestic industrial front which are alarming in their implications. The Democratic administration has collaborated with the reactionary elements of the Republican Party in adopting agricultural and industrial war production policies which, under cover of the war situation, speed up the growth of monopoly. In converting from a peacetime basis to a war basis the Democratic administration has capitulated to the vast corporations. A mere 100 giant corporations have secured 70 percent of the prime war contracts. They are operating a proportionate share of the $20,000,000,000 worth of new plant facilities, financed directly by the Government through R. F. C. and indirectly by the Government through tax concessions to the owners.

After the war these great corporations will be more firmly entrenched than ever before. They and the great international cartels with which many of them are allied will seek to control and limit production through patents and monopoly. It was these monopolistic forces which contributed to fascism in Europe and to bringing on the depression which followed World War No. 1.

Throughout the period of conversion from peacetime production to war production in World War No. 2 the Progressives fought to the last ditch for Government aid to small business and the equitable distribution of war contracts so that small business units could survive and carry on after the war. And we hope to reaffirm before this convention adjourns our steadfast support for Progressive alternatives to the Tory policies now so popular in our National Capital.

The Progressives have repeatedly warned the Democratic administration that the harvest of its policy of turning over production to these powerful monopolies would be another depression at the end of World War No. 2. But the warning has been ignored by the Democrats just as it was by the Republicans after World War No. 1.

Progressives are keenly aware that military victories abroad will be empty victories for the plain people of the United States if we lose the fight on the economic front either at home or abroad.

Progressives are fighting now in Congress and in their own States on the political and economic fronts so that our soldiers shall not return from military victories abroad to meet the personal defeats of a depression and unemployment at home.

I believe that the rank and file of the people of the United States know what has been happening through watching small business units fold up in their own communities. They fear what this means for the future economic independence of individual American citizens. They want equality of opportunity for all. They want continuous employment for every able-bodied man and woman who wishes work. They want this country ruled by patriotic freemen. They do not want the invisible government of vast wealth concentrated in the hands of a privileged few. They know that means excessive profits for the few and depressions for the many.

In the small towns, on the farms, and in the factories I believe men and women sense that the Democratic administration has forgotten the forgotten man and handed production over to monopoly interests. Their protest against this betrayal by the party in power will be registered in the elections through the defeat of many Democratic Representatives in Congress and on State tickets.

Progressives tried to keep us out of the war just as they tried to prevent our entry into the First World War, but on both occasions to no avail.

It was a Progressive who had the realistic vision to see where the policy of the Democratic Party was leading the United States. As far back as 1937, Congressman HARRY SAUTHOFF introduced two resolutions designed to stop the shipment of war materials to Japan.

Seven months before Pearl Harbor, HARRY SAUTHOFF predicted that while our Navy was convoying supplies to Great Britain in the Atlantic, Japan would seize the opportunity to attack us. He urged the strengthening of our own defenses in the Pacific so that Japan could not catch us off guard. Had the warning of this Progressive Congressman been heeded by the Democratic administration the disaster of Pearl Harbor could not have happened.

From the hour that the United States was attacked at Pearl Harbor the Progressives have supported our war effort. They are doing their part on every military front in World War No. 2 as they did in World War No. 1. But Progressives are also continuing to fight for their principles on the home front because they have not forgotten what happened during and after World War No. 1. They still remember the munitions investigation and the revelations of corrupt financial agreements that cut across national boundaries to put profits into the pockets of international cartels.

Progressives read and remember the secret treaties which had been entered into by our allies before we went into World War No. 1 and were published in this country after their discovery in the archives of czarist Russia. Progressives remember what happened at the Versailles peace table to the Fourteen Points announced by President Wilson as our war aims. Progressives know that the forces which worked secretly to defeat those Fourteen Points at the peace table are now at work in every country. These ruthless forces of monopolistic wealth and international cartels thrive in wartime and occupy invisible thrones at the peace tables. Fascism in Europe after the last war was one of the bastard children bred by these greedy ruthless parents.

Progressives know that they are using the war situation for undercover work of this same kind in our own country. That is the meaning of the constant campaign that has been carried on to smear the magnificent war production record of labor and agriculture and to force through legislation to conscript all able-bodied men and women. That is the meaning of the effort to impose permanent conscription upon the youth of this Nation for generations to come. Under cover of a wartime situation the conscription of labor and the universal conscription of youth for peacetime have been the cornerstones of European fascism and imperialism.

The Progressives are fighting fascism at home. They will not compromise with the forces of fascism at home or abroad, in wartime or in peacetime.

Progressives believe in cooperation at home and abroad with the forces which share their ideals for political freedom and economic opportunity, and will help to make them realities in the daily lives of the American people and the peoples of other countries. But the Progressives are realists. They know that the United States cannot buy the friendship of other nations. They do not intend to sign blank checks now to be filled in abroad later by the very reactionary and monopolistic forces they have been fighting at home for two generations. They remember the forces which, behind closed doors, wrote the peace at Versailles and betrayed the common people of this country and of other countries.

In the light of this tragic experience, Progressives will continue to oppose the unilateral determination of the boundaries of small nations by any great power as in the case of valiant Poland or other nations in similar circumstances.

Instead we shall persistently advocate the right of self-determination for small nations by plebiscites held under international supervision which will guarantee an expression of the popular will free from coercion in any form.

The great hope for the solution of Europe's complex economic, ethnic, and political problems will be realized when the governments of Europe are willing to renounce their conflicting imperialistic aims. Then the peoples of Europe can find the solutions of these problems through a confederation of States upon the basis of the experience of Switzerland and the United States.

Progressives are opposed to all efforts to commit the United States to a specific future course in world relationships so long as the people of the United States are still in the dark as to the peace demands and post-war objectives of the other United Nations including Great Britain, China, and Russia.

No sensible man or woman buys a house blindfolded. Before he buys a house to live in for many years he takes time to examine it. He examines the foundations and he looks into every room in that house before he puts down his money and signs the contract.

Progressives believe the United States should not take over a lease or rent a room in any international house until we know who is building that house, just how it is built—what the foundations are, and most of all, whether the structure is to be a haven of hope for the common man of all countries, or merely a superstockade to protect a ruthless imperialistic status quo.

No intelligent farmer buys a pig in a poke. Progressives are realists who will not cooperate in any efforts to force the United States to buy an international pig in a beautiful poke if it has been bred by the forces Progressives have been fighting at home for two generations.

Progressives will cooperate in supporting sincere efforts made by the United States' representatives at the peace table to secure a just and lasting peace. When those peace terms are settled and known to the people of the United States will be the time to consider the degree of further cooperation we can wisely enter into with other countries.

We believe that the same principles which guide our program and our action on domestic policies should govern our decisions on foreign policy. We believe that patriotic devotion to the United States of America makes it impossible to separate our foreign and domestic policies. What we do in one inevitably affects the other.

Any assistance we give to the peoples of other countries must be based upon the health and well-being of our own people. It must be based upon their power to produce abundant resources. This depends upon the policies we pursue now and immediately after the war. Our gross national debt is over one hundred and eighty-five billions of dollars. It may reach several times that huge sum. Already it means a per capita load of $1,300 for every man, woman, and child. Unless this debt is met by the Progressive policy of taxing in accordance with ability to pay it will destroy our capacity to aid the rest of the world and impose a pauperizing burden on the rank and file of our people here at home.

If American farmers are forced to kill off their dairy cows during the war because they cannot get enough men to milk them, then we cannot send milk to starving children in other countries after the war. If our industrial economy is allowed to break down again because of the limitations placed upon production by monopolistic control, we shall have depression and unemployment. If our own people are jobless and hungry they will not be able to help themselves or to help other peoples. Conversely, if we have full production and full employment, we shall be in an immeasurably stronger position to lend a helping hand to the oppressed and the needy in other lands.

A depression and unemployment can be avoided by carrying through a wise constructive program in the interest of the masses of the American people. The Progressives have such a program and will fight to put it through.

Progressives are in accord with the eminent historian, Charles A. Beard, who, after a lifetime devoted to the study of American history, has come to the conclusion that "The supreme object of American policy should be to protect and promote the interests, spiritual and material, of the American people, and subject to that mandate to conduct foreign affairs in such a manner as to contribute to the peace and civilization of of mankind."

We approach the critical hour of decision for democracy at home and abroad. Progressives have a great responsibility and a magnificent opportunity. Let us renew our faith in the dignity of man and his rights as an individual. That is the American way. That is the way marked out for us by the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution.

We can make a real contribution to our country at this time. But to make it we must keep our established Progressive traditions. We must have the courage to resist every temptation to take the easy road where it turns away from the true principles of Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, and Robert M. La Follette, Sr.

These men never yielded to the false doctrine that the end justifies the use of evil means. They knew that evil means corrupt the men who use them. They knew that the end inevitably becomes power and more ruthless power. They knew that only through democratic means can we build and preserve the democratic way of life. These men knew that the democratic way often seems the slow way. But they knew it is the only way that does not, in the end, betray the people.

I appeal to the progressives of all parties in Wisconsin to close ranks and unite in the Progressive Party for action. Let us reaffirm our determination to carry on the fight for equality of economic opportunity and individual political freedom. Let us here today rededicate ourselves to the basic principle of a progressive democracy.

"The will of the people shall be the law of the land."

Reclamation Is the Best Flood Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 8 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I note with satisfaction an editorial in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch which emphasizes the desirability of coordinated river development. "Floods and Irrigation" is the title of the editorial which I think is of particular significance at this time when the use of the waters of the Missouri River is a subject for consideration by the Committee on Commerce and ultimately by the Senate. Irrigation is the most effective type of flood control. Those residents of the Missouri River Basin who in the last few weeks have been suffering physical discomfort and financial loss because of floods would be benefited by the sort of upper-basin work contemplated in the report of the Bureau of Reclamation which the Senate last week ordered printed as a Senate document—Senate Document 191.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, together with another editorial from the same journal entitled "This Unsafe Valley."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FLOODS AND IRRIGATION

The floods which have descended again upon the Missouri and Mississippi valleys are an object lesson in the fundamental fact that we of the lower Missouri shall never have the flood control works we so desperately need until we have enlisted the cooperation of the States toward the headwaters of the river.

The cooperation of the plains States can never be attained until we of the lower valley become as sympathetic to their needs for irrigation as we expect them to be to our needs for flood control.

To our neighbors of the upper valley the flood is an object lesson too. The turbulent waters that are today our bane are waters that might to them have been a blessing—but they will never irrigate a foot of land, their usefulness is lost forever.

In order for the upper and lower sections of the Missouri Valley to work together as they must, there must be a plan unselfish and farseeing enough for all the valley States to realize an advantage in entering into it.

During the months when the Army engineers were speaking for their Missouri River development plan, calling it comprehensive, we said the irrigation States could best serve their own interests by dropping selfish sectional claims and helping to fill in the broad outlines of the plan. We argued that irrigation could thus be realized as well as flood control, navigation, power production and all the other benefits of a river-control system of engineering works.

In the 2 months during which the Army engineers' plan has been speaking for itself, it has shown itself to be not comprehensive, and in the context of other recommendations of the Army engineers, to be actually prejudicial to the irrigation interests of Montana, Wyoming, the Dakotas, Nebraska, and Kansas.

Obviously the irrigation States cannot be expected to support a plan which merely says in a general way that irrigation is a good thing, which leaves a vacant spot to be filled by an irrigation plan, and which operates—in conjunction with other proposals—to establish water priorities for navigation and against irrigation. Yet that is what the Army engineers' plan does.

The irrigation States' response to grab tactics with grab tactics—as in their unsuccessful effort to reserve the flow of the upper river for irrigation purposes—is understandable. They were fighting water with water. But all that is to be gained by selfish grasping tactics on either side is obstructionism of the whole valley's proper development.

The root of the trouble is that planning for the Missouri River is done by several Government agencies which are required by acts of Congress to press their special interests and to desist from working upon others. The Army engineers, who have flood control and navigation as their special province, are prohibited by statute from planning for irrigation, while the opposite is true of the Bureau of Reclamation.

The only really workable solution is the entrustment of the work of planning—and later of construction and operation—to an agency of Government which will be equally responsible for irrigation, flood control, and navigation, and which all the States of the Missouri Valley can rely upon to look after all their interests.

Such an agency does not now exist. It should be created. A Federal development corporation is wanted, and until it is brought into existence no planning for the Valley's future will be much more than the carrying on of an obstructionist dispute or the making of a makeshift compromise.

THE UNSAFE VALLEY

The Tennessee River throughout its length is controlled. This valley has been made safe.—David E. Lilienthal, Chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority, in T. V. A.—Democracy on the March.

The Missouri River is uncontrolled. This valley has not been made safe. Between the Great Lakes and Oklahoma, between the Great Divide and Canada, the people live in fear: To the north, of the drouth that stays always on the land; to the south, of flood.

Today, 1,000,000 of the Missouri Valley's acres lie under the wildly uncontrolled flood waters of the river in the States of Missouri and Illinois. Six thousand persons have been driven from their homes. More than a half-million acres of crops have been destroyed.

Wheat has been lost, that was to become the grain alcohol to make the synthetic rubber for our armies. Food has been swept away, that was to have fed us and our fighting comrades. Cattle and hogs safe after the flood's passing are still partly lost, for they will be sold unfattened, now that the growers lack barns and feed.

In St. Louis and St. Charles Counties alone, the crop loss is estimated at $2,000,000. In the entire Missouri Valley, the damages of the flood of the spring of 1944 are expected to be as great as the damages of the floods of the spring of 1943, if not greater; and they were estimated at $26,000,000.

How long will the anger of the people burn slowly at the deadly folly which permits the Missouri River to bring disaster to the farms and towns and cities along its banks almost every spring—sometimes doing its worst, as it has done this season; and sometimes doing less; but almost without fail bringing calamity year in, year out?

The way of controlling the wasted waters of a river and, having brought them under control, putting them to work, is described by Mr. Lilienthal in his spirited and imagination-stirring book. After T. V. A. there is no longer reason for anyone not to know how the thing is done. As its chairman says, "The T. V. A. Act was the deliberate and well-considered creation of a new national policy. For the first time in the history of the Nation the resources of a region were not only to be 'envisioned in their entirety'; they were to be developed in that unity with which nature herself regards her resources."

Yet this national policy, priceless and irreplaceable as it is to the Missouri Valley, is not only not being followed here—it is actually being foresworn. The Federal Government is going along in the old inefficient, discredited way, and without protest from the Governors of the Missouri Valley States or any of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

The consequences of this supreme effort to avoid learning by experience are now being demonstrated in Washington. The Army engineers' Pick plan has been embodied in the 1944 flood-control bill, but it is so deficient in respect to irrigation that the President and the Bureau of the Budget have requested that action on it be held up until the Reclamation Bureau can complete its 5-year study and irrigation can be made a part of the plan.

However, navigation interests—principally the Mississippi Valley Association—are not disposed to wait, and they are pressing for congressional approval of the Pick plan, though the Reclamation Bureau report has not yet been issued.

Moreover, the navigation interests are seeking to have enacted in the rivers and harbors bill a provision which would legally reserve to navigation virtually the entire flow of the Missouri. In retaliation, the Great Plains States, to which irrigation is life itself, are attempting to obtain enactment of a proviso which would reserve to irrigation all the flow of the Missouri which originates within their boundaries.

This fratricidal struggle will be joined Thursday and Friday of next week when hearings are held on the rivers and harbors bill. A rule-or-ruin attitude is indicated for the navigation interests by the assertion of Lachlan Macleay, president of the M. V. A., that irrigation interests are sabotaging flood control and that the Pick plan should be approved by Congress whether the reclamation report is ready or not.

Mr. Macleay seems to be speaking of flood control, but actually he is speaking of navigation. There is no contest between the Great Plains and the lower river on the subject of flood control. Our neighbors to the north realize we need it and they want us to have it, but they are not willing to let it be done as part of a project to grab Missouri River waters for navigation and shut off irrigation interests from the river. In short,

Mr. Macleay, and others who are primarily interested in navigation, worthy as navigation is, are actually standing in the way of flood control.

How long will the people of the valley States stand this fruitless bickering while their homes, their crops, and their lands are washed away in the stream that has become the Missouri Valley's sorrow? Of all the Representatives in the two Houses of Congress, is there not one who will have for the Missouri Valley the vision which George Norris had for the valley of the Tennessee? Patience has not only a beginning; it has an end; and the patience of the people with devastating floods is running out.

Address by Judge D. Burns Douglas to Convocation Banquet, Fort Wayne Valley, A. A. S. R.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL D. JACKSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 8 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address by Hon. D. Burns Douglas, judge of Allen Superior Court No. 2, Allen County, Ind., before the 1944 Spring Convocation banquet, Fort Wayne Valley A. A. S. R., Friday, April 28, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Illustrious deputy, most worshipful grand master, brothers, this has been a very happy occasion. We sit in the midst of plenty, peace, and joy. We are among friends. We are at home and we are not, like so many people of the earth, refugees on the face of the earth.

I want to talk to you about one of the most distinguished refugees the world has ever known. Years ago he and his captive people were working under the supervision of the earliest form of the Gestapo. This man and a fellow countryman were laboring in the fields. A Gestapo was watching them. The work of the one did not appeal to the overseer and he was beaten to death. The other rose up in his righteous wrath and slew the overseer. In 24 hours he was a fugitive from justice. He went out of that country into a rather sparsely settled territory. Being a fugitive from justice, he got himself a job that would keep him as far removed from the eyes of man as possible. He was a herder of sheep.

One day he happened to visit a remote section of his ranch and there saw a strange sight. A bush was ablaze with fire and yet it was not consumed. He walked over to examine this strange phenomenon and as he stood there wondering a voice said to him, "Moses, go down to Egypt and tell Pharaoh to let my people go." The sheep herder replied, "Who am I to go to Pharaoh, and if I go to Pharaoh, who shall I say sent me?" And the voice replied, "Tell him that 'I am' sent you."

Then followed a series of some of the most remarkable incidents in the history of mankind. In those days the Grand Architect of the universe was a very present, personal, individual being. He opened the waters of the sea that the children of Israel might pass over dry-shod. He guided them with a cloud by day; by a column of fire by night. He pitched his tent beside their tents. His glance was the lightning; His voice was the thunder. He rode on the wings of the storm; and oftentimes in the solemn solitude of the mountains He spoke quietly and intimately with men.

The prophets enunciated His will; the psalmist sang His praises; and then in the fullness of time He sent His only begotten Son to teach men how to live in harmony and friendship one with another.

The voice of the prophet is silent; the harp of the psalmist is broken; and even the great temple of Jerusalem, made forever sacred by the presence of the Man of Galilee, has long since crumbled into dust; and men have said that God has withdrawn from the world.

Brethren! What God was, He still is. What would it profit us if the rains that brought forth the spring flowers in the hills around Jerusalem no longer brought forth flowers in the hills of Indiana? What would it matter if the sun that ripened the grains in Palestine no longer ripened the grains in this great America of ours? "What God once performed, He still performs." Newell Dwight Hills wrote that the hope of these latter days is in the promise that God has reserved the richest wine for the last. For years God performed miracles by Himself. He ultimately found that the doing of such miracles profited neither Him nor the people for whom He did them. He changed the method, and working through the intellect of man, and with man's cooperation in the eternal everlasting laws which He created, His miracles are now performed. The crude tents of the Israelites have been transformed into the modern dwelling house which is at the command of almost everyone. The pool of Siloam has become a great medical clinic. The ravens of Elijah have been transformed into the giant planes bringing food, supplies, and medicines to the deserted, the forsaken, and marooned peoples of the earth. The cranky canoe of the ancients has become a giant passenger liner. The battle-ax floating on the brook of Kedron has become a battle wagon bringing vengeance or peace in a warring country—miracles wrought by the infinite intelligence of the Grand Architect of the Universe working through the finite intelligence of men, and this, all this, goes on today although civilization has exploded in our faces.

Members of this spring class, why do I bring this topic to you? I have but one purpose and one purpose only: To remind you that in every degree which you have heretofore received and in every degree which you will hereafter receive there is just one underlying thought and that thought is God—God—God. Whether it be in the lodge room or whether it be in a battle cruiser or PT boat in the Atlantic, or in the rain and mud of the islands of the Pacific, it is still God; and as our brothers go forth and have gone forth into war, their hope and our hope is in God.

Cooperative Way to Peace and Prosperity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I consider it a great honor to include with my remarks in the RECORD an address recently given by George Radin.

It is my earnest hope that every Member will carefully read this speech. It has been cut to the very bone in order to shorten it for this purpose, but I think the main outlines and emphasis are clear. In my judgment, there are two all-important messages in this address—the first is the emphasis upon the almost limitless possibilities for building economic rehabilitation and true peace in Europe on the foundation of the cooperatives of the people which they have built up through the centuries; and the second is the message which Mr. Radin's speech brings to us on behalf of the smaller nations.

Unless the real interest of those smaller nations is considered and unless everything possible is done to enable them to live together at peace and to work out their particular problems in some sort of federation, there is extreme danger that post-war governments in the small nations of Europe will drive their people back to the old system of boundary disputes, petty philosophy, narrow nationalism, and racial quarrels, and the whole pattern that has brought so much misery to the people of Europe in the past.

I am happy indeed to attend the annual meeting of the Indiana Farm Bureau Cooperative Association. In Yugoslavia I took part in many annual meetings of our cooperatives, both those of our national federation and of local cooperatives. Since I came to America 30 months ago, this is the first annual meeting of cooperatives in which I have been privileged to take a small part.

Please forgive me if I become a bit sentimental. To me, this is like a family gathering at which I, a fellow cooperator, can say things I should hesitate to express in other gatherings for fear that I might be misunderstood. After this emotional introduction I want to tell you at the outset that my coming here to be with you at this meeting is strictly business and not simply a matter of sentiment.

I am about to take your thoughts to the Balkans, across the Adriatic Sea from Italy where sons and daughters of Indiana are now facing death and will continue increasingly to come to grips with the very enemy with whom many of us here tonight have wrestled in a deadly struggle only a few years ago. Then, when armistice came, we said "never again" and proceeded to isolate ourselves, thinking we would live peacefully, each in his own way. Now we see that our interdependence is an accomplished fact. War or peace in any part of the world affects sooner or later your lives in Indiana and our lives in the Balkans; and it may be well to remember that a bullet which put an end to one form of an oppression in the Balkans started the First World War. Our problems there are really as well your problems here. That is basically the message I am bringing you this evening; and that is my excuse for taking you now to the Balkans.

In order that there be no misunderstanding on the part of anyone anywhere, let me at this point stress with full emphasis that I am here solely in my capacity as a member of the executive board of the Federation of Health Cooperatives of Yugoslovia.

Allow me also to stress here that practically everything that I am to tell you tonight has been said by me and was approved in hundreds of meetings of our cooperatives in Yugoslavia. The extent to which our people felt that I am interpreting accurately their wishes was demonstrated rather markedly when in the spring of 1940 in the town of Lazarevac near Belgrade a resolution was unanimously adopted at the annual meeting of the health cooperatives there, asking me to lead the revolt from there, the heart of Serbia, on to Belgrade to overthrow the regime which had abandoned the tradition of the people of which I am about to speak.

Our farmers said in that resolution:

"Our forefathers, with their farm implements, led by the Holy Cross, drove out of Serbia the Mohammedan conquerors a little over a hundred years ago. We must now drive out of the capital our own infidels, who have abandoned the great tradition of our fathers and have established for themselves a way of living wholly foreign to us, and who refuse to work with us."

The cooperative way of life is the inborn tradition of my people. Cooperation lies deep in their very character. When 1,500 years ago the Mongols under Attila, the Hun, dislodged my people from their homes back of the Carpathian Mountains, they gradually settled in the Balkans where they have lived ever since. The earliest records show that they had already developed a unique family cooperative way of living in their social, economic, and political structure. This way of living of my people is in all probability as old as Plato's Republic, or even much older. For that reason we hold that one of the cradles of real democracy was right within my people, although we were never able to bring this to the attention of the world because much more powerful nations have stood in our way. We have always had a special term for this democracy of ours. We call it a zadruga, which being translated means "for (your) fellow man."

Note the set-up of the original zadruga. The members are related by blood or marriage. All property of its members is joined and worked together. No one can alienate his share of commonly held property unless he or she decides to quit the zadruga, in which case remaining members of the zadruga have the first of purchase at the market price. Labor and earnings of all, either within zadruga or outside, go for the benefit of all. The business of a zadruga is managed by a stareshina, elder, elected annually by the majority votes of all members. A woman is often stareshina—especially in later years in the villages where our traveling homemaking school had worked. Farm implements and other tools of production are owned in common by all; marketing goes for the benefit of all. Each contributes in labor in accordance with his ability; the benefits each receives from the common efforts are in accordance with his or her needs. (In case of illness or when a child of a zadruga is sent to schools for a higher education, of course the needs of such member far exceeds those of other members.) Each member owns his or her share of the property, which can be cut out and identified, if he or she at any time decides to quit the zadruga. Frequently, the whole community, one or more villages, belong to the same zadruga. A person is known not so much by his own name as by the zadruga to which he belongs. In cooperation they produce and consume; they play, they sing and dance their kolo, holding hands together.

In 1895 a member of the Avramovitch zadruga from near the iron gates on the Danube, an economist, returned to Serbia from his studies in England. While there, he studied the Rochdale system of consumer cooperatives and discovered great similarity between that system and the Serbian zadrugas. He found that they both had a social as well as an economic goal and that they are not simply another way of doing business for profit. Both organizations were open to membership by all classes of urban and rural population, but the original zadruga was limited to family relationships. So, when this Serbian economist returned to his native land, he acquainted his own zadruga and others with the Rochdale practices. These practices were then introduced to form much bigger zadrugas, extending their scope and increasing the membership to include many families. Wisely, the traditional name "zadruga," so close to the hearts of the people, was retained for the new, modern cooperative as well.

When the First World War broke out in 1914, 92 percent of the people of Serbia belonged to various kinds of cooperatives. After Yugoslavia was formed in 1918, the system was introduced in other sections of the country where cooperatives had not been organized. In 1941 when Yugoslavia was attacked, approximately 7,000,000 out of the total population of 16,000,000 of all shades of life were included in one type or another of our cooperatives, although by far the majority of the members were farmers. All cooperatives were joined in 1919 into one big federation, known as Glavni Zadruzni Savez. The cooperative law of Yugoslavia of 1937 sanctioned the existing organization, so that Glavni Zadruzni Savez, Main Cooperative Federation, represents all the cooperatives of Yugoslavia, both etxernally and internally, in all broader issues that concern all.

A foreign system of exploitation, of which I speak latef, snatched the protective food from the very mouths of our children in Yugoslavia, which practice resulted not only in political disturbances that labeled the Balkans as the "powder box" of Europe, but moreover, it resulted in bad and insufficient nutrition which brought about one of the highest infant mortality and death rates from tuberculosis reported for Europe in recent pre-war years, the effect of which gave to the people of that otherwise healthy country a low average span of life. Seventy-six percent of the people live in small villages or on the land; the bulk of which is held by them in small parcels. For all of these people medical facilities were practically nonexistent. These facilities were either too far off in the cities and the patient died (often in the oxcart) before reaching a medical center, or he died because he could not afford the price of the doctor and/or the druggist. This grave situation brought about the idea of grafting a health arm onto the agricultural body through the traditional zadruga way of living of the people concerned. Whatever good has resulted or may follow from this system to humanity, I am glad to state that it came to the world from simple Serbian peasants. Being one of them and having been fortunate to be among the original founders, I naturally, take a personal pride in it. The system enables the rural population of Yugoslavia to receive some benefits from medical science, a blessing they had never had before in their history.

An analysis of the set-up of our zadrugas, such as I have tried to set forth briefly in this discussion, shows rather forcefully that it excludes dictatorship of any kind. That is why no dictator could get hold of our people in all those 1,400 years, although many attempts were made. This cooperative way of life is the reason why Serbia, which is now a part of Yugoslavia, was the last nation in the Balkans to be organized in a state. Rather than submit to dictatorial rule at a time when dictatorship was the established practice among states, my forefathers were linked in small zadruga units, and traded in a cooperative manner among themselves and with other peoples.

Christianity was brought to us in the ninth century, and it fit perfectly into our zadruga, family way of life. To this day, the village priest or minister is usually an active member of the local cooperative.

It goes without saying that our cooperative way of life precludes aggression upon or against other people or nations. Except in revolt against oppression, our people have never made war upon other people or among themselves. Their cooperative way of living made it incompatible for them ever to join hands with dictators for any exploits.

Our traditional cooperative way of life saved the people of Yugoslavia from ever living on the exploitation of other people. They were never parasites, since they never exploited others. Being true cooperators they had never lived on dole nor had they ever been a nation of beggars, a condition which they expressed in their Magna Carta in 1349.

This cooperative way of life has demonstrated over the centuries that in cooperation men can be governed without might. In a society in which the greedy profit motive is eliminated, where individuals elect annually bodies which govern by and for the people concerned, who are constantly and effectively in control of all that vitally affects them—in such a set-up democracy lives by works, not words, and people in it are governed by self-discipline and right and not by might.

Some of you may wonder how it is that you were not already well acquainted with this old cooperative way of life of the people of Yugoslavia.

The fact is that Yugoslavia is rich in natural resources. Its agricultural land and climate are excellent. There are big and well known mineral deposits and rich forests. The country is inhabited by a sturdy, industrious population.

All this attracted greedy foreigners. Hungary and Austria subjugated the people and the land of Croatia and Slovenia in the eleventh and twelfth centuries and kept them under their heel until the end of the First World War, 1918. The people of Serbia succeeded better in resistance, preserved their liberty, and developed their zadruga way of life and their own fairly high civilization until the middle of the fifteenth century, when they, too, succumbed to the Turks.

Croats and Slovenes slaved for their foreign masters for almost a thousand years. For a period of some 400 years big Turkish landlords took for themselves everything that the Serbian people produced that was worth having. In vain during those four centuries did the Serbian people appeal to the Christian nations of Europe to help liberate them from the Mohammedans, pointing out that Serbia had fallen in the struggle for the common cause. No one would come near them until they, without outside help, drove out the foreign exploiters. But the moment Serbia was again free, foreign nations commenced to meddle into the country's internal affairs with schemes to exploit the people and the land in much the same manner as the Turks had done, only more efficiently. We read of the complaints made by the consul of a great power in Serbia in the nineteenth century to the effect that his Austrian and Russian colleagues were "interfering" in Serbia internal affairs, whereas all that he did at the time was to offer "friendly advice" to the Serbian authorities.

Well, such "friendly" advice has never ceased. It is being offered now more generously than ever, although, as always, unsolicited. Foreign concession hunters and traders, aided by their official representatives in Belgrade, were instrumental in introducing a different way of life among a handful of our city folk. A life that results from domination, exploitation, and competition.

In order that they might succeed better in exploiting the people and the resources of the country, foreigners induced some of our own people to become their agents and help them carry on the exploitation. They selected young boys and girls, sometimes orphans, and sent them to be educated in foreign countries. These students in turn adopted the way of living of their benefactors and, when they returned, they joined the foreigners in their exploitation, to help maintain such foreign way of living. You will be sorry when I tell you that our people met some of such foreigners in the capacity as relief workers in the last war.

Besides, Yugoslavs were obliged to send their children to foreign countries for education. The centuries-old struggle for liberty had left the Nation without sufficient of the necessary higher training schools, and young men went to foreign countries to study. Some such students learned, while studying in foreign countries, foreign ways of living, which they adopted and tried to imitate when they returned among their own people, although their undeveloped country could not afford to support it.

Some of these, Yugoslavia's own native sons but foreign students, are now busy, far away from their own people, trying to help their foreign supporters to create a condition which might enable them to return to Yugoslavia when the war is over and resume their old exploits.

I complained above about the multiple unsolicited advice that goes to the people of Yugoslavia constantly, both with regard to the war effort and in respect to post-war.

In all frankness, I wish to submit to you and through you to all cooperators in the world—and thank God we number close to a third of the people of the earth—that we do not need advice from our great allies as to the kind of political, economic, and social life that is best fitted for us. We feel strongly that our cooperative way of life is superior to the way of life of many of those who are now giving us unsolicited advice, and who have been trying to force upon us different ways of life. Then let us introduce together the experiences you have gained in agricultural practices in a peaceful development of a century and a half.

Unfortunately, our cooperatives have ventured but very little until now in industries. Such industries as we have had were operated mostly by foreigners for their own benefit, and not in the best interest of our people. Foreign concessionaires and traders took out of the country our minerals in raw state, allowing our people to participate only as laborers for low wages. I was particularly happy to learn that your cooperatives have invaded the industrial branches of your economic life, as well as agriculture. Perhaps we could combine our councils to insure the success of cooperative ventures in some industries in Yugoslavia.

However, all our lofty plans and cooperative operations may come to naught if the cooperators of the world should continue their timid attitude toward the broader aspects of world affairs. For us to say that our final goal is an international cooperative commonwealth and to do almost nothing more than talk about it is, to my way of thinking, not doing our duty.

Necessity and expediency compelled the Rochdale weavers to proclaim their neutrality in politics. This principle has been wisely followed in other countries by national cooperatives in their home politics as well as by the International Cooperative Alliance in London, until this war. However, the cooperative movement in the world is today the greatest world organization of the people. It has grown far in area and in scope from the days of the Rochdale pioneers and I wonder whether the wisdom which compelled them to proclaim their principle of neutrality does not demand of us today an initiative on the road to world peace and prosperity. Unless we have peace, all our cooperative plans may be frustrated again at any time.

As to that, it may be well for me to tell you what the cooperatives of the Balkans have done in pre-war years which has had a tremendous influence for peace in that part of the world. In fact, as late as the middle of 1940, the London Times observed that the Balkans were the quietest spot on earth. Yet not often do you read or hear that the cooperators of the Balkan countries, notably those of Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, with their cooperative trading and friendly demonstrations on a huge scale created a public opinion which compelled their respective governments to enter into a treaty for everlasting peace and friendship. But for Hitler and other foreign meddlers, those people would be dealing today and living together as good neighbors.

What the cooperators in the Balkan countries accomplished in that part of Europe between the two World Wars, the cooperators of the world could attain in the world at large—and much more. Cooperatives with their enormous membership reach today practically every corner of the globe. That is a power which should be exerted in the interest of the peace of the world, a goal preached by prophets of peace ever since political consciousness of man has been recorded.

Until now, there were two outstanding influences struggling to maintain peace and their own security. Both failed because they both labored in the interest of one class or of one race in a nation. Both tried to enforce peace by force and both ended in disaster for mankind.

One was through seizure of power by a single state; the other, through a more complicated system of a work of art, known as balance of power. The first example was that of the Roman Caesars, aped now by Hitler and his gang. As to the other, it is by international cooperation and not by balancing might against might that lasting peace is assured among all good neighbors.

Both devices caused untold suffering to the masses of humanity, not only of other nations, but also in the State from which the practice emanated. Both systems failed because both were based upon the domination of other peoples and their resources by a single power and its associates for selfish, non-Christian purposes of the dominating powers. These two systems are now again bleeding the world in a deadly struggle for success or survival. If our cooperative tradition has taught us anything over centuries of suffering (and I assure you that you gain a good deal of wisdom in suffering), then both contendents must fail.

People will not stand for domination and exploitation of man by man. We want to cooperate in the world as equals because we feel that each of us has contributed his share for the welfare of man. Serbia gave by far more lives per capita in the First World War than any of her allies. And in the present war Yugoslavia has paid until now with more lives per capita than even Russia, and tremendously more than any other of our allies. Should the people of Yugoslavia therefore claim for themselves a more privileged place at the future peace conference? Our cooperators say "no." But they do assert that the recognition given to small nations as equal partners on the battle front during war should be extended them to an equal degree in time of peace. We should end all domination and exploitation of man by man in favor of cooperation as equals in the interest of man. That is, I believe, the only way of peace and prosperity in the world.

This, however, will not come about and our sons and daughters will continue to be dispatched to the jaws of death and the mouths of hell unless we, the cooperators of the world, do something about it. The time has come for us to abandon the complacent political neutrality and to take an initiative in the peace and prosperity to come. If we are determined in our mission, the long-craved brotherhood of man, irrespective of race, color, or religion, will come on earth and the prayer of our Lord will become a reality. But that means, immediate action, showing and demonstrating to our own members and to others what an enlightened self-interest of the people for the people really means. The International Cooperative Alliance in London has made a modest beginning when it expressed its desire to be associated with those who will be sitting at the next peace settlement. However, a mere expression of such a desire will not bring about the desired result if history is a guide. Cooperative public opinion must secure for us the place we deserve there. Cooperatives must have the machinery for guiding public opinion. Unless we arrive at this peace cooperatively, this war will again have been in vain.

It can be done; it will be done if we are determined. You cooperators of this great Nation are free and sufficiently powerful to act. The enslaved cooperators of the world look to you now for action. They have faith in you. This is a historic opportunity. Please do not miss it. With the help of God and your determination, our cooperative banner, which stands for peace, prosperity, and brotherly love, may soon wave in a happier world than any we have yet known.

Principles Involved in Montgomery Ward Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, along with most other Members of Congress, I am receiving a very large number of letters and messages from my congressional district protesting against the seizure of Montgomery Ward & Co. by the Government. This was a most regrettable occurrence and this arbitrary action is doing much to destroy the unity of thought, purpose, and action which is so essential to the war effort at the moment. As the zero hour approaches for the great European invasion our people, especially those who have dear ones in the European theater, are most disturbed, anxious, and, in many instances, even distressed.

My attention has been called to an editorial written by Mr. Arthur State, editor of the Ann Arbor (Mich.) News, one of the leading out-State dailies in Michigan. This editorial is temperate and is well worth reading, and pursuant to the authority given to me, I include it in these remarks. The editorial is as follows:

PRINCIPLES INVOLVED IN MONTGOMERY WARD CASE

Two important decisions in the Government seizure of the Montgomery Ward & Co. Chicago properties are watchfully awaited by Americans interested in the legal status of the situation and in the labor dispute between the company and the C. I. O.

These decisions are to be rendered respectively by Federal Judge Holly and by Montgomery Ward employees.

Judge Holly's decision will be technically on the question of whether the injunction obtained by the Government to restrain officials of the company from interfering with Government management shall be continued or dissolved. But it also will determine the principle of the national administration's right to seize a retail store, so far as the Federal court is concerned. It is questioned whether Congress, enacting legislation empowering the President to make seizures of war production plants during wartime, if necessary in order to avoid interference with the manufacture of munitions and mechanisms necessary to prosecution of the conflict, intended to give him similar authority in regard to retail stores.

Congress ought to know what it intended, and it may be necessary for the national legislative bodies to take action clarifying their attitude on the subject. But, of course, there is also the question of constitutionality, which ultimately must rest on a Supreme Court interpretation. Congress does not have the power to enact legislation violating any provision of the Constitution.

TWO QUESTIONS OF LEGALITY

So there appear to be two questions of legality to be settled—whether Congress intended to authorize seizure of stores as well as manufacturing plants, and whether the Constitution permits it, regardless of what Congress may have intended.

It is high time that these matters were cleared up. In addition, the power of the War Labor Board to enforce its orders should be settled in one way or another. The Board ordered Montgomery Ward & Co. to renew a C. I. O. contract, and the organization declined to obey, asserting that a majority of its employees did not belong to the union and that therefore the union no longer was entitled to bargaining rights. The W. L. B. seized the property as a means of enforcing its order.

If the Board has the right to seize private property to enforce its orders directed to the company, what shall be its attitude in regard to failure of union strikers to obey W. L. B. edicts?

With respect to this phase of the question, it will be remembered that during the mine strike this same Board ordered President John L. Lewis' United Mine Workers to return to work. The order was not obeyed, and the mine properties, and not the properties of the disobeying labor organization, were seized.

REMOVED BY FORCE

Sewell L. Avery, chairman of the Montgomery Ward firm, was removed forcibly by soldiers from his offices when he rejected the Board order, and his offices were taken over by the Government. But when the mine union failed to obey the back-to-work order, John L. Lewis was not ejected from his offices and no properties of the labor organization were seized. Whether such procedure should work only one way is a question that might reasonably be asked now, though it is to be doubted that Judge Holly can cover this phase of the situation in the opinion he is expected to render next Monday.

The merits of the labor dispute resulting in the Montgomery Ward seizure must be considered as something aside from the principles involved from the public point of view. One of the fundamental principles, in which all citizens should be interested, is that of civil rights during wartime in localities where martial law has not been proclaimed and where the relationship of the involved properties to the war effort is not precisely clear.

The forthcoming election by employees ought to settle the argument in regard to bargaining power, but the principles of the case must be handled by unbiased and wise authorities on the legal aspects.

It must be generally recognized that any reasonable, authoritative constitutional action that is necessary to the prosecution of the war, in any instance in which there is hindrance or threats of hindrance, is justifiable. What remains to be determined by the proper authorities in the Montgomery Ward case is whether the Government acted reasonably, according to the empowering act of Congress and to constitutional provisions, and whether the seizure was necessary.

Perhaps it was fortunate that the incident occurred, in the long view, for it is highly desirable to have a test case that can bring about definite decisions that can be utilized for guidance in the future.

One Hundred and Fifty-third Anniversary of the Polish Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER H. WENE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. WENE. Mr. Speaker, let us pause a moment in the present world turmoil to pay homage to a great and courageous nation—Poland—on the occasion of the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of her constitution. Though the victim of wanton Nazi aggression on that memorable day, September 1, 1939, a tragedy unparalleled in the history of the world, Poland will emerge from it all a stronger and more determined freedom-loving nation, as a close ally of our own American Republic.

And while Poland suffers let us not forget that the restoration and rehabilitation of that persevering nation is one of the objectives to which we, as a principal power, have dedicated our great responsibility and our great authority. After the last war, when the prospects for Polish sovereignty were less tangible than today, the United States was largely instrumental in securing for her the opportunities of political and economic independence. Her achievements were rewarding both to our faith and our generosity. Today, Poles are fighting side by side with us on all fronts in the gigantic struggle for righteous independence, including many thousands of Americans of Polish extraction.

It was a little more than 4½ years ago when the world was startled and Poland momentarily stunned by the realization that an enemy who even before the onslaught, posing as a friend, pounced upon a peaceful people with weapons and a military might which he had been preparing for a quarter of a century. It was to be "der tag," the day of ultimate triumph for one Herr Hitler, a crystal gazer, who saw a terror-stricken world before him, at his feet in abject slavery; a pipe dream—a figment of a weird imagination.

The invasion of Poland cost that nation 2,500,000 dead. The same proportionate loss to our country would be about 9,700,000—a figure approximately corresponding to the size of our armed forces at present. This is not a juggling of figures. It helps one comprehend the size of the sacrifice which one nation must make when an Adolf Hitler is permitted to guide the destiny of another nation. It is only when we see the picture in such sharp outlines as this that we can truly observe "what a small world it is after all."

But the total of the Polish war dead is a relatively small part of the Nation's sacrifice. In total war the dead are the least of the casualties. Another 500,000 have been deliberately starved to death by the German occupation authorities since 1939. More than 2,000,000 Poles have been sent to Germany for forced labor. Another 1,600,000 have been uprooted from their homes and agricultural pursuits to the no-man's land of the so-called government general. Some 1,500,000 were deported to Soviet territory. So the real casualties number 8,000,000 victims.

In this the fifth year of the war, Americans and Poles side by side, let us say, as two of the peoples who have subscribed to a military and rehabilitation program underwritten by thirty-odd like-minded nations, there must be some basis on which we can jointly see these figures in the true perspective. If we may judge by the experience of the last war, it is going to bring such nations as ours, in spite of the 5,000 miles between us, closer together. It may be that as part of a steadily broadening concept of the brotherhood of man, two such nations will come to know each other better, and better serve each other's interests.

Between the two World Wars Poland learned a good deal about America, seeking to emulate our national pattern in many ways, learning our methods and seeking out commercial and cultural contacts with us. This tendency was reciprocated on a relatively small scale, because of our preoccupation with the economic vicissitudes of depression and recovery. On the other hand, during the present war, a good many thoughtful Americans have undertaken some further study of Polish problems, largely in the political field. If the results have been inconclusive, the outlook is nevertheless a bit more promising. Both nations have learned much-retarded lessons from the experience gained in the past 4 years. Americans have learned to look beyond the immediate horizon; the Poles have learned to look ahead.

At least in one direction, mutual understanding in the past seems to have been hampered by the American impression that the Poles "lived in the past," a vernacular expression implying that they had a somewhat exaggerated historical sense. Students of European history can find an answer to that easily enough. Polish history reaches well back into the past. In the fifteenth century it was the largest state in Europe. Its record as a national entity dates back to the tenth century. For a thousand years this Christian fortress on the eastern frontier of continental Europe has nearly single-handed acted as the bulwark against the periodically rising tide of Asiatic ambition and depredation threatening to engulf Europe.

It would seem somewhat remarkable, but for one fact, that most Americans have the vaguest ideas of Polish history; indeed even among the educated classes a preponderant majority seem to harbor the notion that Poland's history as a sovereign state began in 1918 or thereabouts. The most plausible explanation is that during the century of America's principal growth and development, if not essentially of her greatness, the nineteenth, Poland did not appear on the maps as a nation at all. Between the three partitions of the late eighteenth century and her resurgence as a republic after Versailles, the 12,000,000 Poles increased to 35,000,000 during their 122-year struggle for liberation from the bondage of three mighty empires.

It does not require fervent nationalism to appreciate why the white eagle of Polish independence should strongly symbolize political freedom, cultural autonomy, and the sovereignty of statehood to a people whose past has been almost continuously devoted to self-defense and self-preservation in the face of the persistent rival imperialism of the three black eagles of Russia, Prussia, and Austria.

That is Poland's part, and no wishful thinking can controvert its implications. Poland, like Russia, must be regarded today not in the light of the past but as a protagonist of the present. Poland, now the sixth largest country in Europe, is a member of the United Nations' family, a near neighbor politically and socially of all the other Allied Nations, whose cultural and productive resources must be reclaimed from the tyranny of Hitlerism and reestablished as an integral part of the orderly community which European society hopes to achieve after victory has been won.

After almost complete destruction of her physical resources following the last war—and very little financial assistance from abroad; about 15 cents per capita per annum as against $1.10 Germany received—she increased her agricultural acreage by 11,362,000 acres; she increased the number of her locomotives from 1,750 to 5,500; her freight cars from 30,000 to 164,000; and the length of her highways by 30 percent. The 1918 Poland possessed not a single ship; in 1939 she had more than 500 merchant vessels. She opened 23,000 primary schools and 2,400 technical training schools. Nearly 2,000,000 acres of large land holdings were broken into smaller peasant-owned farms. Her electric power installations increased threefold; she reached fourth place among the world's coal exporters; she manufactured textiles and other goods for shipment to 42 countries. Her per capita production rose 29 points; the purchasing power of wages rose 6 percent; she established a comprehensive social-security program and her death rate decreased from 16.7 per 1,000 inhabitants to 14. The tonnage of traffic at her Baltic ports increased from 10,157 to 17,900 tons annually.

Poland's capacity to look ahead, to build her future upon the firm foundations of democracy and progressive economy, appears demonstrable from every indication of her record between the two wars and her sacrifices in this one. Once again Poland looks to the friendly American initiative which may enable her to take up the rights and duties of statehood where she left off.

We do not need to be reminded that she had to leave off in the middle of her greatest work, because she recognized the implications of Hitlerism and faced the reckoning squarely. Polish integrity, the nation's priceless ingredient, was never compromised, either during the 10 years in which Hitler tried to seduce Poland into joining him in his campaign against Russia, nor today when the Poles are ready to fight again on every one of their homeland's battlefields.

Poland's flags will always bear the ancient and honorable legend "For your freedom and ours."

And so, as we give appropriate recognition to a stalwart nation on the occasion of its national holiday, let it inspire a new courage in the men and women who are everywhere fighting for the most precious of liberties, and let it give new hope to those whose spirit is bolder for their faith in a better world to come. And I call upon you my colleagues in the House of Representatives, and Americans everywhere, to let the Poles know that they are not fighting in vain. Poland has just as much right as we have to life as a peaceful nation in a peaceful world. Let us all maintain our courage for the day of deliverance is not far off.

Rationing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Bay City (Mich.) Times of May 5, 1944:

RATIONING

(By Mark Foote)

WASHINGTON.—What is the reason for the remarkable double flip-flop executed by the administration in respect to meat rationing? While action was welcome news to every citizen, questions naturally arise as to why the delay in relaxing restrictions. What new facts as to the situation with respect to food supplies, now being regulated by eight departments and bureaus, suddenly came to light which were not known before?

That the change with respect to meat was a hasty decision is proven by the May 6 issue of Collier's Weekly in which Chester Bowles, O. P. A. Administrator, had a signed article declaring that no relief from meat rationing could be expected until 1945, and perhaps later. Under the heading "When will rationing end?" he makes prophesies as to various staple products. As to meat he said:

"Some relief in 1945 (with luck) and possible end when the war in Europe is over." Explaining this statement he continued: "Recently the Canadian Government removed meat from rationing. This caused a lot of people in this country to think that O. P. A. would take the same action. The situation in this country and Canada, however, is totally different.

"Meat rationing will be with us until several months after the end of the war in Europe. Our armed forces will continue to require huge quantities of meat even after the war shifts into the Asiatic area. With luck in the latter part of the war, however, meat rationing may be eased and perhaps eliminated entirely."

The implication is strong that the order to ease meat rationing came from the White House, being transmitted to Administrator Bowles by James F. Byrnes, sometimes referred to as the "Assistant President." Whether the order was motivated partly by politics is problematical.

When Mr. Bowles wrote the article for Collier's, he must have known of the vast stores of meat. At a press conference he explained that statistics from the Food Administration indicate that 68,500 hogs were glutting western terminals Wednesday, embargoed from admission to stockyards. The reason—packing plants, shipping facilities, and warehouses, like a continuous assembly line from the farms to the fighting fronts, are jammed with pork products.

Speaking before a Senate committee Thursday, R. W. Olmstead, Deputy Director of the Food Administration, said that the surplus not only of pork but of 14 or 15 other commodities is so great that it will be impossible to maintain ceiling prices for them except through a complete removal of rationing restrictions.

The Army, Navy, and lend-lease have on hand all the food they can dispose of during the next few months, it was revealed. One embarrassing complication arising from the Bowles order is that the War Department is preparing to demand that 400,000 farm boys under 22 years of age, deferred from the draft on the grounds of food shortage be called forthwith into the military service. The demand will have strong backing as a means of relieving the draft drain on married men with families.

At his press conference, Mr. Bowles' attention was called to estimates of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics that if meat rationing is removed, American civilian consumption would jump to from 160 to 170 pounds per capita annually. Bowles remarked that the Argentinians consume 200 pounds per capita, leaving the inference that Americans were invited to emulate them. Certainly the country will now launch on the greatest meat-eating spree in history.

It is enviable that relenting in meat rationing should be tied in with the Roosevelt fourth-term drive. The criticism has often been made that rationing was in effect when there is in the country the greatest population of meat animals in history. Dissatisfaction with the situation was emphasized when there was a reduction in the ceiling price of hogs with the purpose of making it more profitable to sell corn for industrial purposes than to feed it to livestock.

Curtailment of meat rationing will tend to take the minds of the people off the Montgomery Ward affair. Robert Hannegan, new Democratic chairman, after a tour of the West told friends that the seizure of this plant was injuring Democratic election prospects.

His Guidance and Protection

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL D. JACKSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 8 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short article prepared by a beloved philosopher of Indiana, French Quinn, published in the Fort Wayne Journal-Gazette, and reprinted on the front page of the Christian Science Monitor.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIRROR OF WORLD OPINION—HIS GUIDANCE AND PROTECTION

May from the bottom of every heart every day go forth a fervent prayer to Almighty God that these soldier champions of ours shall have His help, comfort, guidance, and high protection, that they may do those things which they have set out to do.

We shall be resolved that they shall not come home cynical, disillusioned, and brittled by war but shall come home clean and strong, and with a consciousness of duty well done and that quality of American citizenship that they may bind up the Nation's wounds and hold intact our country's great ideals. (French Quinn, of Decatur, Ind., as quoted in the Fort Wayne (Ind.) Journal-Gazette.)

Address on Conservation by Hon. Claude R. Wickard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR CAPPER
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 8 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Claude R. Wickard, Secretary of Agriculture, before an annual North American Wildlife Conference in Chicago, Ill., April 25, 1944. He presented a matter which I consider of vital interest to the future of the Nation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This Nation should, as soon as possible, develop in detail a more comprehensive plan for the conservation and restoration of our soil and forest resources than is now in effect. At the very latest, this plan should be ready to be put into effect whenever unemployment occurs. Utilization in the post-war period of possible surplus manpower in a well-organized conservation program will give tremendous impetus to present efforts to restore and conserve our soil and forest resources.

In a comparatively short time, this Nation has become the most influential power in the world. In addition, our standards of living has become the highest in the world. We have achieved these results because we have been an energetic and ingenious people in a land of vast natural resources. In the processes of our national development, we have drawn upon our resources aat a rapid rate; during the war, the rate has increased sharply. Today, because of a scarcity of certain raw materials, we are becoming alarmed. In one sense, it is well that we are alarmed because it means we are aware of danger. In another sense, there is no need for alarm because it is still within our power to prevent the exhaustion of our resources. We can, through aggressive conservation measures and at comparatively little cost, restore, conserve, and rebuild our renewable resources in such a way as to assure our continued preeminence as a world power. Likewise we can provide sufficient natural resources to maintain a high standard of living.

Now I want to make one thing plain. I am one who believes we must have high industrial activity in this country. I believe we must have high farm and forest production. High production not only means providing enough of the things of life for all to maintain a good standard of living; it also means providing employment and income for consumers so that they can afford a high standard of living. It is my sincere hope that through the initiative, and resourcefulness of private enterprise, we can maintain high employment. But I am being only realistic when I say that there may be times when there may not be opportunity for gainful employment in private industry for all who wish to work.

For reasons too obvious to require repeating, the Government should stand ready to provide additional employment opportunities at such times. My plea is to do it by furnishing jobs in endeavors which will not only permit the country to grow, but which will provide the resources to maintain happy and prosperous people for generations to come. To do this effectively and efficiently, we must make plans now.

At the out set I referred to the conservation of our soil and forest resources. I should like to talk about soil resources first. It is imperative that we stop soil depletion in its tracks. We can't maintain, over any reasonable period, a nourishing and appetizing diet for our people if we continue to drain away the productive capacity of the soil. I say that in spite of my conviction that for temporary periods, and especially during the first decade or two after the war, we may have food surpluses insofar as the needs of our own country are concerned.

Erosion is the saboteur of our soil resources. Since this continent was first settled, about one-third of its topsoil has been lost through the devastating processes of erosion. All too often erosion has gnawed away the topsoil, leaving only raw clay or sand or gravel. In many places, gullies have shredded the land, leaving deep scars on the face of the earth. This waste of soil costs the United States billions of dollars annually. And the further tragic part of the story is that where erosion takes place, the standard of living always goes down. Through the ages, poverty has followed in the wake of erosion.

Loss of soil and its fertility has also caused widespread damage on the western range. Present safe carrying capacity is judged to be only about half of what it was when the toll grass of the range swept the stirrups of our pioneer forefathers. Deterioration of the cover of vegetation has exposed the soil so that over 500,000,000 acres of the western range is affected by erosion. Deterioration is a symptom of overuse, especially during critical periods, such as droughts.

The conservation movement in this country, to check the loss of soil, did not really get underway until about 10 years ago. The erosion problem was forcefully brought home to the Nation when the dust storms began to darken the noonday skies over State after State. Those clouds of soil did much to draw public attention to the erosion problem. As a result of that attention, Congress passed legislation which brought into being the first concerted effort to combat soil erosion on a Nation-wide scale. Since that time, much progress has been made through the programs of Federal, State, and local agencies. Through technical and other assistance to farmers, nearly 10 percent of the farm land of the country has already been protected against erosion. By all reasonable reckoning, this is a permanent and complete protection. On much of the other farm land of the country, less intensive conservation measures have been employed.

In the last 10 years we have perhaps made more progress in the soil conservation field than in all our previous history. But even so, about 90 percent of our complete conservation job still remains to be done. We were so late in starting, and so much damage has been done.

To show something of the size of this soil conservation job that needs to be done, here are some figures compiled by the Soil Conservation Service. According to preliminary estimates, it would take a force equivalent to around 500,000 men working a year to do the necessary work on the big soil conservation jobs—those requiring rather large crews of men and using big equipment. In this class are such tasks as drainage, flood control, clearing, quarrying of limestone, improvement of irrigation systems, and control of erosion along highways and stream banks. Mind you this estimate does not include the large amount of labor that could be used in carrying out conservation work on individual farms and ranches.

Now I should like to talk about the depletion of our forest resources. Conservation of forest resources became a live issue at the opening of the twentieth century—many years before soil conservation came in for serious study. During that time we have learned much about the problem of forest conservation, and have made some progress toward solving them. As a Nation, however, we haven't come to grips with those problems on a scale which would effectively cope with the processes of depletion.

Of all agricultural resources, it is upon forestry that the pressure of war has fallen hardest. The heavy wartime demand for lumber and other products of the forest has notably accentuated the drain upon our timbered lands. Destructive cutting and premature liquidation of young timber are widespread.

Lumber and pulp for making paper are critical materials today. Although shortages of manpower and equipment loom large in the immediate picture, the stringency is due in part to failure, in the past, to provide for a continuous growth of all sizes of the most valuable of trees in various parts of the country. We were too blinded with the apparently inexhaustible supply of virgin timber to recognize, in time, the ultimate effects of clean-sweep logging. Those operations moved like a giant scythe across the Nation. The after-effects of such cutting are still with us in the cut-over areas of the Great Lakes States and in many other areas. Such unwise practices were little less destructive than the present-day, scorched-earth methods of a ruthless wartime enemy.

The present drain upon our sawtimber is almost twice the current growth. Even in normal peacetime we used up our forest resources at a rate far faster than nature was replacing them. Fire, which has in the past taken such a terrific toll of our timber, is still an enemy to be recokoned with. Almost 140,000,000 acres of private and State-owned forest land have no protection whatever from fire, and additional large acreages suffer from inadequate protection.

Of the commercially productive forest land on farms and in other private ownership, 58,000,000 acres have poor stocking of small growth or none at all. A large part of this acreage must be replanted before it can become productive. Considerable acreage in public ownership should also be replanted, and stand-improvement cuttings are needed to improve the growing conditions on other large areas in State and national forests.

Now let's take a look at the estimates of labor requirements to do the part of the forest-conservation job that requires large numbers of workers. The Forest Service has estimated that it would take around 500,000 men working 1 year to accomplish just the larger jobs, such as installing fire-control facilities, constructing timber and other forest utilization roads, planting forest trees, and improving timber stands. Like the soil-conservation estimates, this does not include labor requirements of the smaller forest-conservation jobs that are just as important, in many respects, as the big projects.

Thus the opportunity and need for employment in forest work is also huge. Even a glance at this farm and forestry situation, in its broad aspects, reveals a tremendous post-war job ahead—constructive work that is needed to provide and maintain a firm base upon which our Nation can continue to meet the needs of an increasing population and an expanding economy. These measures are in the public interest, even though much of the work to be done is on lands in private ownership.

We have the know-how and the experience to immediately undertake conservation and restoration operations in various fields on a large scale. But unless we wage an all-out war on erosion and depletion, the conservation job will drag out, on a hit-or-miss basis, over a long period of time. We need to capitalize on every opportunity to speed the job. That is why we must be prepared to take advantage of whatever extra manpower becomes available for this constructive purpose in the post-war period.

We know that the productive capacity of our lands and forests can be improved because of the constantly increasing number of successful examples. On farms, where conservation farming is practiced, row-crop yields have increased 10 to 50 percent per acre. Yields per acre of small grains have increased 25 percent and livestock capacity per farm has increased up to 100 percent. Appreciable acreages of industrial timber holdings are being managed according to good forestry practices. Very attractive annual growths per acre are being obtained on these lands in contrast to relatively lower increment on adjacent holdings, where the growing stock is badly depleted.

An all-out conservation program also would offer greater enjoyment of life through increased recreational facilities. Most of us like and enjoy the out-of-doors. We like to see things grow. We like to hunt and fish. A program which would conserve our soil, water, and forests would also have a highly beneficial effect on wildlife. We have come to realize that wildlife conservation cannot be achieved by measures of protection to limit the kill but requires constructive management just as is the case with soil and forest resources.

The implications for maintaining and increasing all forms of wildlife are impressive on the 40,000,000 acres now in cultivation which are actually unsuitable for crop use. This land should be turned over to grass and trees at the earliest practicable opportunity.

In thinking of the problems of maintaining and restoring the productive capacity of our resources, we need to think largely in terms of controling water. In addition to helping to solve the conservation problem, control of water stabilizes stream flow and thus adds to our water-power facilities, reduces flood damage, and aids navigation.

The nature of the water problem varies in different parts of the country. In the East, as is well known, the question may center around what to do with too much water. How are we to protect sloping lands against the washing of frequent and, often, heavy rains? Forest lands should not be exposed by extensive clear cutting. For croplands, the solution frequently takes the form of cultural methods which involve contouring, strip cropping, and maintenance of cover crops. In much of the West, of course, the problem is different. There it is the question of how to conserve occasional heavy rains for use in dry periods.

We all know that water which is permitted to wash, in torrents, off the land not only is lost to plant use, but it also carries with it valuable soil. The silt which chokes the creeks and rivers of the Nation and fills up the reservoirs behind dams is but a grim reminder of waste which, by and large, can be prevented. The mudded waters of streams are unmistakable signs that erosion is still winning out over conservation. Soil that is protected by conservation farming practices like terracing—and by trees and vegetative growth—will absorb water where it falls. It is only soil that is unprotected—exposed to the ravages of rain—that we see conveyed downstream in silt-laden waters.

The benefits to be derived through the conservation and restoration of our soil, and particularly our forest resources, offer hope and encouragement for the future well-being of our people through new industrial utilization of these resources. The products of the soil and forest offer new sources of liquid fuels, food, feed, cellulose, textile fibers, starch, plastics, a large number of chemical products, building materials, and the energy for increased mechanization and better living. These are a few of the products which hold tremendous potentialities for the future.

The crops that grow on the land, perpetually capable of being harvested and used, are sources of energy without conceivable limit. When they are harvested and used properly, the yield does not decrease, nor, with proper management, is the soil lost. Energy products, cellulose and starch, can be transformed to alcohol, and thus become, if need be, a substitute for petroleum products to keep our motors running. Cellulose and starch—these are the main products of forest and field, and a permanent source of future power.

It is in these newer fields which we as a Nation are just beginning to explore, that wood and wood products offer such far-reaching and dramatic prospects. We now know, for example, that alcohol from waste wood is a technically feasible process, and as such is definitely competitive with alcohol from molasses and much cheaper than alcohol from grain at current prices. There is reason to believe that when the full possibilities of lignin—a constituent of wood wastes—are developed, alcohol will be a cheap and abundant byproduct of other chemical manufacturing processes. It is my belief that we have far too long overlooked this possible source of alcohol and chemical goods. As a matter of fact, it very unfortunate that we permit the burning of our sawdust piles and our other wood wastes when they offer potential supplies of alcohol which must now come from war critical materials.

The field of wood plastics alone is intriguing almost beyond any of the materials now being used. Research has already made wood and paper plastics important in parts of our war effort previously reserved for the metals. Each day now sees developments in this field which enlarge the post-war potentialities for plastics, and it is impossible to imagine the important place these fledgling products of the soil and forest will occupy in our lives in the future. There is an increasing number of reports, each revealing some new and unanticipated use for wood and wood products.

Much of the work in the wood products field is being carried on by the Department of Agriculture Forests Products Laboratory at Madison, Wis. That work is supplemented by research in related fields in the Department's other research laboratories. I am convinced that the post-war period will see an emphasis on forest-products research approaching the intensive studies which our petroleum and coal-tar industries underwent during the last quarter of a century.

Germany and other foreign countries are drawing heavily on their forest resources. The Nazis are using their forests to run their war machine. It is a challenge to us to use for peacetime pursuits the resources which the Nazis have exploited so completely for destructive purposes.

Before closing I want once more to emphasize the fact that if we are successfully to carry forward the conservation job that lies ahead, we need now to plan carefully for this program. This means that we need an effective and well-coordinated program for the Nation, instead of many scattered, unrelated, and possibly conflicting projects. Such planning takes time. Surveys must be made first, and technicians require time to prepare plans for congressional consideration.

I have tried to point out to you some of the reasons why we need to do something positive about our erosion and depletion problems. I have told you my ideas about why we need to plan now so that we can seize every opportunity to make rapid strides forward. I have mentioned some of the long-range and more immediate benefits to be gained from wise use of our soil and forest resources. I want to state further that, in my opinion, we are at the crossroads in our history insofar as our natural resources are concerned. Either we take the uphill road to conservation and restoration, or the downhill road to further exploitation and eventual ruin. The decision as to which course we shall pursue is clearly up to us.

Let me sum up some of the benefits that would accrue to the people of this country through an aggressive conservation program. Such a program would stop erosion and depletion, conserve our soil, restore our forests, reduce floods and dust storms, provide greater recreational opportunities, and guarantee that we shall be able to have and enjoy better living that will result from better use of our manpower and new uses of our agricultural resources. To me, those benefits would be a bargain at any price. I know of no other way we could use our manpower to a greater permanent advantage of our country than in the conservation and restoration of our farm and forest resources.

Planning now means economy not only because it will enable us to get the most for our money; it means that we shall have a happier and more secure future. That is a sound investment in America.

Public Opinion and the Reader's Digest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me before the Jewish Sanitarium and Hospital for Chronic Disease dinner on Sunday evening, May 7, 1944, at the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria.

The circulation of the Reader's Digest in England is 262,000. It is the largest monthly publication in England. It has several foreign editions, to wit, Spanish, with a circulation of 753,000, which circulates in South America and other Spanish-speaking countries. Its Portuguese edition is placed at 313,000, the Arabic edition at 125,000, and the Swedish edition at 248,000. The domestic circulation, including the armed forces, is over 7,000,000. Thus, all told, this unusual magazine sells over 8,701,000 copies per annum and is probably read by three times that number in family groups.

When a publication reaches such gargantuan—almost oppressive—size it compels notice. If, in addition, it fails properly to carry out the responsibilities inherent in such size, it then awakens misgivings and suspicions. Here we have the fourth estate—that is, one segment thereof—growing into an empire under the control of one man. Its potency is national and international. Nothing like the Reader's Digest has ever existed since the world began.

It is time for the American people to take stock and inventory—the good and the bad—of this oversprawling creature of the press.

It started out, as its name implies, to digest and publish in condensed form striking and interesting articles that appeared in various publications. As its circulation increased and the financial surplus of its ownership developed, it belied its name and printed original articles. There is no objection to printing original articles, but the subterfuge was used by first inspiring and commissioning the writer of the article and then farming out the piece to some willing daily, weekly, or monthly newspaper, magazine, or trade journal. These lesser publications, in some instances, are practically on the pay roll of the Reader's Digest. They are retainees or sycophants of the Digest. Those articles inspired by the Reader's Digest assume a general pattern. They reflect the economic ideology of the ownership of Reader's Digest; they are just so much propaganda. It is readily discernible that the Reader's Digest is violently anti-Roosevelt, unabashedly and vigorously antilabor, and, to say the least, it is not particularly careful in its scrutiny and editing of articles which disparage the Jewish effort in Palestine and other matters Jewish.

I cite but a few instances of such policy. There is the instance of the digest of Kiplinger's Washington Is Like That. Of all the numerous chapters of interest in the book, Reader's Digest needs must select that which deals with the percentages of Jews in Government and present such in a most unfavorable light. Reader's Digest took occasion to print Robert Moses' appraisal against increased immigration. On still another occasion, it fed its readers with the anti-Zionist expressions of King Ibn Saud, of Saudi Arabi.

Now again, in an article by Frederick C. Painton, entitled "Report on Palestine," appearing in its current issue, Reader's Digest offers to its vast public what it calls an honest and objective appraisal of the conflicting claims of Jew and Arab in Palestine. Let's take a few moments to analyze its honesty and its objectivity.

Mr. Painton ignores completely the historical background of the Palestine Mandate. No mention is made of the Balfour Declaration, of the ratification of the Palestine Mandate by 52 nations, the admitted purpose of such mandate being the establishment of a national homeland for the Jews. He maintains an unbecoming silence on the agreement entered into by Emir Feisal and Chaim Weizmann, wherein as spokesman for the Arabs, Emir Feisal stated unequivocally his acceptance of the homeland in Palestine and emphasized that the Arab and Jew could live side by side in amity and peace. Without interference by the British Colonial Office and the self-serving interests of the large Arab landowners, harmonious relations could have been maintained. Indeed, witness the preference of the Palestine Arab for living near the Jewish colonies, his glad acceptance of the high standard of living, and the increase of population not only by higher birth rate but by the influx of Arabs seeking benefits.

Mr. Painton makes no mention of the fact that the White Paper was furiously attacked by such high authority as Winston Churchill, Lord Wedgwood, General Smuts, Leopold Amery, to mention but a few. The Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations termed it illegal and stated it thwarted the very purpose of the mandate. Had the article seriously been intended as a guide to an intelligent appraisal, as the Reader's Digest boasts, the entire background of the Palestine question would not have been so scrupulously omitted.

If it is so informative as the Digest terms it in its foreword, then as to give the impression that "Jewish wealth" and "world press" (the author's own phrases when deploring the inability of the Arab to advertise his claim) is all powerful, why is the long struggle of the Jews to found a home in Palestine not yet ended? If Jewish wealth and press are that powerful, why is not the national homeland a fait accompli? Colonization did not take place over night. The Jewish colonists, in reliance upon a mighty promise, gave their life and their labor to performing the miracle that has reclaimed Palestine from a dead land to the most thriving and progressive area in the Middle and Near East.

Does not Reader's Digest as well as the author know that the vast wealth of the Jews (as Mr. Painton calls it) that bought the land in Palestine, built the hospitals and schools, developed the industries and cultivated the neglected barren soil is the pennies and dimes collected all over the world from the poor and needy who voluntarily contributed because they saw the redemption of Jewry in Palestine? Mr. Painton makes it sound like a bit of Goebbel propaganda—rich, international Jewry.

The Arab fears the Jew, fears bodily harm from him, says the author. Mr. Painton omits the massacres of the Jews by the Arabs in 1921, 1929, 1936 through 1939 where the Jew found himself entirely at the mercy of the armed Arab, without a weapon of any kind to defend his home, his life and his family. Surely, such an omission scarcely makes for the objectivity boasted of. The impression created is that of a Jewish plot, so dear to Hitler's heart.

The Jews of Palestine are busy, it is claimed, smuggling in at an alarming rate rifles, machine guns, mortars and making hand grenades. The fact is that over 38,000 Palestinian Jews are now serving voluntarily with the British Army. All the Palestine Jewry is producing for war. In the Allied struggle with Rommel, the Jewish contribution of men and materials was so great as to be accredited by some observers with having turned the tide. Arabia, with its Iraqi revolt, its Grand Mufti of Jerusalem now doing Hitler's bidding, the neutral Ibn Saud of Saudi Arabia, was not concerned with Allied victory at all. Indeed, the Jews of Palestine must have been very busy, if while working night and day for the Allied cause they could also smuggle in rifles, machine guns, mortars and making grenades at an overwhelming rate. It is a curious fact how every trial for Arab gunrunning has been obscured in the press. They are a frequent occurrence, but I find no mention of that fact either in the article under discussion or any other objective report.

Permit me to quote a paragraph: "The British believe they have lived up to the letter of the Balfour Declaration, which said only that His Majesty's Government views with favor the establishment of a home for the Jews in Palestine. There is a home, they say, and Britain is absolved." How easily and swiftly is the tremendous document dismissed. How easily Britain is absolved. "There is a home"—is there—while thousands upon thousands of Jews perish in the Balkans, in all occupied Europe, because there is no place for them to go, because they could find no welcome anywhere, save in Palestine were it not for the White Paper? But Britain says "there is a home," and who are we to controvert the evidence of the British Colonial Office's saintly benevolence?

The old, outworn cry of "absorptive capacity"—that is, the lack of room in Palestine—is again given prominent space. I noted, however, that the scientific exposition of Dr. Lowermilk, who asserts there is room for millions more, is relegated to a footnote.

Mr. Painton states that after two decades the national homeland is still an enormous philanthropic venture. Is Mr. Painton more of an authority than the Royal Peel Commission, which after a thorough investigation stated that it is no longer an experiment but a "going concern"?

Because Mr. Painton went hungry in Palestine, it is concluded that Palestine is a failure. There are many countries now faced with hunger because of the war, but would an "objective" observer call these countries failures as such?

The author makes the point that the refugees now inhabiting Palestine will return to their native lands. It's as simple as all that; is it? Returning refugees, of course, will have no difficulty in getting a foothold in a torn economy after the war. His property will be returned without a murmur; his economic competition will be accepted gracefully after a decade of cultivated anti-Semitism. Immigration bars, of course, will be let down all over the world after the war. Does Mr. Painton "honestly" believe that. After years of persecution and pilfer, not to speak of murder, Mr. Painton actually believes that those countries that spewed forth the Jew will call him brother. That is a bit of facile thinking without recognition of existing related facts. I think the author's closing sentence is the pay-off. He says: "Then, if my observations are correct, the Palestine problem will die out of sheer lack of Jews who would give up their own homeland to plant themselves anew in the sterile hills of Judea." He forgot to mention that there will be no "sheer lack of Jews" who have no land to return to.

Spokesmen for England have said the Jews in Palestine are there "by right and not on sufferance" and the mandate demands that the establishment of the homeland be viewed with favor and facilitated. It does not call for a "neutral" standpoint. The Reader's Digest should have considered that the facts and the questions posed by Mr. Painton were considered by the League, that there is no new development to warrant a reversal of the international edict, except, perhaps the success in Palestine which has developed far beyond the wildest dreams of the ratifiers.

I have gone into the details of this Report on Palestine because it so very clearly illustrates what I mean when I talk of the power of the Reader's Digest unaccompanied by a sense of responsibility to its readers. The danger has been recently recognized by such highly thought of magazines like the New Yorker, Commonweal, and the New Republic.

It is just so much waste of words merely to point up these failings of the Reader's Digest. What should be done about it?

First of all, the world of readers must be made aware of the policy of the Reader's Digest so that whatever is read therein must be viewed as not a cross-section of opinion as voiced in various magazines, but rather as selections designed to promote the ownership's viewpoint exclusively. Secondly, it is well for readers to request that the other point of view be printed when an article of general interest appears as is the case with Report on Palestine. Thirdly, it is well for the magazines in the pay of Reader's Digest to realize the pitfalls and to assert a real independence consonant with the tradition of the freedom of the press. I call upon publications such as the Saturday Evening Post, the American Legion Magazine, the American Mercury, Colliers, Fortune, Liberty, Barrons, Popular Science Monthly, the Red Book, Hygeia, to mention but a few, to ask themselves why they lend themselves to a scheme that is fraught with such danger. They are building for themselves and the Nation a Frankenstein monster.

I am not in opposition to bigness in and of itself. Bigness never frightens me provided it plays cricket and is not guilty of concealing its real purpose behind an innocuous mask. If Reader's Digest announced proudly, "This is our policy," the reader would be properly prepared to reach a sound solution of the article appearing therein.

But Reader's Digest, if left unrestrained, promises to become an institution greater than the Government, but without an announced platform whereby it can be judged.

For instance, the Reader's Digest never prints the views of the underdog, or that of minority groups. It has become illiberal and sows disunity during time of war by holding the Government up to ridicule. It must be kept in mind that Reader's Digest has a scope that reaches far beyond national importance. It is read by allies and neutral foreign countries as well. Recently in an article by Senator BUTLER, of Nebraska, an original written for the Digest, the good neighbor policy was placed entirely out of focus by the deliberate exaggeration of the amount of money spent by us for lend-lease purposes in our southern neighbors. When presented with the actual facts, the Reader's Digest refused to retract. The Reader's Digest owes that responsibility to retract to its country because its vast circulation gives it a prestige and respectfully attentive audience.

Because of this attitude, it fails to cooperate with agencies such as the Office of War Information, the Office of Strategic Services, the Foreign Economic Administration and War Refugee Board who have such work to do in allied and neutral foreign countries.

Within our own country, the influence of the Reader's Digest is such that it must necessarily undermine the morale of lesser publications who in their anxiety to be represented in the mighty Reader's Digest—and remember the Reader's Digest pays well—might well adopt a policy of accepting only such articles for publication that will appeal to the Reader's Digest editorial palate. This is no remote danger. Moreover in the farming-out process, the smaller publications again must accept such articles that have pleased the Digest's fancy. Thus we have one voice so beautifully manipulated as to appear to our country and others as a representative choral group. It is not good. A controlled public opinion is being fashioned by one medium. It has been said that public opinion is stronger than the legislature and nearly as strong as the Ten Commandments.

One final word. There may, of course, be no connection, but I cannot, for one resist the temptation of thinking of the Arabic edition and its bid for circulation when viewing the persistent anti-Zionist tone of the Reader's Digest. At least I am honest in admitting my temptation.

Will the President Now Seize Defiant Unions?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Los Angeles Examiner of April 28, 1944:

WILL THE PRESIDENT NOW SEIZE DEFIANT UNIONS?

The Montgomery Ward seizure, affecting an organization supplying solely civilian goods and services, is at worst a Gestapo proceeding and at best a high-handed misuse of wartime powers. But for the moment let that issue be waived.

If the President can justify his action in the Montgomery Ward case, what about the machinists' unions in the San Francisco Bay area?

If the mere refusal of a civilian business to sign a contract with a C. I. O. union is sufficient cause for sending the Army to take forcible possession of the premises and manhandle the head of that business, what is the President going to do about union bosses who, almost from the first day of war, have defied every process of the New Deal's own laws, have called 13 strikes, have held up vital ships and goods—ranging through warships to transports to munitions—and who are at this moment in defiance of a War Labor Board order?

These union bosses have caused incalculable loss to the war effort.

Will the President send troops to seize the union's books and determine what happens to the huge sums received by the union in dues and initiation fees?

Will the President order all members of the union under 45 to be drafted for the Army?

When John L. Lewis defied the Government no troops were sent to eject him forcibly from his office and take over the union.

What is the President going to do now about the men who are willing to jeopardize our Army and our Navy in the Pacific?

Reconversion of War Plants to Peacetime Construction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, W. P. B. Chairman Donald Nelson has recently pointed out the importance of laying immediate plans for the reconversion of our war plants to peacetime production on the speediest possible basis. In a talk at Boston, Mr. Nelson urged the Nation's manufacturers to prepare for such a shift.

Just how this change may be effected has remained something of a military-civilian secret, and apparently no one in the Washington W. P. B. set-up has come forth with anything like a constructive solution. Yet such a solution lies so readily at hand that it should be apparent to the people close to the situation at once.

Our Nation's machine-tool manufacturers have been publicly declaring their concern over the fate of their own industry. Machine tools and dies used to expedite manufacturing in every industry have a relatively long life. As the products of these companies have been turning out of the plants in huge quantities, the demand for machine tools has been rapidly decreasing. What would be more effective, then, as a means of assuring rapid conversion to peacetime industrial operation than the utilization of these plants for the manufacture of the machine tools and dies needed in peacetime production so that they might be on hand, waiting and ready for the end of the war? These peacetime machines could be manufactured by those companies whose war orders are now being curtailed or canceled to the benefit of the entire Nation, now and in the difficult period of reconversion.

Flood Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER A. RAMEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include Public Law 138, Seventy-eighth Congress and an editorial from the Toledo Blade:

[Public Law 138—78th Cong.]

[Chap. 224—1st Sess.]

S. 1134

An act to provide for emergency flood-control work made necessary by recent floods, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $10,000,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated as an emergency fund to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers for the repair, restoration, and strengthening of levees and other flood-control works which have been threatened or destroyed by the recent floods: Provided, That pending the appropriation of said sum the Secretary of War may allot from existing flood-control appropriations such sums as may be necessary for the immediate prosecution of the work herein authorized, such appropriations to be reimbursed from the appropriation herein authorized when made: Provided further, That funds allotted under this authority shall not be diverted from the unobligated funds from the appropriation "Flood control, general," made available in the War Department Civil Appropriation Act, 1944, for specific purposes therein enumerated.

SEC. 2. The provisions of section 1 shall be deemed to be additional and supplemental to, and not in lieu of, existing general legislation authorizing allocation of flood-control funds for restoration of flood-control works threatened or destroyed by flood.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to suspend all quota provisions and other limitations with respect to the production of agricultural commodities on any lands affected by floods in 1943 whenever he finds that crops have been destroyed or plantings interfered with or washed out on said lands by reason of such floods, and he is further authorized to permit the maximum planting on such lands of any crops which are essential to the war effort, without the imposition of any penalty or the withholding of any benefit, soil conservation, or other agricultural payments.

SEC. 4. The War Production Board, and every other governmental agency which has jurisdiction over allocations and priorities relating to farm machinery and equipment, are authorized and directed immediately to take such steps as may be necessary to provide for the necessary allocations and priorities to enable farmers in the areas affected by floods in 1943 to replace and repair their farm machinery and equipment which was destroyed or damaged by such floods, and to continue farming operations.

Approved July 12, 1943.

NO FLOOD AT RENO?

We don't know what the New Deal would call the deluge in the days of Noah, but in the considered opinion of official Washington there has been no flood in the Reno Beach and Howard Farms area—only progressive erosion.

Our best dictionaries give several definitions of the word "flood," among them this: "A body of water rising, swelling, and overflowing land not usually so covered."

Under the impact of wind from the northeast, Lake Erie rose and swelled and broke through the dikes and overflowed several thousand acres in eastern Lucas County "not usually thus covered."

We believed that newspaper reference to this condition as a flood which ruined crops and drove 350 families from their homes was justified by Noah—Webster.

Now is our face red? By inference, if not directly, Washington rebukes our editorial ignorance. "The inundation of the shore land was not a flood, but only a part of the process of shore erosion."

Even the O. P. A. couldn't have manufactured a more confusing explanation of a condition and not a theory which confronts us.

Go down to Reno, rent a row boat, draw on your rationed rubber boots and form your own opinion.

But this much seems certain. Not a dime from that fund of $10,000,000 appropriation is going to be available for the hundreds of disaster sufferers who have for a great many years paid property taxes to the State and the county—and income taxes to the Federal Government.

Radio Address to the People of My District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over Station WNBF on May 6, 1944:

Dear friends of the Triple Cities and my congressional district, the ravages of hunger and starvation are to me the most tragic of all the horrors of war. They are no respecters of persons or sides and they strike with all the damage and suffering in the world.

Armies are usually well fed and well supplied. Even the hard-pressed nations are able to feed the men who fight. They are the last to feel the pinch of lack of enough food.

The real sufferers are the little children, the very ones who should be exempt, not only from the pangs of hunger but also from the war itself. These are the little sufferers, whose innocent souls have no traffic with the sins of the world and should be spared from the terrible agonies of starvation.

Yet, in the conquered countries of Nazi Europe, millions of children are paying for the crimes of which cruel fate has made them victims. These children are innocent but they are starving.

Their very innocence makes the wickedness of the fact all the more pronounced. They must be saved.

I have long been an advocate of America's feeding these starving children. I believe it is a duty passed on and assigned to us by a merciful God. In feeding these children, we are shortening, not prolonging the war.

As a child, I vividly remember the excruciating stores of the starving children in Asia Minor and the Balkans during World War No. 1. Today children are being made hungry in all the occupied countries by cold practical calculations to destroy future generations of Germany's enemies. We must not, we cannot allow that to happen.

As a Member of Congress, I voted on April 17 for a resolution directing the present administration to send food to Europe's starving children. In so doing, I am certain I followed the dictates of the consciences of every patriotic American in my district.

In so voting, I reflected the desire of organized labor, the councils of which have continually demanded these children be fed.

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has long advocated feeding these children.

The Catholic archbishops and bishops have asked for this action and the Rabbinical Assembly of America has approved the idea.

Every letter I have received on this subject has insisted that I urge the President to act immediately on this vital matter because nothing has been done thus far.

According to the recent statement made by the Committee on Food for the Smaller Democracies, the President is responsible from here on out. Everybody seems to want action taken. Nobody wants the children to starve any longer. The President, as our Commander in Chief, has the power to put this feeding policy into effect. I hope he does this as soon as possible. It will be the most humane undertaking of this day.

And now let me read to you the fitting lines of a former clergyman of my district:

"VICTORY

"Last night 'twixt sleep and waking,
I heard the tramping feet
Of millions crying victory,
Where clashing armies meet.

"I saw fair cities burst in flame,
And then to ashes turn,
Dismantled now by steel and fire
As if of no concern.

"I saw the works of genius,
Of all that man had made,
In book and stone, in church and thought,
Laid low by brutal raid.

"The unknown graves of children,
Who wandered in the night,
Afar from home and shelter,
Were present to my sight.

"I stood with those who listen
For news which is not sent,
Or coming, brings a sorrow,
Through which the heart is rent.

"And then 'twixt sleep and waking,
I heard the tramping feet,
Of millions crying victory,
Where clashing armies meet.

"But as the trumpet blazed the note,
It gave uncertain sound;
Its lips were brass, not golden,
Its note fell to the ground.

"The summer fruit, all fair outside,
May hide a worm within;
And victory unsought of God,
Will lead our lives to sin.

"And what shall be the fruitage
Of all our weary strife,
When chiefs are met in council,
To deal with things of life?

"When 'peace' is cried from housetops,
And bells ring out again;
When diplomats assemble,
Will there be vict'ry then?

"With books piled high on tables,
And legal learning there,
Still, shall one chair be empty,
And no one seem to care?

"To care for Him who walks the sea,
And gives the stars their place;
And who for love of me and you,
May save us by His grace.

"May save us from the fear of death;
'The sting of death is sin.'
But Christ has won the victory,
And we may enter in."

Flood Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SID SIMPSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. SIMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include two editorials, one in the Pike County Republican and the other from the Calhoun News:

[From the Pike County (Ill.) Republican]

SNY FARMERS HAVE A CASE

Three-quarters of a century ago this newspaper led a fight for the reclamation of a vast area of wild swamp and flood and miasma-scourged land extending the entire length of the broad Mississippi Valley in western Pike County and containing some of the richest farm land in the West.

That was back in the days when the first Joseph Merrick Bush was State Senator, and Charles Kenney and Albert Landrum were representing this old fortieth (now thirty-sixth) district in the lower house of the Twenty-seventh General Assembly, the first assembly after adoption of our present State constitution.

We were successful then. The fertile valley of 110,000 acres now known as the Sny Island Levee and Drainage District (largest of its kind in the world and lying in Pike, Adams, and Calhoun Counties) was reclaimed and made the setting for happy homes and firesides and for the production of great food crops that amazed the early skeptics who said this valley belonged to the Father of Waters and would always be his.

Today this newspaper again takes up the cudgels for this far-flung district whose future is threatened by the United Government's erection of huge dams in the Mississippi River for the purposes of a deeper navigation. These dams are holding back and preventing a run-off by way of the river of flood waters that tumble down into the great valley following storms on the uplands.

These dams are of course, in no way responsible for surface floods that occasionally inundate these fertile lands. They are responsible—and directly so—for the long-continued inundation of these lands. The water, once precipitated into the valley by upland floods, cannot get away by its hitherto natural outlet because of the high stage of the river maintained by these dams.

Herein is based the case of the Sny landowners. Their claim against the Government for damages and for drainage facilities comparable to those of the past, arises from the patent fact that the Government's operations in the Mississippi are holding back the waters, keeping inundated lands under water for weeks and ruining the chances of one of the globe's most fruitful valleys that for years has blossomed as a rose.

Sny farmers propose to fight for their rights. They have just cause for complaint. We toured these flooded areas along the Sny when last year's great floods lay on the lands for a period of several weeks, unable to get away. Again, the past week, we toured the valley and found near a third of it under water, which in some localities will be weeks getting off because of the dams in the river, particularly the one at Cap au Gris where the dam maintains a water stage on a level with that at the mouth of the Sny.

Sny farmers applaud the Republican's intention, announced last week, of giving their cause editorial recognition. "I don't know how your paper could be of greater service," said Louis Rodhouse, Saturday. "People outside these bottoms don't realize how serious this is; we need publicity," said Mrs. John Koetters of Rockport. "You will do a fine thing by putting this situation squarely up to the Government and keeping it before the people," agreed men working to hold the levee at Mackey schoolhouse Wednesday night.

This editorial is by way of introduction to a series that will follow in succeeding issues, wherein we will seek to emphasize the obligations of government to the people of this district; pointing out the agreements and understandings that have been had with the War Department to the end that the district shall have drainage facilities equal to those obtaining before the dams were built; calling attention to the disaster and damage incident to the repressed floodwaters; describing plans under consideration for relieving and controlling flood conditions in these bottoms; urging the rights and claims of the valley inhabitants for rehabilitation; and revealing how the Sny levees that were built and paid for by the landowners without cost to Government have been taken over and used by Government for a purpose wholly contrary to the one intended by those who built and paid for them.

We shall insist that Government keep faith with these valley farmers who otherwise face ruin.

Meanwhile we suggest reading the story of the Sny Valley and its reclamation appearing elsewhere in this issue and which constitutes one of the most thrilling chapters in western Illinois history.

[From the Calhoun (Ill.) News]

RIVER DAMS CAUSE FLOODS

After two disastrous floods in as many years, we are wondering if that is sufficient proof that dams do not control floods, but cause them. Anyone with common sense can see that the dams keep the rivers 5 to 7 feet above normal stages and that when heavy rains come floods occur. Also the dams cause a slowing of the current and sediment fills the river bottoms from 3 to 5 inches each year, or a foot to a foot and a half within 5 years.

We realize that deep water is necessary for river traffic, and that is all right. But we think it would be cheaper in the long run and certainly would save a property damage to dredge the river channels each year like they used to. We very seldom had floods befort the series of dams were built up and down the Mississippi and Illinois Rivers. Now we have them every year and will continue to have them unless something is done about flood control.

If we must continue to have river dams and keep the river at such a high stage the year round, the War Department should make plans to take care of excessive water during the rainy seasons of the year. This could be done, especially in the Western States on the upper Mississippi River, by building large places to use in storing water during flood times instead of allowing it all to rush down the rivers to cause inestimable damages farther down the river stretches. The water could be guided into these large reservoirs and stored for use by farmers the following summer when crops are burning up for the lack of rain.

We think it is high time the War Department realized that dams cause floods and that something should be done to remove the cause.

Treason on the Home Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include the following statement which I gave to the press on May 6, as well as my telegram to Mr. William H. Davis, Chairman of the National War Labor Board:

The three petty "Caesars" of the San Francisco Bay area have renewed their treasonable activities and are once more holding up vitally necessary construction work on Navy and Maritime ships. In utter defiance of requests from the Navy and the Maritime Commission, as well as directives from the National War Labor Board, Messrs. Hook and Dillon, Local 68 of the International Association of Machinists, and "Turkey-neck" Smith, Local 1304 of the C. I. O., have successfully brought about another work stoppage.

This is just one more in a long series of work stoppages and delays that have been instigated by these individuals in spite of organized labor's pledge of no strikes for the duration. Their word is not worth the paper it is written on and their pledges and contracts are apparently made only to be broken at will. Even their own organizations have no control over their activities.

I have conferred with officials in the Navy Department and the Maritime Commisison, both of which organizations are deeply concerned over the situation. They have advised me that substantial concessions were offered to Hook and Dillon and to Smith in order to insure the continued production of ships that are needed by our boys at the front. Appeals to patriotism, which these business agents do not understand, have had no effect.

I am, therefore, requesting that the National War Labor Board subpena Hook, Dillon, and Smith and ask them to show cause as to why they should not obey the directive of the National War Labor Board to continue work on war-construction jobs. If the Montgomery Ward Co., an organization not even remotely connected with war production, can be seized by the United States Government under some weird interpretation of law, how can these well-known public enemies continue to defy that same Government with impunity?

The activities of Hook, Dillon, and Smith have gone past the coddling stage. They should be treated as traitors to their country. The public and the loyal workers in the ranks of labor will applaud and support the most drastic action to rid the San Francisco area of their blighted influence.

MAY 8, 1944.

Mr. WILLIAM H. DAVIS,
National War Labor Board,
Department of Labor Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Have just learned that Hook and Dillon Local 68 of the I. A. M., and Smith Local 1304, C I. O., are again holding up work on essential naval and maritime construction. Am also informed that your compliance director has left for the coast by plane with instructions to subpena Hook, Dillon, and Smith and to ask them to show cause why they should not comply with labor's no-strike pledge and N. W. L. B. directives. It is my opinion that these individuals are guilty of treasonable activities and hope that your board will use every means at your disposal to remove them from positions of influence in the San Francisco Bay area. Please keep me advised of all developments. Regards.

J. Z. ANDERSON,
Member of Congress.

Harry Bridges Charges Congress Fails to Cooperate with President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me, I desire to place in the RECORD an article from the Houston (Tex.) Press, dated Tuesday, March 14, 1944. The article follows:

CONGRESS FAILING TO COOPERATE WITH F. D. R., SAYS BRIDGES

DALLAS, March 14.—Congress does not represent the people and Members aren't cooperating fully with President Roosevelt to shorten the war, President Harry Bridges, of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (C. I. O.), charged yesterday.

"The way Congress is operating today its worst enemy is President Roosevelt and not Hitler and the Japs," Bridges said.

Bridges said he was here to confer with local labor leaders to determine if union members are cooperating in the national labor political program.

"The A. F. of L. and C. I. O. might find opposition over organization, but that doesn't keep them from being together on politics," Bridges said.

He said people to whom he had talked are not satisfied with the new tax bill Congress passed over the President's veto and with the compromise soldier vote bill.

In commenting upon this article, E. M. Biggers, of Houston, well-known Texas patriot, makes the following pertinent observations:

Isn't this the same Mr. Bridges who was charged with being an enemy of the American form of government, and ordered deported?

wasn't the order sustained by the courts, and isn't he now out on appeal bond?

Is it not possible that the political activities of the C. I. O. may have a bearing on the President's zeal in protecting its membership, as in the Montgomery Ward case, rather than the Nation's interest or the rights of our citizens?

A Cause Celebre

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Mark Sullivan in the Washington Post of Monday, May 8, 1944:

A CAUSE CELEBRE—MONTGOMERY WARD

(By Mark Sullivan)

Because the Montgomery Ward case is certain to be discussed for a long time to come, it may be useful to summarize the successive steps that compose it, so far as this is possible in a limited space. The steps cover a period of some 18 months:

First, a C. I. O. union made demands upon Montgomery Ward.

The dispute went before the War Labor Board.

The Labor Board ordered—the Board's word is "directed"—Ward to sign a contract with the union. This must not be understood as merely directing the company and the union to arrive at a contract by mutual negotiation. What the Labor Board did, and habitually does, is to write out a form of contract, containing stipulations set down by the Board. One stipulation was for "maintenance of union membership"—meaning that after a fixed date Ward must discharge any worker who fails to keep up his union membership.

Ward declined to sign the contract, mainly because of the "maintenance of membership" stipulation.

Thereupon a member of the Labor Board, Mr. Wayne L. Morse, said the Board would use "whatever forces of Government are necessary to compel compliance."

The Labor Board turned the case over to President Roosevelt. The President issued an order, "I direct Montgomery Ward & Co. to comply without further delay." The President gave as his authority that he was acting as "Commander in Chief in time of war."

Ward wrote the President: "Your order of November 18 (1942) has been received and will be promptly obeyed."

When Ward came to signing, it said the contract must include a statement saying, "The following provisions are not voluntarily agreed to by the company * * * and are incorporated herein * * * under duress; and only because the President of the United States as Commander in Chief in time of war has expressly ordered that they be included."

The C. I. O. union objected to inclusion of this statement in the contract. The union went back to the War Labor Board. The board proposed a softened modification, dropping the words "under duress" and substituting "after protest."

Ward said this was unsatisfactory, insisted upon its own wording. But the Labor Board directed Ward to sign forthwith.

Ward declined to sign but said it would sign if ordered to do so by President Roosevelt. The President wrote Ward saying: "As Commander in Chief in time of war I hereby direct Montgomery Ward & Co. to comply * * * without further delay."

Ward signed the contract.

All that was in the fall of 1942. The contract went into effect for the stipulated term, one year. As the end of the year approached, Ward, last November, announced it would not renew the contract, giving as one reason, that the union no longer had a majority of Ward's workers.

Following Ward's refusal to renew, there ensued the steps recently familiar—ending in seizure of Ward's plant by the President, involving seizure of the person of Ward's head, Mr. Sewell Avery, by soldiers, and ejectment of him to the street.

That is the Ward case up to date. Among several deeply vital aspects of it is a contrast between the course of the Administration toward an employer, Ward—and its course, in a different case, toward a head of a labor union, Mr. John L. Lewis of the United Mine Workers.

In the Lewis case, last July, Mr. Lewis and his union were on strike against the mine owners. The case went to the War Labor Board. The Labor Board, following its usual procedure, stipulated a contract and directed Mr. Lewis and the mine owners to sign it.

The mine owners signed, not because they wanted to but because they were afraid not to. They feared what the Administration might do to them.

But Mr. Lewis refused to sign. Thereupon the Labor Board, again following its usual procedure, sent the case up to President Roosevelt, asking him to compel Mr. Lewis to sign.

Up to this point, the cases of Mr. Lewis and of Ward are identical. The only difference, which is no difference at all, is that the Ward company refused to renew a contract stipulated by the Labor Board—while Mr. Lewis refused to sign such a contract in the beginning.

But from this point on, the course of the Administration in the two cases differs utterly. In the Ward case an employer was ordered by the President to sign, and when it did not sign was penalized by seizure of its plant and of its head. But in the case of a labor leader, Mr. Lewis, nothing whatever was done. The President did not order Mr. Lewis to sign, nor in any way penalize him.

This contrast—between the course of the President toward an employer and toward a labor leader—is one of several aspects of the Ward case having implications of the deepest possible consequence.

American Zionist Emergency Council Resolution Regarding the Late Secretary Frank Knox

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RANULF COMPTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Speaker, the late Secretary of the Navy, Frank Knox, had many friends. It has just been called to my attention that another great group of American citizens held him in high regard and mourn his loss to them and to the country.

I therefore want to call to the attention of the Members of the House and also to the country a resolution of national scope adopted by the American Zionist Emergency Council:

Zionists everywhere mourn the passing of Col. Frank Knox, Secretary of the Navy, devoted servant of his country, trusted friend of the Jewish people.

The qualities of sincerity, loyalty, and fair play which were the cornerstones of Secretary Knox's life served also the movement for the establishment of a free Jewish homeland in Palestine, to which he gave a large measure of devotion. Both in his public and his private career, Frank Knox demonstrated an unfailing and helpful interest in the upbuilding of the Jewish national home.

In mourning the death of Secretary Knox, the American Zionist Emergency Council pays reverent tribute to a great American and to a stanch friend of a Jewish Palestine.

Governor Tugwell: A Shame

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BOLÍVAR PAGÁN

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. PAGÁN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted by the House, I present a statement I made at a press conference, answering remarks made by Governor Tugwell in Puerto Rico.

TUGWELL COMES OUT

I am glad Governor Tugwell himself comes out in controversy. That gives me a larger territory for my spring offensive. I wish that I were now more near to him, because then the controversy would be more lively. Tugwell is an easy target for anybody that is fighting for decent government, for democracy, and for the American system of ways of life.

TUGWELL HAS NO MORAL AUTHORITY

He has no moral authority to challenge my statements. He is simply a "carpet-bagger" defending his job. I am the elected democratic spokesman of my people. I don't care much about what he says. Tugwell has been convicted by Puerto Rican courts for uttering slanderous statements. Everybody knows in Puerto Rico who he is and who I am. I wish he could run against me on a ticket in Puerto Rico, in an impartial and honest election. The people would make the proper choice.

TUGWELL'S BUREAUCRATIC VORACITY

When Tugwell arrived in Puerto Rico, he, in an attempt of unprecedented bureaucratic voracity, tried to hold office and draw salaries both as Governor and as president of the Puerto Rican University. He did hold both jobs at the same time for 6 months, through maneuvers of the Governor's appointees in the university board of trustees. At last he had to step out from one of the two jobs, forced by pressure of the Puerto Rican people. As Governor he has always been rancorous and vindictive against the people that deprived him of the university job and salary.

TUGWELL A FAILURE IN THE UNITED STATES

Tugwell is well known in the United States. People here know of his speeches and articles impeaching free enterprise and attacking the best traditions and standards of American democracy and ways of life that have made this Nation respected, great and progressive. It is known here how Tugwell squandered millions of the people's money, and how he has failed in all positions he has held. He feels himself entrenched in Puerto Rico, because he knows that the American Government and the American people are afraid that he might come back to the United States.

TUGWELL'S CONTEMPT FOR CONGRESS

Causing harm to Puerto Rico, Governor Tugwell has contempt for Congress, and he rejoices when he mortifies the Representatives of the American people in Congress. Recently, Governor Tugwell appointed for the Insular Government a Robert Morss Lovett, when this Tugwell's fellow-traveler was stricken out from the Federal pay roll by Congress.

TUGWELL, PAIRED TO GEORGE III

Governor Tugwell, afraid of the Puerto Rican people that hate him, only goes out from the executive mansion when protected by armed guards and policemen with machine guns, surrounded with all the paraphernalia of dictators. Dictator Tugwell has made a scrap of paper of the insular constitution. The insular government department, created by Congress, have been substituted by an unconstitutional supergovernment of numerous and costly new bureaus, boards, authorities, etc., created by executive fiat or by unconstitutional measures forced by Governor Tugwell in violation of expressed prohibition of the Puerto Rican organic act. The insular auditor, office created by Congress, has been deprived of the powers to keep accountenancy, to supervise and control public expenditures. Governor Tugwell has the same respect to Puerto Rican laws as George III had for the laws of the American Colonies. Tugwell's arbitrary conduct has several times been ruled as unlawful by the insular supreme court.

PUERTO RICO GONE ON THE ROCKS

It is an audacious effrontery of Tugwell when he speaks of the Puerto Rican boys who are fighting for democracy and decent living. When these boys come back home, they will find that, under Tugwell, democracy is a shallow word and a mockery in Puerto Rico. They also will find that Tugwell has squandered in Puerto Rico millions of good money from Puerto Rican taxpayers and also from continental American taxpayers covered into the Puerto Rican Treasury. They will also find that 300,000 of Puerto Rican poor boys, in increasing numbers, lack educational opportunities. They also will find that disease, unemployment, and misery have increased in Puerto Rico. They also will find, that through Tugwell's experiments and crackpot schemes, industry, agriculture, and business, and all sources of work and income for the people have been damaged, and that the island has practically gone on the rocks.

PUERTO RICAN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES REQUESTS REMOVAL OF TUGWELL

Recently he was responsible for sabotaging and killing splendid measures approved by the Puerto Rican House of Representatives aiming to give work, relief, and aid to thousands of Puerto Ricans unemployed and suffering hunger and misery. He did that in revenge, because the Puerto Rican House of Representatives had adopted a resolution requesting his removal.

GOVERNOR TUGWELL—A SHAME

It is a shame that such Governor was sent to Puerto Rico. While England appoints for the British dominions and colonies statesmen of high rank and of economic independence, the United States appointed for Puerto Rico a bureaucratic wreck, a simple jobhunter and "carpet bagger," whose personal destiny and economic security are tied with the local politrickery of a crowd of anti-American fellow travelers.

Federal Irrigation Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. W. ROBINSON

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am presenting a statement made by Commissioner Harry W. Bashore, of the Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior, before the Senate Commerce Committee considering the Rivers and Harbors bill, H. R. 3961.

I call attention to Mr. Bashore's statement because it marshals many pertinent facts which should be considered in connection with the construction of any projects having to do with water conservation, control, or use in the West. The emphasis he places on the value of water in the West is well merited.

The importance of western irrigation to the ramainder of the country is well illustrated by Mr. Bashore's factual statements on the purchasing power created for non-western manufactured goods and agricultural commodities not produced on irrigated land:

Mr. Chairman, I am appearing before you today as Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation to emphasize the critical importance of water to the western half of the United States. The Bureau of Reclamation in the Department of the Interior has the responsibility for planning, constructing, and operating projects which have for their major purpose the conservation of the limited water resources of the West.

At this time I propose to discuss only one amendment. The amendment to which I direct your attention reads as follows:

"In connection with dams or works authorized by this act which the Secretary of the Interior determines, with the concurrence of the Secretary of War, may be utilized for irrigation purposes, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to construct, operate, and maintain, under the provisions of the Federal reclamation laws (act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388, and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto), such additional works as he may deem necessary for irrigation purposes. Such irrigation works may be undertaken only after a report and findings thereon have been made by the Secretary of the Interior as provided in said Federal reclamation laws; and, within the limits of the water users' repayment ability, such report may be predicated on the allocation to irrigation of an appropriate portion of the cost of structures and facilities used for irrigation and other purposes. Dams and works authorized by this act may be utilized for irrigation purposes only in conformity with the provisions of said Federal reclamations laws and this paragraph."

The principle involved in this amendment is far-reaching. This principle goes to the root of the vitally important position that irrigation has in the agricultural, industrial, and other economic pursuits of the 17 arid and semi-arid States of the West. To facilitate a full understanding of the role which irrigation has in the life of the Nation, I have had prepared several charts and photographs which will illustrate some of the major points I will emphasize.

The low rainfall in the region west of the ninety-seventh meridian makes the maximum conservation and use there of water for irrigation vital to the maintenance of its agriculture, and, in fact, essential to the support of the population itself.

About 21,000,000 acres in the arid and semi-arid West are now irrigated. The water is delivered from storage reservoirs or it is diverted directly from streams for distribution to land that is thus made productive.

Studies indicate that sufficient water could be economically conserved to provide an adequate supply for the 21,000,000 acres now irrigated and in addition provide for the irrigation of about 22,000,000 acres now practically all unproductive. Water, which could be economically stored and diverted to irrigate productive land, is the limiting factor in the expansion of irrigation.

In the 11 far Western States, 73 percent of the agricultural production comes from irrigated land. The great livestock industry of the West, commonly thought of as one aspect of dry-land agriculture, is itself largely dependent on irrigated land for winter forage and for feeding and fattening cattle and sheep for market.

The greater part of the West's 20,000,000 people on 275,000 farms and in more than 1,000 cities and towns, is dependent directly and indirectly on irrigation.

The Federal Government assumed sponsorship for irrigation on the passage of the Reclamation Law of 1902. It did so as a means of stabilizing the agriculture of the West, of developing the arid regions, and of providing homes for pioneer settlers. A first consideration in the enunciation of the Federal policy was that the construction costs of irrigation should be repaid by beneficiaries.

Ninety-five percent of the cost of the projects in the reclamation program now authorized is reimbursable from irrigation water users, municipalities, and power consumers, and is being repaid. Power, developed as an incident of irrigation, is an essential factor in assuring the repayment of construction costs of multiple-purpose projects.

The Treasury of the United States today, through the Bureau of Reclamation, has an investment in irrigation and related projects of more than $900,000,000.

Fifty-two projects have been completed by the Bureau of Reclamation and 20 others still are under construction. Each is based on the conservation and consumptive use of the waters in the western streams.

Four million acres of land now are served by Federal reclamation systems. The total will be increased to 12,000,000 acres upon the completion of projects now under construction, upon which construction will be resumed at the close of the war, or which have been authorized for construction.

The hydroelectric power installations at reclamation projects exceed 2,000,000 kilowatts. These power plants have been of great aid in the prosecution of the war and will make an equally tangible contribution to the normal peacetime development of the West. The revenue from power assists in repayment of irrigation costs and the employment in the industrial activities resulting from power developments expands the market for irrigated agricultural products. The power byproduct of western irrigation, therefore, is a most useful tool of water conservation. Valuable as is irrigation, many of our modern projects require the aid of power to render them economically feasible.

The future of whole States and hundreds of communities built up by irrigation demands that additional water be made available for existing irrigated farms. The provision of supplemental supplies for irrigation systems which were built by private capital and which are now faced with water shortages is a major work of the Bureau of Reclamation. More than half of the areas now irrigated need additional water to insure maximum crop production and to maintain existing communities. The reasons for this extensive need of supplemental water supplies are many and complex, but most of them are found in the growth of the West, expansion of the irrigated acreage, and the inadequacy of irrigation systems constructed before the science of irrigation engineering had developed to its present efficiency.

The population of the far western States has more than tripled in 40 years, while irrigated land acreage has barely doubled. Since 1940, the Bureau of Census reports the West is the only one of the Nation's four major regions to show a gain in population. All others show a loss.

The full development of the irrigation potentialities in the West would provide for 400,000 to 500,000 additional irrigated farm homes and support an additional population of 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 persons on the farms and in cities and towns which would be established or expanded in its wake.

The full development of irrigation would also create additional property values estimated at $16,000,000,000.

The purchasing power for non-western manufactured and agricultural products created by the present irrigation and related developments is estimated at $2,500,000,000 annually. The full development of irrigation possibilities would increase the home or domestic market for farm and factory products to more than $5,000,000,000 annually.

From an agricultural standpoint in the arid and semiarid regions, irrigated land has a special significance. The per acre crop output of irrigated land, which is the basis of the purchasing power of the West, is nearly five times more than that from the dry-land farms in the region. The per-acre output of irrigated land is nearly three times the average for the entire United States.

These seem to be hopeful facts for the West, holding great promise of extraordinary growth and prosperity. But the perspective must be maintained. Of the 750,000,000 acres of arid and semiarid land which is possibly tillable, there is water which can be economically conserved to irrigate at the maximum only 43,000,000 acres. This 43,000,000 acres is about twice the 21,000,000 acres now irrigated, to which I have previously referred.

Western irrigated agriculture complements and does not compete with the farm products of other sections of the country. No tobacco is grown on irrigated land in the West and the output of other so-called surplus crops, like wheat and corn, is inadequate even for the regional needs. Distance and freight costs raise a bar to the economical marketing of fruit, vegetables, and other specialty crops which are peculiarly adaptable to irrigated land in competition with the product of farms near the great metropolitan centers of the Midwest, South, and East.

The wartime contributions of irrigated land to the Nation's food supplies have been fully demonstrated. The War Food Administration has recognized the potentialities of Bureau of Reclamation irrigation development for war-food purposes and 24 projects which it has recommended have been approved by the War Production Board for construction by the Bureau of Reclamation.

Federal reclamation projects alone in 1943 produced potatoes sufficient for the annual rations of 25,000,000 people; beans for 57,000,000; and alfalfa with feed grains for dairy and beef herds, which supplied 11,000,000 with dairy and meat products.

Since more than 80 percent of the power supply of the far Western States comes from hydroelectric plants, the Reclamation output of this essential energy as a byproduct of irrigation is exceedingly significant. In 1943 nearly 12,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours were generated at Reclamation plants—a greater volume than was produced in all of the New England States in 1940.

From the summary presented, I am sure you must agree with me that irrigation is essential to the very existence of our Western States.

In this region there are more than 1,100,000,000 acres of land—more than half of the area of continental United States.

Anticipating your question, "Why is irrigation necessary?" I point to the map, which shows how the United States is divided into two parts by the 20-inch rainfall line, which roughly follows the 100th meridian. To the east of this line, running as far as the 97th meridian, lies what is commonly referred to as "the subhumid belt." In this belt rainfall is erratic. It is generally regarded as adequate for crop production. In the years when it is not sufficient, lack of rainfall spells serious losses for those farmers who are not within an irrigation project. To the west of the 100th meridian the rainfall generally is insufficient for crops.

Except for the high mountains and the strip along the northern Pacific coast, less than 20 inches can be expected in a normal year. The great areas shown on the map as receiving 15 inches or less of rainfall are true deserts. These arid lands and the semiarid lands, which receive between 15 and 20 inches, taken together include all of Nevada and all but mountainous areas in Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, Montana, and Idaho. These lands also include (except for small patches or strips, principally mountainous) the three Pacific Coast States, Washington, Oregon, and California, and the western parts of those States of the Great Plains, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas.

Development of intensive farming is limited by the availability of natural moisture or water supplies for irrigation.

Agricultural experts tell us that if 20 inches of rainfall or even if 15 inches could be counted upon during the growing season for crops in these Western States, irrigation might not be required. For that reason, it is important to consider the seasonal distribution of rainfall in the West to determine the prospects in the average year during the period from April 1 to September 30, which is the growing season. This distribution is given in reports of the United States Weather Bureau which show the percentage of the average annual rainfall which is received during the growing season for crops. The greater part of California is shown to receive less than one-fifth of its average annual rainfall during the growing season.

Most of the States of Washington and Oregon and parts of Idaho, Nevada, California, and Arizona receive only about one-third of the total precipitation in the growing season. In the whole central part of the West—the Inter-Mountain States—from 40 to 60 percent of the rainfall is received during the growing season. I want to call your attention in contrast to weather records of the great middle part of the United States, where, you will see, more than 60 percent of the rainfall to the eastward of the ninety-seventh meridian comes when it is most needed for the growth of crops.

The Weather Bureau reports show further that from the Continental Divide westward virtually nowhere but in the high mountains, which cannot be farmed anyway, can more than 8 to 10 inches of rain be expected during the period from April 1 to September 30, the period when moisture is most needed for crop growth. Between the Continental Divide and the one hundredth meridian in only a few tillable areas can as much as 15 inches be anticipated during the growing season. From the one-hundredth meridian eastward the precipitation is somewhat higher on the average, but this subhumid area suffers from periodical drought and the economic stability of the area is frequently seriously disturbed.

In other words, the area west of the one-hundredth meridian for the most part receives less than 20 inches of rainfall during the normal year. Furthermore, the small amount of moisture which does fall there is unfavorably distributed through the seasons, so far as agriculture is concerned.

Please remember that between 15 and 25 inches of rain, depending on summer temperatures, are necessary during the growing season for farming without any irrigation. From the facts that I have presented, it readily can be seen that irrigation is essential to farming in virtually all of the West.

I have emphasized the climatic conditions in the States of the mountain and Pacific group because of the critical effect the sparse rainfall has on agriculture. Although this region was also affected by the critical drought of the thirties, irrigation prepared it better to meet the impact of the exceptionally low rainfall, and the result was less severe than in the Great Plains and subhumid area. In North Dakota and South Dakota in 1934, where there is virtually no water conservation for irrigation, the harvested acreage in 1934—at the height of the drought—was reduced from thirty-eight to fourteen million acres—65 percent. Land in other areas, without irrigation, virtually reverted to the desert.

The transformation by water conservation and irrigation of the western deserts and sagebrush into thriving farms has been a gradual process.

Irrigation in the West began with the settlement of the Mormons in Utah in 1847. As the receding frontier drew the American people westward, they came upon these arid and semiarid regions, trapped the waters for fur, explored the mountains for metals, and cut into the forest, but they passed rapidly over the deserts. They crossed miles upon miles of arid land hoping to find fresh fields. They pressed onward until they realized that it was upon the foundation of this desert that the permanent civilization in the West must be built. Then they began the easy stream diversions and irrigated the low-lying valleys and the benches near the big rivers. Gradually the irrigation systems became more complicated. Finally, the unregulated flow of the streams became insufficient for the needs of developments relying upon them and storage works were required.

At the turn of the century, about 10,006 acres of land had been irrigated. It was at about this point that the Federal Government became concerned about the need for water conservation in the West and the reclamation law of 1902 was enacted under the sponsorship of the late President Theodore Roosevelt. Summarized, this policy was designed to conserve and use the waters of the West for the development of the vast areas of public land to which the Government had taken and held title. The increasing population of the West made it necessary to provide for the support of a larger number of people than could be sustained by the meager agricultural resources then existing. These resources rested on the limited irrigation expansion and on the small volume of crops which could be wrested from the arid and semiarid lands without the artificial application of moisture.

That irrigation brought a permanent civilization to the western deserts was recognized. Just as this particular science of agriculture has been maintained uninterruptedly in the valleys of the Nile, in Syria, Persia, Judea, Java, and some parts of Italy, it demonstrated its value in the Western States and was adopted as a national policy.

The recognition of the great value of water conservation by the Federal Government stimulated private capital to invest in irrigation systems. In the 42 years that have elapsed since the passage of the reclamation law, the acreage under irrigation has increased to more than 21,000,000 acres. Since 1930, however, the irrigation expansion has been primarily under the auspices of the Federal Government. This has been due to the fact that the complexities of modern systems were beyond the ability of private capital to finance. These complexities included the necessity for great storage works, as well as the recognition of the need for and usefulness of mutiple-purpose projects which would assure maximum use of the water resources for irrigation, power production, municipal water supplies, and other purposes.

As every dam on a western river aids stream regulation, so also does each contribute to flood control. The fact that the Federal Government owns more than half of the land area of the 11 far-Western States and the interstate characteristics of the water supply of many potential projects are other factors which make water conservation and irrigation in the West a primary concern of the Congress as the legislative branch of the Federal Government.

The entire Nation has a deep concern for the continued development of the West, which rests on the highest beneficial use of its scanty water supplies. The conservation of this water for irirgation and related purposes means homes on irrigated land for returning service men when peace comes. From the long-range view, the expansion of a stabilized agriculture in the West is necessary to support the expanding population and insure an increasing home market for American factory and farm products not produced in the West.

From a population standpoint, the West has outstripped its agricultural production, as I have pointed out. In the first 30 years of the present century, the West grew more rapidly than the remainder of the country. The rate was three times as fast. From 1930 to 1940, the population growth was twice the national rate. From 1940 to November 1943, the West was the only one of the four major regions of the country to show an increase in population. Its gain was 8.5 percent while every other major region lost from 3.4 to 5.7 percent.

The return of the servicemen from the battlefields and high seas will see the wartime impact of the population on the West intensified. The Bureau of Labor Statistics estimates that nearly 1,800,000 men of the armed forces and 1,200,000 emergency industrial workers will be demobilized in the 17 Western States. Conservative estimates are that about 250,000 of the returning servicemen will be farm boys, most of them from irrigated land, while a proportionate number of the emergency industrial workers to be demobilized have a farm background.

Irrigated land in the West will be required for the permanent location of a substantial number of the 400,000 men of these two groups who will be seeking a return to the soil and an opportunity to reestablish themselves and contribute to the permanent prosperity of the country. Like their forefathers, who transformed desert and sagebrush land into irrigated farms, they are entitled to the conservation of western waters that will afford them a similar opportunity.

Preliminary studies by the Bureau of Reclamation indicate that in the major subregions of the West water could be economically conserved to assure ultimate irrigation results, including protection for existing irrigated areas through supplemental water, as follows:

Subhumid and Great Plains: Irrigation of 4,500,000 acres of new land and supplemental water for 700,000 acres to provide 58,000 farm homes and protect 7,000 existing farms. These figures compare with 2,100,000 acres now irrigated which are included in 20,000 farms.

Inter-Mountain: Irrigation of 6,400,000 acres of new land and supplemental water for 8,000,000 acres to provide 140,000 new farm homes and protect 66,000 existing farms. These figures compare with 13,400,000 acres now irrigated which are included in 135,000 farms.

Pacific coast: Irrigation of 11,100,000 acres of new lands and supplemental water for 3,000,000 acres to provide 230,000 new farm homes and protect 50,000 existing farms. These figures compare with 5,800,000 acres now irrigated which are included in 120,000 farms.

From a population standpoint, the use of water required for these developments would provide for 1,639,000 additional persons on irrigated farms and more than 4,000,000 persons in cities, towns, and villages, who would receive their principal support from the new irrigation developments.

The added property values of $16,000,000,000, which I have previously estimated as possible from the full irrigation development of the West, is not comparable with the tremendous human considerations that will flow from the full use of the precious waters of the West for irrigation.

The use of structures in the West in water control such as is proposed in the pending rivers and harbors bill usually affects irrigation possibilities. Since irrigation is so important and so highly specialized a use, a Federal agency has been established to sponsor and foster it, and a body of laws and policies has been built around the function. My position, as head of that Bureau, is simply that all irrigation work should be under the jurisdiction of this agency, governed by the special law sthat have been adopted, and prosecuted in conformity with the national policy. For that reason, I advocate the amendment that I earlier read to you.

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you and the members of this subcommittee for listening to me so patiently. I know that, to some of you who live in the humid areas of the United States, irrigation has not appeared to be an essential factor in the economic life of our great country. I have tried to give you a picture of it. I hope that this committee and the Congress will adopt the amendment in question. I add that, so far as I am aware, the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers have expressed no opposition to this amendment.

I thank you.

Why Are We Fighting?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be interesting for the Members of the House and those who get the RECORD to read the opinion of a 14-year-old girl in regard to why we are fighting. This appeared in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of April 10 and, under the permission granted me, I include it as part of my remarks:

WHY ARE WE FIGHTING?

To the EDITOR OF THE POST-DISPATCH:

That is a very broad question and it would take a long time to answer it thoroughly. But I, a 14-year-old girl, am going to give you my opinion on it.

We are all fighting for a new world. We are fighting to put together what Germany and Japan are trying to tear apart. The only thing I can see that Germany and Japan are succeeding in trying to do is to build the world over again—a world where they would be dictators and we would be slaves. But God didn't make or intend for it to be that way.

They are fighting to kill off all human civilization and we are fighting to preserve this. They are killing off people, destroying beautiful cities, and ruling weak countries who cannot defend themselves, who were not prepared for war, who did not desire war.

Our force is so big and powerful that we will soon overtake Germany and Japan and stop them. And then the world will be in the right hands—hands in which everyone will be safe and free.

And this will be the way everyone will want to live.

If an airplane flies over, a person won't have to run for shelter or think, "This will be the last time I will ever see my family, my home, my friends, and my country."

People won't have to be doing underground work; won't have to fear their life will be taken any minute; can go into stores, cafes, and not be watched with an eagle eye. People won't have to sneak along the streets and won't have to fear they are being trailed. They can live happy and free.

All this I think is why we are fighting.

PEGGY.

Whose Attorney Is Mr. Biddle?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PEHR G. HOLMES

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. HOLMES of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Worcester (Mass.) Evening Gazette, of May 3, 1944:

WHOSE ATTORNEY IS MR. BIDDLE?

Francis Biddle must be the strangest Attorney General we ever had. What does he think are the functions of his office? To devise ways of destroying the Constitution, abrogating the Bill of Rights, and installing an executive dictatorship? Why, that isn't the function of the Attorney General at all. He is there for the sole purpose of enforcing and supporting the law as it exists. He is not there to advise the President on how he can evade the law, but where his authority is restricted by it. He has absolutely no legislative function. His job is strictly limited to interpretation of the law as it stands in the Constitution and the acts of Congress.

But what does Mr. Biddle think of all that old-fashioned stuff? Let his own words inform us. After discovering that his thin ingenuity in finding legalistic excuses for the Montgomery Ward seizure by talking about "war production" was universally greeted with sniffs of perplexity, he decided upon more outspoken tactics.

His ruling, he said, was not based on Montgomery Ward's relation to war production; nor to the difficulty over the maintenance-of-union clause, but because "no business or property"—the words are "no business or property"—is "immune to a Presidential order." A pretty kettle of dictatorial fish, indeed.

But by no means the worst. Mr. Biddle has something to say about the United States courts. It is safe to say that nothing like it has been heard in America before; not only from our own Attorney General, but from anybody. Here it is:

"Particularly in time of war the Court should not substitute its judgment for that of the Executive."

Every word is a pearl. "Particularly in the time of war." "Should not substitute its judgment." So, according to Mr. Biddle the Court should not substitute its judgment for that of the Executive even in times of peace and, according to Mr. Biddle, any opinion of the Court not in agreement with that of the Executive is merely a substitution for the really basic authority of the President. Wherever Mr. Biddle studied law he must have taken a refresher course in the Reich's Chancellory. The American people certainly never elected a President on those terms.

As far as American democracy is concerned, Mr. Biddle apparently doesn't know what it's all about. Such an application of the theory of government, now used against a capitalistic enterprise, would if accepted as a precedent, be just as great a threat against labor and the institutions of labor, against every civic institution—it is already aimed against the courts—against every public forum, including the American press, and against all private property.

If these are Mr. Biddle's opinions he has no right to be Attorney General of the United States. His only limitation as a menace is in the absurdity of his views.

Freedom From Government Dictatorship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. C. GATHINGS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, the Nation is aroused like it never has been before by the action taken in connection with the Ward mail-order seizure. If Ward's store were open or closed this in itself would nowise affect the war effort. It could never be successfully argued that the operation of a retail store was essential to the drive into Italy, Burma, or necessary in the invasion of Europe or the Philippine Islands. Everyone knows that the War Labor Board was created for the purpose of alleviating labor troubles in war plants filling orders for the fighting forces of our men and their allies. It was never intended to interfere with the free choice of a bargaining agent by members or to force membership in a labor union against the will of the worker himself.

Congress not only has not authorized by law the seizure of nonwar private business but has expressly provided that an election must first be held before the management of a plant could bargain with a union. That was what Montgomery Ward & Co. was doing, simply complying with the law as written into the National Labor Relations Act and reaffirmed in the Smith-Connally Act.

Regardless of the fact that no legal authority exists to force the C. I. O. upon these employees and to confiscate Ward's store, Congress has moved fast to save what remains of freedom and liberty. The Senate and House both have approved resolutions to probe this un-American act on the part of power-drunk federalites. The Congress of the United States is the only hope left in America to combat the steady and consistent drift toward total dictatorship.

The people in this country have no intention whatever of accepting the "four freedoms," which have been publicized so broadly as the exclusive freedoms for which we fight. Freedom from want, fear, religion, and speech could be enjoyed although a goodly number of the citizens were confined to concentration camps. The most sacred of all freedoms which caused our forefathers to settle here was the freedom of opportunity and the resultant right to work—when, where, and for whom one pleases.

I feel that it is necessary to pass additional laws to strip any official of the power to trample to the ground the sacred rights of patriotic citizens. I have introduced today the following bill, which should be speedily enacted into law:

A bill to impose certain restrictions upon the taking possession of business enterprises

SECTION 1. The President, or any other officer or agency, shall have no authority under the provisions of section 9 of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended, or under any other provision of law, which authorizes the taking of possession by the Government of a strike-bound plant; to take possession of and/or operate such plant or business enterprise if it is carrying on essentially the same character of business that it was engaged in prior to December 7, 1941, unless such business enterprise is primarily and directly engaged in the manufacture, mining, or transportation of articles or materials necessary in the war effort.

SEC. 2. As used in this act the term "business enterprise" means any plant, mine, facility, or other industrial or business establishment.

A Worker Passes On

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, some of America's heroes of this war are seldom given the honor that is their due. All over the Nation men and women—many of them carrying a burden of age or physical handicap—are doing their work from day to day and taxing their strength to the very limit. In tribute to one such man, and through him, as a symbol of millions of others, I ask consent to include in the RECORD a brief paragraph from a letter recently received from one of my constituents, Miss Margaret Brown:

Tragedy struck Worth Bros. last Good Friday. Dick Pimely, of Pasadena, died. He worked the day before he died. He was my boss and I did not know it. I felt more as if he had been my dad. He was one of the kindly, worker type of men who keep the wheels of industry rolling—literally, and thus the wheels of America speeding on to victory. Dick has a boy overseas and a wife and sister at home. His sister lives here in Alhambra. Dick would oil my machine while it was running, Dick would put his arm around my shoulder and explain a detail about the threading of each spindle as Mr. Worth had explained or asked him to do when the men ran my frame after 3:30. Dick would arrive at 6:19 in the morning, turn on the heat and get the power going, and would work overtime until 4:30 every afternoon, except for the last week when the burning in his chest would cause Mr. Walter Worth or Roy to send him home. Just look how our older men are standing by America in her crisis and giving their lives.

The Truth About Liberty Ships

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD J. WELCH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, when the history of this war is finally written, the contribution made by the men and women building ships in the shipyards of the Nation will rank high among the reasons for our success. They rightfully deserve high honors for their patriotic efforts to make ships and more ships available to carry the supplies to our men and allies throughout the world.

There has been much unjust criticism leveled at accidents in construction of a few of the Liberty ships which created defects causing failure. On the other hand, it is the overwhelming success in the construction of these Liberty ships that has contributed so largely to the successes we and our allies have had on far-flung battle fronts. The following editorial which recently appeared in the Los Angeles Times, entitled "The Truth About Liberty Ships" tells the story of their value and success:

THE TRUTH ABOUT LIBERTY SHIPS

The loss at sea of the Liberty ship John Straub, with an estimated loss of 55 lives, gives the critics of our war-emergency shipbuilding program a fresh supply of ammunition. The campaign of condemnation has been led by Senator MON C. WALLGREN and Representative WARREN G. MAGNUSON, both Democrats and both of the State of Washington. So far as can be determined from the record of hearings held on the subject by the Senate Truman committee to date, they are very largely in the minority in their denunciation of what Senator WALLGREN, himself a member of the committee, calls the major scandal of the Liberty ships.

Before hastily concluding, on the strength of the Straub disaster, that these Congressmen are right and the others, who include the head, members, and technical experts of the United States Maritime Commission and the country's ablest shipbuilders, are wrong, it may be well to assemble the established facts and look them over open-mindedly.

In so doing, it is also well to keep in mind that the Liberty ship was not only our best answer but our only practicable answer to the war's sudden and imperative demand for the largest possible cargo fleet in the shortest possible time. Undoubtedly we could have built ships with a broader margin of safety against emergency conditions requiring hasty loading, overloading, and schedules that had to be met regardless of wind, weather, distance, enemy sea raiders, and other risks of war. If we had, however, it can be said with a minimum of doubt that by now we should have lost the war—or at least have lost our Russian, British, and Chinese allies in it. In that case we would not need the cargo ships, anyway, except the few we could employ in our own lone war against the combined and victory-enlarged strength of the Axis.

In other words, instead of the 2,500 new bottoms of roughly 30,000,000 aggregate tonnage which we have built since 1941 under the Liberty ship program, we should have been able to construct perhaps 400 of the older and—in one sense—doubtless safer types, or maybe 5,000,000 tons altogether. Since this number of vessels is fewer by about 300 than the toll of Axis submarines in the West Atlantic alone in the same interval, it seems probable that we should have lost all or nearly all of them by enemy action before they had much more than got started on their way with American war supplies for our allies.

What would have been the result? British authorities say that, in at least two separate periods of greatest danger, England was saved from collapse by the record rate of American shipbuilding alone. Stalin has said that our ship-borne lease-lend aid has been a large factor in enabling Russia to save herself and finally to turn back the invader. How much China, India, and Australia owe to the Liberty ship is not known, but it is at least a great deal, to say nothing of the war cargoes which have kept our own forces going in the Orient.

Now let's see how bad the Liberty ship "major scandal" actually has been.

The first Liberty built under the speedy new mass-production device of welding plates instead of riveting them was the Patrick Henry, launched at Baltimore September 27, 1941. She took about 240 days from keel-laying to delivery. This construction time was quickly lowered to a 64-day average, then to 50, 37, 25, and finally to the demonstration (nonschedule) record Kaiser performance of a completed ship in 7½ days. In December, last, we built 208 ships, an average of about 7 a day. Our record for all of 1941, practically all under the pre-Liberty system of construction, was 100 ships, or about 4 percent of the December rate of output.

To about mid March 1944 we had turned out about 2,200 Liberty ships. Of all these, the Straub is the sixth to break up at sea and the second on which lives have been lost. The first fatal accident to a Liberty was to the John P. Gaines, which split open in heavy Alaskan seas early last month. The crew took to lifeboats, and one of these, carrying 11 men, was lost in the fog. Total loss of life to date as a result of Liberty failures, 66. How many American and other Allied lives have they saved by expeditious overseas delivery of the tools of war?

This is, of course, only part of the story. According to testimony taken by the Truman committee here and elsewhere, about 170 Liberties altogether have developed structural defects, many of them minor. According to the National Maritime Commission, the national average of serious faults has been 3.23 percent, or about 70 ships altogether out of 2,200, which the National Maritime Commission says is "extremely low." Other witnesses put the number of "seriously faulty" ships at 65, those with "major faults" at 45. Congressman MAGNUSON'S count is 14 bad ones out of 1,700. Out of 333 deliveries from the Calship yards on Terminal Island, 8 developed serious defects after 1 to 22 months' service. Calship's rate of defectives has been 2.5 percent. The Kaiser yards at Portland, Oreg., have had 59 defectives (including minor faults) out of 300, but only 1 with even a minor defect in the last 97 turned out. All the Kaiser yards together have built 900 Liberties, or nearly half the total, and their over-all average of "serious faults" is included in the 3.23 percent national average.

Theoretically, of course, there should be no faults at all, but perfection in the hurry-scurry of wartime is too high a goal for practical realization. Better construction and inspection methods are lowering the defect rate and we are now getting started on construction of the Victory type of ships, faster and stronger vessels.

But for the emergency it so well met, the Liberty ship would have been hard to improve upon.

Refuting a Slander

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Tribune of May 4, 1944:

REFUTING A SLANDER

The executive committee of the American Legion has adopted a report retracting the unjustifiable criticism heaped on Representative HAMILTON FISH, the America First Committee, and other Members of Congress who opposed intervention in the European war before Pearl Harbor. A resolution of censure was adopted at the Omaha convention of the Legion last year. The report of the executive committee now says that the Legion had "no right, in good conscience, directly or by inference or innuendo, to impugn the good faith or ascribe any subversive or un-American tendencies to either such persons, their point of view, or their program. It is unfortunate that we should not have kept our escutcheon untarnished."

The resolution attacking Representative FISH was the result of a conspiracy among a few unprincipled men who were attending the Omaha convention and most of the Legion members knew nothing about the resolution until it had been passed. The vicious people who were responsible for it were allies of the New Deal smear gang, and there is nothing in American history as vile as the workings of that cabal.

The action of the Legion's executive committee exonerating Representative FISH and expressing regret for the resolution does as much justice to the Legion as it does to HAMILTON FISH. The responsible leaders of the American Legion recognized that their organization was duped, and by denouncing and repudiating the Fish resolution they will be able to clear the Legion's good name and preserve the respect which the Legion has always commanded.

Mr. Speaker, I also include the following letter from Senator ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas, which is self-explanatory:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, May 5, 1944.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR HAM: The report by the National Executive Committee of the American Legion was certainly a fine tribute to you, and you are worthy of everything they said. I am glad that Harry Colmery had a part in making this report. I am proud to say he is one of my best friends, and, furthermore, he is always right.

I would not be surprised if you are re-elected by the largest majority you have ever had. I certainly hope it will come that way.

Cordially yours,

ARTHUR CAPPER.

"American" Fascism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence, from the United States News, of May 12, 1944:

"AMERICAN" FASCISM

(By David Lawrence)

It can't happen here—no, not in America.

Here, of course, we believe in democracy—not totalitarianism.

Here we believe in courts of law—not government edicts enforced at the point of a bayonet.

Here we believe in labor unions, the right of self-organization, the right to strike, the right to lock out, the right to bargain collectively—not government control of labor unions enforced at the point of a bayonet.

The foregoing represented our thinking in America—indeed, our complacency—prior to April 26, 1944.

We now have entered a new epoch in American history—"the epoch of American fascism." It is not the kind that selects the same minorities for persecution that were selected abroad. It is not the kind that interferes with religious liberty, but it's the same brand of fascism that Hitler invoked when he ordered his own judges in the courts to decide cases in accordance with "local sentiment." It is the same kind that Mussolini introduced when he put labor unions under government control.

Many people have forgotten that Hitler's rise to dictatorship was thoroughly "constitutional." Every step along the way was buttressed by constitutional precedent—till he got possession of the government.

When Attorney General Biddle argued last week before Judge Holley in Federal court—not before he took military possession of Montgomery Ward but afterward—that the courts "ought" not to interfere with the Executive, he also said that the President has a "great constitutional reserve of power" and that "no business or property is immune to a Presidential order."

PLANT SEIZED ON BASIS OF DECREE, NOT COURT ORDER

Certainly in time of war there is ample authority for the President as Commander in Chief to do anything or everything to defend the Nation against military attack. Certainly, even in time of peace, the President as Commander in Chief can do almost anything to prevent armed insurrection. These are contingencies well understood and not at all pertinent to the present case.

What is pertinent is that the Roosevelt administration—using the powers and authority of the United States Government—seized a mail-order house at the point of a bayonet, never stopping to get a court order but merely presenting a piece of paper on which the President had written his own decree.

What is pertinent here also is that the national safety was not imperiled by waiting a few days to get a court order and to proceed in a lawful, constitutional manner to test the ambiguously worded statute.

PRESIDENT SHOULD HAVE ASKED FOR AID OF CONGRESS

When the War Labor Board last year ordered John L. Lewis and the United Mine Workers of America to sign a contract after the Government had seized the properties and the coal miners were still on strike, the President was asked by newspapermen in a press conference what he was going to do about it. He asked what action he could take—send a little polite note on pink paper and say, "Dear Mr. Lewis, I hope you will sign the contract"?

Mr. Roosevelt was right then. He is wrong now. He should have asked Congress for authority then. He should have asked Congress for authority on April 26, 1944. The Congress has not proclaimed the "maintenance of membership" scheme as a national policy of labor relations in time of war. Such an important step, to be enforced, should have had legislative sanction. The War Labor Board has not had and does not now have any legal right to compel an employer to fire a man because he hasn't kept up his union dues or retained his membership in a union. There is no statute that permits coercion of the employee by the employer.

But the administration has usurped this power just the same. The labor unions will rue the day they acquiesced in government by bayonet in enforcing Government control of labor unions. In the February 19, 1943 issue of this magazine, William M. Leiserson, at present chairman of the National Railway Mediation Board and formerly a member of the National Labor Relations Board, and an outstanding exponent of trade unionism throughout many years, wrote:

"In the face of a critical Congress, now inclined to restrict the rights and privileges labor organizations have won, organized labor has concentrated its forces on the executive branch, and, in spite of the urgency of the war program, has made demands with little restraint. If organized labor were in the mood to take stock, it would discover that it is growing increasingly dependent on the executive branch of the Government, not only for those things that it ordinarily strives to get by collective bargaining with employers, but also for the maintenance of its own membership and the stability of its structure as a combination of labor organizations. Indeed, organized labor now moves in a vicious circle: As it resorts more and more to political action to achieve its objectives, it tends to divide its members and to disrupt its organization; then it must appeal to Government to use its coercive powers to force workers into unions or to prevent members from resigning.

"Never before has the labor movement considered it wise to compel membership by Government edict. For half a century, Samuel Gompers preached the gospel of voluntarism and won its acceptance by most collective-bargaining organizations. Under that policy, union men refused to work with nonmembers, using their bargaining strength to compel employment of members only; but the issue of the closed shop was normally considered nonarbitrable—unions being unwilling to delegate to any arbitrator the authority to force workers into a union or the correlative authority to keep them out. Now, however, the labor organizations seem to be of one mind, that they must get union security from the Government.

"To some extent the labor movement has committed itself to this policy because it fears an antiunion drive after the war which might destroy its gains. But it may be questioned whether unions are building security by having the Government compel thousands, perhaps millions, of working people to join or to remain members against their will."

MAINTENANCE OF MEMBERSHIP AS A LABOR POLICY

The War Labor Board says that it has made the "maintenance of membership" clause a national policy and that it must be included in contracts hereafter. Under its terms, employers agree to discharge anybody failing to keep up membership. In 291 cases between January 12, 1941, and February 29, 1944, involving "maintenance of membership," the National War Labor Board decided 271 in favor of compelling "maintenance of membership." This provided a guarantee of union dues from 1,409,050 workers.

During the same period, the regional war labor boards, basing their action on National War Labor Board precedents, granted "maintenance of membership" in 783 out of 817 cases involving 351,000 workers. These figures were issued by the War Labor Board.

The Board takes the position that the "maintenance of membership" scheme is a reward to labor for its "no-strike" pledge. But what about the employers who have maintained a "no-lockout" policy and have scrupulously adhered to it? What is their reward?

CAN BAYONETS BE USED TO ENFORCE ALL DIRECTIVES?

And what about the pledges given by the officials of the Roosevelt administration from the President down, and reiterated glibly by the War Labor Board itself, that the war emergency would not be used to exploit advantages by either labor or management? Is the use of the bayonet to force the unwilling hand of the employer to sign a "maintenance of membership" clause a fulfillment of that original pledge? This betrayal violates every concept of fair play, promotes distrust and intensifies disunity.

Senator BYRD in a public statement last week said:

"Have we reached a State in this country that the directives of a Federal bureau can be enforced at the point of the bayonet? If the directives of the War Labor Board can be so enforced on a nonwar business operation, then so can the directives issued by the Office of Price Administration, the War Production Board, and the dozens of other Government agencies, with the result that the constitutional rights of the citizens of America will be denied to them of adjudication of their rights in the proper court of law.

"In this instance, Mr. Biddle assumed the position of both the judge and the prosecutor. Are we coming to a gestapo in this country? Does Francis Biddle cherish the ambition to be an American Himmler?

"Our boys enlisted and were drafted to fight the Japs and the Germans. They did not enlist to enter the offices of businessmen throughout the country and drag the men from their businesses by physical force and thus violate the very principles of freedom at home which our sons are fighting and dying abroad to preserve.

"The American people are shocked by this unwarranted use of military power."

What is Congress going to do about it? What are the people saying to their Senators and Representatives about it? Or is Congress just another Reichstag—putty in the hands of the coercionists? The will of the people can still be expressed at the polls.

Resolution of the American-Italian Democratic Club

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS F. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted by the American-Italian Democratic Club:

Whereas Dr. Gaetano Salvemini has been represented in the public press not only as opposing the continuation of the monarchy in Italy, but also as gratuitously charging President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill with being abysmally ignorant of European conditions; and

Whereas the American-Italian Democratic Club, while confirming its unequivocal opposition to the monarchy in Italy, is nevertheless convinced that both President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill are in a position to know all conditions in Italy, and to determine the best policy to follow, temporarily or otherwise, in order to achieve not only the liberation of Italy but also the supreme purpose of defeating the enemies of democracy in Europe; and

Whereas both President Roosevelt and Winston Churchill have, in enumerable occasions, shown their ability to direct the course of their respective governments with competence, firmness, and exhaustive knowledge of the tremendous international problems now confronting their nations and the entire world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American-Italian Democratic Club expresses the most severe condemnation of the intemperate and unseemly remarks uttered by Professor Salvemini against the illustrious leaders of the two greatest democracies; and be it further

Resolved, That the American-Italian Democratic Club reaffirms its complete and unshaken confidence in the President of the United States and in his willingness and ability to use his great personality to further, and the great powers of the United States to defend, the cause of the world's democracy until its final and ultimate triumph.

Admiral King Absolves Congress of Leaving Guam Unfortified

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER E. BREHM

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald of May 8, 1944:

ADMIRAL KING ABSOLVES CONGRESS OF LEAVING GUAM UNFORTIFIED

Demands that Admiral King, commander in chief of the United States Fleet and chief of naval operations explain the "false" and "unjustified" charges in his official report on the Navy at war that Congress was responsible for our failure to fortify Guam, yesterday brought an almost complete retraction of these allegations.

In a letter to Acting Secretary of Navy Forrestal, Admiral King completely absolved the Senate and gave almost a complete exoneration to the House to the accusations that have been employed in primary campaigns against Senators TYDINGS (D.), of Maryland; HOLMAN (R.), of Oregon; and NYE (R.) of North Dakota.

The letter in effect placed the blame for Guam going unfortified on President Roosevelt. It said the "essential desirability" for fortifying Guam was communicated to Congress in the report of the Hepburn Board of 1939, and orally by the chief of naval operations in the course of committee hearings on a House resolution to increase naval aviation facilities on Guam. It said these recommendations never were incorporated in the bill.

While Admiral Arthur J. Hepburn, commander in chief of the Fleet, recommended fortifications costing $180,000,000 be built, neither the President nor the Navy made a direct request to Congress for such an appropriation. Admiral King skirted these facts, however, in his letter absolving Congress.

In his letter to Forrestal, Admiral King wrote:

"The essential desirability of fortifying Guam was communicated to Congress in the report of the Hepburn Board in 1939 and orally by the chief of naval operations in the course of the committee hearings on H. R. 2880 (76th Cong., 1st sess.), but these proposals were never embodied in formal draft legislation.

"Though the question of 'fortification' entered into the debate on said bill, it was not included in the bill as voted upon. The proposals relating to Guam that received adverse votes in Congress were:

"(A) A provision in H. R. 2880 (changed to H. R. 4278) introduced February 21, 1939, to establish, develop, or increase naval aviation facilities at Guam. (B) A provision in the 1940 naval appropriations bill for improvement of harbor channels at Guam."

Duplicate Inquiries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an editorial published in the Washington Post, of Sunday, May 7, 1944. This editorial entitled "Duplicate Inquiries" is a discussion of the congressional attitude toward the seizure of Montgomery Ward's Chicago store, and I believe the points raised are worth the thoughtful consideration of the Members of this body:

DUPLICATE INQUIRIES

Further evidence of the deep concern of Congress over the seizure of Montgomery Ward's Chicago store may be seen in the House vote of 300 to 60 for a resolution authorizing another investigation of the incident. No doubt some who are chiefly interested in having Sewell Avery's arbitrary conduct further explored voted for the resolution. But for the most part the vote was a protest against the Government's arbitrary conduct in resorting to armed force to take over a plant not directly connected with the war effort. We share this anxiety over the reckless use of Executive power, but we also believe that the House investigation is likely to result in a waste of time and money.

Basically, the question raised by this seizure is a legal one. It must be determined by the courts. There is every indication that it will be carried to the Supreme Court, which means that the final decision may not be known before next year. Meanwhile we see no reason why two congressional committees should waste their time rehashing the facts of the company's defiance and the Government's use of armed force, which are already well known.

There is much sentiment in Congress for modification of the Connally-Smith Act, so as to make it absolutely plain that no authority has been granted to the President to seize civilian industries and commercial enterprises not supplying the Army and Navy. But in any event Congress would scarcely know how to draft such legislation until the courts have spoken. And if the courts should uphold the seizure under the Connally-Smith Act without passing upon the scope of his powers as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the President would presumably go on taking over nonwar plants and stores that refuse to obey the W. L. B. regardless of anything that Congress might do.

This is indeed an anomalous situation for any democratic country to face, but it is part of a general problem of greatly expanded executive powers in wartime. The Senate Judiciary Committe was already making a general study of Executive orders and directives when the present case arose. Senator MCCARRAN sent an investigator to Chicago to look into the Montgomery Ward incident even before the Senate backed up that inquiry by passing the Byrd resolution. Hearings will also be held by this committee. To institute a separate House inquiry in the face of this elaborate effort to obtain all the facts for the information of Congress is an inexcusable waste of effort. The House could reasonably have asked the Senate for a joint inquiry. Or it could have asked its appropriate standing committee to look into the facts and determine, when feasible, whether new or additional legislation is desirable. The procedure it has chosen serves chiefly to emphasize the inefficiency of Congress as a legislative body and thus to distract attention from the power-grabbing proclivity of the administration.

Declaration of Policy on World-Wide Aviation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEAN P. TAYLOR

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following communication received by me from the Mechanicville (N. Y.) Chamber of Commerce:

MECHANICVILLE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Mechanicville, N. Y., April 21, 1944.

Hon. DEAN TAYLOR,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN TAYLOR: You have no doubt noted the declaration of policy on world-wide aviation, as filed on July 15, 1943, with the Civil Aeronautics Board by the 16 signatory air lines. The Chamber of Commerce of Mechanicville has given careful consideration to and approval of the five following policies in international air transportation as defined in this declaration:

I. Free and open competition—world-wide—subject to reasonable regulation by the appropriate governmental agencies.

II. Private ownership and management.

III. Fostering and encouragement by the Government of the United States of a sound world-wide air-transportation system.

IV. Freedom of transit in peaceful flight—world-wide.

V. Acquisition of civil and commercial outlets required in the public interest.

The above objectives have been approved by this organization and we now therefore respectively urge that Congress incorporate and adopt the above five basic policies. With such commitment by Congress, the appropriate governmental agencies will then be enabled to direct their efforts so as to accomplish these desired objectives in their planning of foreign air-transportation routes to be operated by United States flag air carriers.

Respectfully yours,

O. W. KREUTZER,
Secretary.

We Are Fooling Ourselves About Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, in connection with our recent struggle to simplify tax returns I desire to extend my remarks to include an interesting article, "We Are Fooling Ourselves About Taxes," which appeared in a recent issue of the Michigan State Labor Journal, Michigan's only independent union labor paper:

WE ARE FOOLING OURSELVES ABOUT TAXES

How much of the price of a 10-cent loaf of bread is taxes? I don't know exactly, but a large group of statisticians and tax experts investigated a number of such items for a couple of years and came up with the figure of "between 2 and 2½ cents." Two cents is not a considerable amount, but it is between 20 and 25 percent of the price of the loaf of bread, and that puts a different light on it.

How about your automobile? There must be 10,000 items of tax in an automobile. I believe there probably are 100,000 different tax items in a thousand-dollar car. They amount to close to $250. So, again, 25 percent of the cost of an automobile is taxes. But I do not know exactly how much and, like most of us, when I get my new car I am so excited about my new purchase, about its color and body lines, that I don't stop to worry about how much of it is taxes. Probably I wouldn't enjoy the car as much if I did know.

Does the figure of between 10,000 and 100,000 different items of taxes in an automobile sound farfetched? Well, take the smallest screw in an automobile, for example. Some of the taxes represented in that little screw are:

1. The income tax of the screw manufacturer. Also, that manufacturer's property tax, capital-stock tax, old-age and unemployment-insurance tax.

2. The machinery on which the screw was made contained all the above taxes for the machine manufacturer. The cutting and lubricating oil had many taxes on them, too.

3. When the machinery was transported and later when the screws were shipped by train or truck, they accumulated some more tax costs of the transportation agency.

4. The raw material from which the screw is made also has all the above types of taxes in it.

We could go farther and farther into the subject, but we are only talking about one screw. There are hundreds of screws, bolts, rivets, etc., in a car. Take the carburetor alone and think of all the parts entering into it and each part with all these dozens of taxes in it. So you see, perhaps 100,000 is still too low. And you can see why neither you nor I know exactly how much the tax is.

The Treasury Department and the White House, according to some recent headlines, are still opposed to the sales tax. The C. I. O. has also expressed its opposition to the direct sales tax. They all say they don't like it because it bears too heavily on lower income groups. But the real reason ought to be pretty obvious.

Taxes that are all covered up like those I have been describing are called hidden taxes. The sales tax, income tax, withholding tax or property tax are called direct taxes, because you pay them directly as such and you know how much you are paying because you make out a check for the amount or fork it over in greenbacks.

But, when you pay between 20 and 25 percent of the price of a loaf of bread or a new car in taxes which are hidden from you, you seldom realize at the time that you are paying it and it doesn't occur to you to check up and find out exactly how much of it is taxes. For example, do you realize that the Federal taxes on cigarettes and on liquor are from twice to four times as much as the total factory cost of making the cigarettes or the liquor? This is a fact.

Well, and so what?

Just this. When you spent $1,000 for a new car, what is it really for? What are you getting for your money? The taxes are a part of the price of the car, but they are not a part of the car, like one of its accessories. Seven hundred and fifty dollars is for the car. Two hundred and fifty dollars more or less, is the cost of Government hidden in the price of the car. When you pay for the car, and for your bread, meat, clothes, and cigarettes, you are really paying a large and unknown amount of wages to various Government employees.

Now, suppose all taxes were direct. When you went to the grocery for a loaf of bread, the grocer would tell you, "It's 8 cents for the bread and 2 cents for taxes." The car dealer would say, "The car is $750 and there is a tax of $250." The liquor dealer would say, "It's 75 cents for the quart of whisky and $3 more for tax." You would probably yelp in amazement and disbelief. You wouldn't like it a bit and neither would any of your friends and they would want to see something done about it pretty fast.

You would all sit down at the end of a month and figure out this tax business and you'd begin to realize what it was costing you, in pleasures you could have had, to be supporting millions of Government employees all over the country. And you would begin to inquire very minutely into just what these employees were doing to be earning your dough. You might even say, "Why not let about half of them quit living off my wages and start working in factories and on the farms producing for a change."

That's the tax story in a nutshell. If it's a direct tax, you know "how much and when." A sales tax is a direct tax and you do know. A sales tax doesn't have to be uniform in rate. It could be 10 percent on food, 15 percent on clothes, 25 percent on cars and gasoline, 50 percent on jewelry, diamonds, and so forth, 100 percent on cigarettes and liquor and 200 percent on motorboats, yachts, and club memberships to "soak the rich" if you wanted it that way.

Of course, with such sales taxes in operation, all corporation taxes should be canceled. You realize that you pay the "corporation" taxes anway, as we have just demonstrated in talking about the taxes included in even one small screw on your car. The corporation simply collects all the taxes involved from you and passes them on to the Government.

And now you see why the politicians shy away from the sales tax as if it were rank poison. The answer as to whether or not a sales tax is a good tax is answered by another question—"good for whom?" It is good for the taxpayer and the consumer, but it might be bad—very bad—for a lot of people with their fingers in the political pork barrel.

The Cartel Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from the address of Gilbert H. Montague, of the New York bar, before Institute on Postwar Reconstruction, New York University, April 19, 1944:

"Cartel" is the newest epithet in the antitrust vocabulary.

This word has now been so overworked that it is fast losing all its sting.

This point was reached last January 1944, when a motor-carrier consolidation, which had been expressly authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission after full hearings, report, and argument, and later had been unanimously approved by a statutory three-judge court after full hearings and argument, and later after appeal and argument before the Supreme Court had been approved in an exhaustive Supreme Court opinion, was nevertheless called a cartel by the two dissenting Supreme Court Justices.

"Cartel" means today, therefore, merely something that somebody happens to dislike.

Most of the international trade agreements attacked as cartels by the Department of Justice rest on patent license limitations and conditions based on Supreme Court decisions whose authority was unquestioned before 1938.

Since 1938 the Supreme Court has been narowing its interpretation of the patent laws, and stretching its interpretation of what the antitrust laws forbid, so that today there is legal doubt about limitations and conditions in patent agreements which before 1938 rested securely on Supreme Court decisions in which had concurred such precursors and stalwarts of the New Deal as Justice Holmes, Justice Brandeis, and Justice (now Chief Justice) Stone.

In this new area into which the Supreme Court has been beckoning and leading since 1938, it is hardly strange that the Department of Justice is now instituting many new prosecutions.

Deficient in petroleum, rubber, quinine and numerous other materials essential in case of war, and deficient also in seapower by which to import them in case of embargo or war, Germany concentrated for many years on chemical research and production synthetically on a commercial scale products or substitutes of these materials.

With respect to these strategic materials, German universities have graduated more chemists, and German governments have aided more chemical research and production on a commercial scale, than any other nation in the world.

America and Great Britain did not concentrate on these things, because for a small fraction of the cost of producing these synthetics America and Great Britain could produce or import the natural materials themselves, and because America and Great Britain, unlike Germany, were always confident that their sea power could enable them to import any materials they did not themselves produce.

Because of all this, German chemical companies led the world in chemical research and production synthetically on a commercial scale of products and substitutes of petroleum, rubber, quinine, and other strategic materials, and the governments of every nation in the world, especially the United States and Great Britain, in consideration of the public disclosure of these German inventions, were issuing in the 1920's and 1930's to German chemical companies and their nominees thousands of patents covering thousands of German inventions.

If "Patents for Hitler" had been "Germany's Master Plan," those German chemical companies should have kept for themselves the patents they thus obtained from the Governments of the United States and Great Britain and every other nation in the world.

Just the opposite happened, however.

Throughout the 1920's and 1930's American industrialists, now defamed by the authors of various books, articles, statements, and speeches as traitors or saps, or both, succeeded in obtaining from the "supermen" and "herrenvolk" directing these German chemical companies, now acclaimed by Dr. Goebbels and these authors as the intellectual and business masters of these American industrialists, the right and "know how" to develop and improve upon and manufacture on a gigantic scale German inventions covered by these German-owned patents.

This has enabled America in its hour of greatest need to produce 100-octane aviation gasoline now used by all bombers and fighters of the United Nations, and buna synthetic rubber which is the chief part of the Government's present synthetic rubber program, and substitutes for quinine like atabrine whose production has been raised from 5,000,000 tablets annually before this war to over 1,000,000,000 tablets in 1943, without which American troops could not take the field against the Japs in the Solomon Islands or New Guinea or China or in any other malaria-infected region of the world.

To obtain for American industry the right and "know-how" to use the German inventions covered by these German-owned patents, American industrialists had to come to terms with the German companies owning these patents.

If all that a German company would grant was a right and "know-how" under a United States patent, the American industrialist had no right to manufacture or sell in South America, for a United States patent is, of course, limited to the United States.

This explains why some German inventions manufactured and sold within the United States have not been sold in South America.

Sometimes a German company would grant only a limited right and "know how" under a United States patent, restricting the American industrialist in respect to the quantity of the product he might manufacture under the German invention, the price at which he might sell it, and the purpose for which, the manner in which, and the geographical area within which he might manufacture and sell it.

Sometimes a German company would grant the right and "know how" only on the condition that the American industrialist would grant to the German company a reciprocal right and "know how" in improvements discovered or invented by the American industrialist in the field opened up by the German invention.

Foreign trade that in no way involves patent agreements seems also to be engaging the Department of Justice's attention.

A typical foreign trade pattern is this:

An American national gets a foothold in a foreign country, and its success attracts competition in that country from other American nationals, and from nationals of that country, and from nationals of other foreign countries.

American nationals continue competing in that foreign country with one another, and with nationals of that country, and with nationals of other foreign countries, until the nationals of that country, or the government of that country, or both, become restive and critical of the extent to which American nationals are winning the market in that country.

Thereupon the nationals of that country, or their government, or both, intimate to these American nationals that unless they consent to an arrangement restricting their proportion of the market in that country, or limiting their competition in that country with one another and with nationals of that country and with nationals of other foreign countries, the government may enact a tariff, or impose import quotas, or establish a government monopoly, or take other measures to oust American nationals from continuing the business they have built up in that country.

On other continents outside North America such arrangements are customary, lawful, and encouraged by governments, and by public opinion, and by generations of judicial decisions and trade custom.

Arrangements analogous to these have repeatedly been upheld by judicial decisions of the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which are the highest courts of Great Britain and the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Not as a complaint against our Supreme Court and our antitrust laws, but as a plain statement of fact, it is axiomatic that American nationals doing business abroad must frequently condition themselves to customs and pressures of foreign governments, foreign public opinion, and foreign competitors, compelling arrangements which, if made and operative within the United States, might be contrary to recent decisions of our Supreme Court and other Federal courts.

If American nationals, under these circumstances, are liable to prosecution by the Department of Justice, they will be as completely barred by the United States from doing business abroad as were the nationals of China and Japan during the centuries when these were the "hermit nations."

The United States with its allies is now engaged in a devastating war.

With the peace will come international problems of the utmost difficulty.

The United States has a democratic political system and a competitive economic system.

The United States does not intend to coerce Great Britain, Soviet Russia, China, and the rest of the post-war world to adopt the democratic political system of the United States.

But in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice of the United States some officials now appear eager to coerce Great Britain, Soviet Russia, China, and all the rest of the world to adopt the competitive system of the United States, with all the refinements added by successive decisions of the Supreme Court under the antitrust laws.

This program these Department of Justice officials are now carrying out in the midst of the greatest war in history, instituting every kind of criminal and civil prosecution in their power for the purpose of injecting into foreign and international trade relationship every new requirement of competition that can be spelled out of the Supreme Court's ever-expanding interpretations of the antitrust laws.

President Wilson, in the First World War, foresaw the folly of all this, and also the folly of subjecting Americans doing business abroad to all the requirements of all the American antitrust laws, as well as all the requirements of all the laws of the foreign countries where they are doing business, while the foreigners against whom they are competing abroad need comply only with the laws of the foreign countries where they are doing business.

To correct this obvious injustice and absurdity, Congress during the First World War enacted at President Wilson's insistence the Webb Export Trade Act of 1918, which now, however, is quite out of date.

Without delay, therefore, the State Department, the Department of Justice, the Foreign Economic Administration, and every other Government department and agency pertaining to this subject should promptly collaborate in framing and recommending to Congress legislation to meet this situation, so that now in this present Second World War and for all the post-war period there can be achieved all the objectives that President Wilson sought to attain when he procured the enactment of the Webb Export Trade Act in 1918.

Resolution of the Ohio Senate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution of the Ninety-fifth General Assembly of Ohio:

Senate Resolution 51

Resolution to provide that the State of Ohio be recognized in the naming of a street in the Nation's Capital and in the naming of a battleship in her honor.

Whereas the State of Ohio stands at the head of the list of States in many respects and near the head of the list in all respects; and

Whereas the sons and daughters of the Buckeye State have heaped laurels on her fair name in the fields of science, literature, art, commerce, and industry; and

Whereas in the arts of war and in the arts of peace Ohio stands forth renowned and distinguished, ever ready to fight the battles for liberty and freedom, and at the same time a bulwark of strength to the weak and the oppressed; and

Whereas in this most terrific war of all history Ohio's sailors and marines and WAVES and SPARS man every American battleship, every cruiser, every destroyer, every submarine, and every war craft afloat today that ride the waves of the seven seas: Therefore be it

Resolved, In conformity to the rank and position of the State of Ohio in the great sisterhood of States, it is deemed most fitting and proper that the name of the fair State of Ohio assume due recognition in the Nation's Capital on equal footing with her sisters of New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, in that an avenue or boulevard bear the name of Ohio, in the city of Washington, the most beautiful city in the world, and the Capital of the greatest Nation in the world, out of respect to one of the indestructible links from which that Nation has been forged, and in keeping with the honor, dignity, and prestige of the Buckeye State; and be it further

Resolved, While Ohio does not grace the shore line of the Atlantic or the Pacific, her contribution to the naval history of our Nation from the time of Perry's victory on Lake Erie in 1813, when Capt. James Lawrence's dying words: "Don't give up the ship" became the battle cry of Perry and his men, down to this very day and hour, when our sailors and marines shed their blood and die in the far-flung waters of the seven seas in order that liberty and freedom may not perish from the face of the earth, would merit the feeling of pride on the part of residents of Ohio, who should be able to point to the achievements of a battleship bearing the name of their native State, and that the name Ohio no longer remain an obsolete word in the lexicon of the present American Navy, and that the name Ohio grace the prow of one of the new battleships that our country will be building in the near future; and be it further

Resolved, That a properly authenticated copy of this resolution be forwarded by the clerk of the senate to the Secretary of the Navy, Frank Knox, to John Russell Young, president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and to the United States Senators and to each of the Members of Congress from Ohio.

I, Thomas E. Bateman, hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of Senate Resolution 51 adopted by the Ohio Senate on April 27, 1944.

THOMAS E. BATEMAN,
Clerk of the Senate.

Great Britain and Post-War Civil Aviation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED L. BULWINKLE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, on April 20, I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a portion of a most interesting speech, indeed, made in the Canadian House of Commons by the Honorable C. D. Howe, Minister of Munitions and Supply, on the subject of post-war aviation. It will be recalled that Mr. Howe on that occasion advised the Canadian House of Commons that due to Canada's experience in air transportation Canada would require that all modes of surface transport divorce themselves from control of air transport within 1 year after the current war. Canada had tried control of an air carrier by surface transport. It did not work. Hence the decision of the Canadian Government.

Along this line the House will be interested to know that a similar situation took place in the British House of Commons. In the debate of March 14, 1944, on page 147, Sir Archibald Sinclair, Secretary of State for Air in Great Britain, said:

Just as I have always fought the idea that the air force should be split up and developed as ancillary to the Army and Navy, so I believe it would be short-sighted to allow the growth of civil aviation to be subordinated to the interests of older forms of transport.

A little further on in the same speech on page 150, we find Sir Archibald Sinclair, in replying to a statement by Lord Beaverbrook to the effect that in England a chosen instrument had no monopoly of anything in international aviation except a monopoly of subsidies, stating as follows:

It is true that at present there is no statutory bar to the operation of unsubsidized services by other interests, but I am afraid that only the most lucrative routes would be attractive to those other interests, and I cannot help doubting whether Parliament would approve of a policy which left the most profitable routes to private enterprise, and left the state to shoulder the burden of the unprofitable. Moreover * * * governments are hardly like to seek from foreign countries * * * facilities for private undertakings to compete against a public corporation, to deprive it of profitable traffic, to leave it * * * with the Cairo to Karachi route and to take from it the New York to London route, thereby increasing the burden on the taxpayer of maintaining the public corporation, which would be indispensable for national, imperial, colonial, commercial, and defense purposes.

West Point

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to call the attention of the Congress to the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the passage of the act creating the grade of cadet in the Army. I include an editorial entitled "West Point," from the New York Times of Sunday, May 7, 1944. Few congressional actions have brought so many rich returns to the people of this country as those which founded the United States Military Academy at West Point, and which have aided in the development of this institution to its present state of excellence.

WEST POINT

The United States Military Academy at West Point observes today the one-hundred-and-fiftieth anniversary of the passage of a congressional act creating the grade of cadet in the Army. That act was the real beginning of the West Point of the present, though the act creating the academy itself had to wait 8 years. Both measures were the fruit of the foresight and the persistence of George Washington.

As early as the dark year 1776 Washington had seen the need for a school in which men should be trained in military science in readiness for emergencies that might come. He had had enough, he said, of officers ignorant of their profession; he yearned for "men that may give luster to our arms." He kept the vision before him, and always, in his opinion, the place for the school was the already historic West Point, then "the key to America." He visited the post in 1783 and in imagination saw the great establishment that now stands there.

The young country was slow to catch his idea. It was tired of war and had no military ambitions. It wanted to turn to the business of peacetime and enjoy the freedom the now disbanded Army had won. Americans of that generation were very like those of later ones. But Washington, in his annual message as President in 1793, still urged that the system of national defense should "afford an opportunity for the study of those branches of the art which can scarcely be attained by practice alone." It was in response to that appeal that Congress at last passed the act which West Point recalls today.

After a century and a half, no citizen needs to be told what West Point has meant to the well-being of the United States. Woven in the fabric of our history is a shining line of men who once were cadets on the sightly parade ground in the Hudson highlands: Grant and Lee, Jackson and Sherman, Pershing, March, and Bullard. And now again, in the grimmest ordeal of our years as a Nation, we put our hope and our faith in West Pointers whose watchword is that of their school: "Duty, honor, country."

What About That Canal Proposal?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Mansfield (Ohio) News-Journal of May 6, 1944:

WHAT ABOUT THAT CANAL PROPOSAL?

More information than is readily available seems necessary in reaching a conclusion as to advisability of the Government—which means the taxpayers—expending close to $40,000,000 to construct a canal from the Ohio River to Struthers, which is in the Ohio steel mill district.

It appears that such a proposal is before Congress, presented by Senator BURTON and endorsed by Senator TAFT, but, oddly enough, it is reported from Washington that J. HARRY MCGREGOR, Congressman from this district, spoke against it, which arouses interest as Mr. MCGREGOR'S position is usually quite soundly taken.

As nearly as can be judged, with information incomplete, the canal project is one that has bobbed up from time to time for a number of years, promoted by what is termed "Youngstown interests," and said to be opposed by the entire steel industry with the exception of a few mills in Youngstown.

Explanation offered by the Upper Ohio Valley Association, formed some years ago to oppose the project, is that "these mills want a cheaper method of bringing coal from their captive mines in Pennsylvania to the Youngstown mills, and a less expensive way of delivering the finished product.

"This desire may be natural," the opposing association says, "but to ask other mills and taxpayers everywhere to stand the expense of building and maintaining an outmoded, subsidized form of transportation for the use of two or three steel plants doesn't sound economical or fair."

Which gives what is called the Beaver-Mahoning Canal proposal all the elements of controversy, and if the facts are as stated by the Upper Ohio Valley Association spokesmen it may appear that our Congressman is justified in opposing the measure, even though he may be running counter to views of our Senators.

Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. RICHARDS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address recently delivered by me on America's Town Hall Meeting of the Air program in Philadelphia:

Do we have a positive foreign policy now? Emphatically we have. Whatever the shortcomings of the past may have been, today our foreign policy is one which we and the rest of the world can understand and one of which every American citizens may well be proud. There is nothing secret or evasive about it. It is not a statement of vague principles. It blazes a trail that those who will can find and follow. It has developed into a clear-cut bill of rights for men and nations everywhere, and the enunciation of our foreign policy has been followed up by dynamic action on the part of our Government.

As Secretary of State Hull has said, in determining our foreign policy we must first see clearly where our true national interests are. So, necessarily, the first aim of our foreign policy is to win the war. To win the war there must be unity among the United Nations. To attain unity some nation must lead by word and example. That nation has been the United States.

Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill in the Atlantic Charter proclaimed the principles of liberty, economic opportunity, peace, and security through international cooperation.

To chart a course of united action on the basis of the Atlantic Charter our Government proposed to the nations of the earth still outside of the Axis orbit a joint declaration as to a course of united war action.

Not only representatives of the United States, Great Britain, China, and Russia signed the document known as the Declaration by United Nations, but also 22 other nations. Since that time, 9 others have come into the fold. Thus 35 nations have pledged all of their resources to the winning of the war and bound themselves to make no separate peace with the enemy.

The next objective of our foreign policy was to promote the future security of our country by taking definite steps to weld the United Nations together for a course of postwar action calculated to insure international cooperation for the preservation of the peace.

There were many who scoffed at Mr. Hull when he took his brief case in his hand and went to Moscow for conferences with Stalin and representatives of China and Great Britain with that object in view. But those who scoffed remained to pray. Mr. Hull came back from Moscow with his—and I say "his" advisedly—historic document signed, sealed, and delivered.

To put it briefly that declaration of four great powers states that their united action in prosecuting the war will be continued for the organization and maintenance of peace and security; that they will act together in all matters relating to the surrender and disarmament of their common enemies; that they recognize the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organization of all peace-loving states to maintain peace and security.

In the years to come this document will be recognized as the forerunner of a new era in history. This agreement was brought into being through the leadership of the positive and strongly asserted foreign policy of the United States.

Thus our foreign policy became a two-edged sword—one the one side cooperative effort to win the war; on the other, international cooperation to preserve the peace. The initial move in each case was made by those in charge of the foreign policy of the United States.

To implement the Atlantic Charter and the declaration of the United Nations, the President himself, in the interest of harmony and unity of purpose, went abroad, and at Teheran he, Churchill, and Stalin broadened and made more definite the policy of cooperation and agreement, both as to the winning of the war and the preservation of peace thereafter.

At Cairo, the President, Mr. Churchill, and Chiang Kai-shek further agreed on war policies in the Pacific, and there agreed that Japan after our victory would be forced to disgorge her ill-gotten territorial gains.

As a further step along the road to cooperation and understanding, the European Advisory Commission suggested by the Moscow conferences has been appointed to study and examine the various European questions arising as the war develops.

There have been held already two great United Nation conferences, both in the United States, on the questions of relief and rehabilitation and food. Our representatives are also meeting with representatives of the other United Nations to study post-war educational policies. Another group is trying to solve the problem of international post-war civil aviation. These are only a few of the vital questions which may be solved by cooperative spirit.

I reassert that the foreign policy of the United States can easily be understood not only by the people of our own country but also by other peoples everywhere. On more than one occasion its main points have been published to the world. They are:

1. Destruction of fascism and nazi-ism.
2. Creation of an international organization backed by force to keep the peace.
3. Reduction of international trade barriers.
4. Simplification of international finance.
5. Sovereign equality of nations.
6. Freedom of people to choose their form of government.
7. Nonintervention.
8. Arbitration of differences.
9. Establishment of an international court of justice.
10. Discouragement of spheres of influence and alliances.
11. No secret agreements or commitments, political or financial.

It is not an easy thing for those in charge of the foreign affairs of a democracy to put into effect a definite sustained course of foreign policy because in a democracy any such policy is subservient to the will of the people. It is doubly hard in the United States to formulate a definite and permanent foreign policy on account of our two-party system of government and our constitutional provision requiring ratification of all treaties by two-thirds vote of the Senate. The President and Mr. Hull, however, have shown sympathetic understanding of our constitutional processes and on all occasions have consulted and gone hand in hand with Congress on matters of foreign policy. The passage by an overwhelming vote of the Fulbright and Connally resolutions calling for an international organization to maintain a just and lasting peace bespeaks cooperation and agreement between the legislative and Executive in this field.

It should be kept in mind that during wartime our military and diplomatic effort must be carefully coordinated, and this is the case on all fronts of the world today.

Then too, don't forget that this is election year under our two-party system. This is a time when the record of the party in power is being critically scanned for flaws in both the fields of foreign and domestic policy.

It is being said that our foreign policy is not definite, and does not go enough into detail. The best answer to that charge is the declaration of the Republican Party at the Mackinac conference last fall, which said:

"1. We declare our approval of responsible participation by the United States in post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations to prevent military aggression and to attain permanent peace with organized justice in a free world.

"2. At this time a detailed program for the accomplishment of these great objectives will be impossible and specific commitments of this council of the Republican Party or by the Nation would be unwise."

What better defense of our present foreign policy could be wanted?

Steadfastly, the President and Secretary of State have pursued main objectives. They have properly refused to be diverted by selfish bickering here and abroad. It must be heartening to them that the great opposition party has voiced approval of the keynotes of their foreign policy. Never was there more urgent need for unity in that field. In the words of Benjamin Franklin: "We must all hang together, or assuredly we shall all hang separately."

Aviation Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under the leadership of the Tennessee Bureau of Aeronautics, the first program for mass aviation indoctrination of high-school teachers to be held anywhere in the United States will begin shortly at Austin Peay State College, Clarksville, Tenn.

During the course of that special program at least 1,000 Tennessee high-school teachers will be given an intensive course of instruction in basic aviation training which will aid them in teaching subjects related to flying in the public schools.

Under leave granted to extend my remarks I desire to include here a press release which explains briefly the nature of that program.

It follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., April 13.—America's first program for mass aviation indoctrination of high-school teachers will get under way May 22, 1944, in Tennessee, Col. Herbert Fox, executive director of the Tennessee Bureau of Aeronautics, announced today.

Under an agreement entered into yesterday between the bureau of aeronautics and Austin Peay State College, 100 Tennessee high-school teachers qualifying for scholarships will be given basic aviation training which will aid them in teaching subjects related to aviation in the public schools of the State.

Twelve weeks of ground school instruction, coupled with 10 hours of dual-control flight instruction will be given under the direction of the college at Clarksville, and expenses of teachers holding scholarships will be defrayed by the bureau of aeronautics.

W. Percy McDonald, chairman of the bureau, in a statement accompanying the announcement of the agreement, said: "Flight indoctrination training of high-school teachers in the State is but the latest step in the program of the Tennessee Bureau of Aeronautics and Gov. Prentice Cooper to further aviation education in the schools and colleges of the State. The youth of Tennessee is air-minded, as shown by the fact that the Army and Navy have recruited more aviation cadets in Tennessee than in any other State in the Southeast.

"The application of such standard high-school subjects as mathematics, physics, and history of aviation is now being stressed in our schools. Governor Cooper and the bureau are convinced that teachers who have received ground school instruction and some actual flight training will be better able to teach such subjects to air-minded students.

"It is not our intention to make pilots of teachers who receive the instruction; but to qualify thm to speak with authority on aviation subjects. If the fight-indoctrination program meets with the success we anticipate, we hope to be able to extend our work to the colleges of the State in connection with our already extensive college-airport program."

Under the agreement just made public, the Bureau of Aeronautics will provide scholarships for the hundred teachers, with at least one teacher-student being selected from each county.

Applications for scholarships may be made by high-school teachers of good ability and good health who expect to continue to teach in the high schools of Tennessee. All applicants must be recommended in writing by the county superintendents of their counties; and the qualifications of applicants will be passed upon by the college, with the assistance of the State board of education, county superintendents, and high-school principals.

If any county fails to accept its scholarship allotment by May 10, 1943, the scholarship will be allotted to another county—preferably one with a large population.

Teachers receiving scholarships will be provided with room and board at the college, and will be furnished transportation to and from Outlaw Field at Clarksville during actual flight instruction.

The college, which has operated a war-training-service program for the Federal Government through 8 classes of naval cadets, will give the ground-school course covering 210 hours of classroom instruction. The subjects covered will be: Civil air regulations, navigation, aerology, recognition, code, engines and aircraft, values and problems of aviation, and seminar discussion of high-school problems.

Members of the college faculty who have had experience in instructing civilian pilots and Army and Navy cadets will be in charge of ground-school work.

Actual flight indoctrination training will be furnished by Knapp Flying Service, Clarksville, under direct contract with the college.

Flight indoctrination training will cover 10 hours in the air, and the 10 hours have been divided into three divisions.

Division one, which covers 5 hours, will include some 12 elementary flight maneuvers, ranging from familiarization with airplane and cockpit procedures through take-offs and landings.

Division two will include 2 hours' demonstration and practice of spins and stalls, recovery from poor landings, and primary emergency-landing procedures.

Division three will cover a 3-hour cross-country flight from Clarksville to Nashville to Smith's Grove, Kentucky to Clarksville. This flight, which will climax the flight training, will furnish an actual demonstration of navigation, flight plans, traffic control, weather report utilization, use of check points, etc. Scholarship students will actually participate in all phases of such a flight.

The Tennessee Bureau of Aeronautics has appropriated approximately $25,000 to defray the costs of the program.

Dangerous Curves

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED L. BULWINKLE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, many Members of the House know Mr. David L. Behncke, president of Air Line Pilots Association. Recently I received a copy of the magazine, Air Line Pilot, and I read Mr. Behncke's editorial which I think every Member of the House should read:

DANGEROUS CURVES

In post-war planning there are dangerous curves ahead. It makes little difference what kind of post-war planning it is, whether it be in air-line transportation, domestic or international, or in any other industry.

To begin with, the Jap-rats and the never-had-a-free-thought-of-their-own squareheads are not yet licked. We have all heard the time-worn adage about not counting one's chicks before they are hatched, and about the famous turtle and the hare race. It is up to those on the firing line to not play the part of the hare, and it is up to those at home to back them up by not letting up on their hatching. That's today's most vital concern.

In civil aviation post-war planning we hear much of one instrument air lines, free air international policy, and so forth, and there have been so many formal applications for the extension of existing routes and new routes filed with the Civil Aeronautics Board, which, if placed end to end, would quite likely cover a greater number of air-route miles than this country will ever be able to support.

Why are there dangerous curves ahead in post-war planning? Simply because no one can say just where we're headed. When on a strange road caution must be exercised or one may run up to a dangerous curve so abruptly that disaster can be the only result. Nowadays we hear much about the dangers of inflation, referring, of course, to monetary values. There are other kinds of inflation. The most dangerous of which is inflationary post-war thinking and planning. Overselling and overpromoting post-war air-line transportation is unwise and a dangerous inflationary trend. So much of this is going on that a certain amount of debunking is obviously necessary or we are bound to overrun the curves ahead.

Here are a few shining examples—statements sorely in need of debunking: "Our country will ride to a new unprecedented high wave of prosperity after the war because of the growth of air transportation." "Air-line transportation must be prepared to furnish employment to everyone who has had aviation training." "Air lines will be extended to every city, town, and hamlet in the country."

Now for a bit of debunking. Air-line growth will have some, but, unfortunately, a very limited effect on post-war economic and prosperity factors. Post-war air-line transportation will be able to furnish employment to many, but again, unfortunately, far from all of aviation's wartime trained personnel. When the men formerly in active air-line employment, now on active duty with the armed forces, return to their jobs from which they have been furloughed, the air-carrier industry employment possibilities will be greatly lessened. There will be air lines to all cities and communities that can reasonably support such service, and no more.

Summarizing, big talk is necessary to promote anything, but debunking is also vital to keep things on a sound and realistic footing. Bubbles are nice to look at, but they burst very easily.

To remember that there are dangerous curves ahead in all post-war planning is only being fair to labor, industry, and to our country. Most of it is bamboozling, and unless we want to be bamboozled we'd better keep the trusty old salt shaker handy and remember always that well-known grain of salt, and let's remember, too—first, last, and always—we still have a very rough and tough war on our hands, which is today a very long way from being won. Yes; and don't forget to buy that battle bond each month. It's still the best investment ever—an investment in the good old United States of America—and that isn't bamboozling.

DAVID L. BEHNCKE.

The Union Pacific Railroad

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Will P. Kennedy, from the Washington Star:

CAPITAL SIDELIGHTS

(By Will P. Kennedy)

The celebration next Wednesday of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the completion of the Union Pacific Railroad, uniting by rail the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, emphasizes how Congress has exercised its powers enumerated in the Constitution "to provide for the common defense and general welfare," "to establish post offices and post roads," "to promote the progress of science and useful arts." Congress passed statutes of July 1, 1862, and amended July 2, 1864, "to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes." Thus Congress, according to a report from the select committee of the House, incorporated the Union Pacific Railroad Co., thereby uniting the railroad systems of the Eastern States with the railroad system of California, strengthening the bonds of union between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and leading to development of the immense resources of the great central portion of the North American continent—creating a new route of commerce from the Atlantic and Europe to the Pacific and Asia. As a transportation and communication system during these emergency days of the present global war, this railroad and telegraph line authorized by Congress 82 years ago has done honor to the foresight of Congress. It has been a bond of steel uniting the Nation.

The famous golden spike joining the rails at Promontory Point, Utah, on May 10, 1869, was driven by Governor Stanford of California and Thomas C. Durant, vice president of the Union Pacific.

Three months after Congress had authorized that "railroad and telegraph line," another great pioneer service—the Pony Express—which had contributed an heroic and exciting chapter to American history ceased operation after its dauntless riders, the youngest of whom was a 14-year-old boy later known as Buffalo Bill Cody, had covered through Indian-infested territory 650,000 miles carrying 30,000 pieces of mail, with loss of only one pouch. The Pony Express quit when telegraph lines advancing from east and west were joined. The Union Pacific Co. took over the pony route from St. Joseph, Mo., through Forts Kearney, Laramie, and Bridger, Salt Lake City, Carson City to San Francisco (Sutter's Fort).

Simplification of Tax Returns

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the simplification of tax returns through the proposed legislation will mark a tremendous step forward in tax collection. By eliminating the need of some 30,000,000 wage earners to file returns, the annual headache inflicted upon the Nation by its financial doctors will give way to a very mild indisposition. When we take the next forward step by making all tax returns a simple statement without complicated mathematical computations, we shall have solved the problem of simplification. All that remains then will be the creation of some device whereby comparable ease in paying the bill may be attained.

Wagner-Murray-Dingell Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL CUNNINGHAM

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a resolution adopted by the Des Moines Association of Accident and Health Underwriters at a meeting on April 3, 1944:

Be it resolved by the Des Moines Association of Accident and Health Underwriters, assembled at Des Moines, Iowa, That we are unalterably opposed to the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill now pending before the United States Congress for the reasons that:

1. Said bill, or any other bill, providing universal unemployment compensation, old-age retirement pensions, accident and sickness disability benefits, together with hospital or medical care, would increase present individual Federal income and social security taxes more than 29 percent.

2. Said bill would regiment patients, hospitals and physicians, thereby destroying individual incentive and free competition with a resulting reduction in medical standards.

3. Said bill would create a gigantic Government monopoly readily available for patronage purposes, and susceptible to the political whims of the party in power.

4. Said bill would eventually destroy private accident and health insurance companies who, through free competition and free enterprise, have provided adequate and economical insurance protection since 1847. These same companies today provide sound and economical accident and health protection for nearly one-third of all citizens of the United States. It is inconceivable that an inexperienced Federal bureaucracy could provide accident and health protection upon any adequate or economical basis.

5. Said bill, if enacted, would surely prove that "the power to tax is the power to destroy."

Address by Senator Barkley at Thomas Jefferson Dinner, Hotel Commodore, New York City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a very learned and interesting address delivered by our majority leader, the distinguished senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], at the Democratic Jefferson Day dinner held last evening at the Hotel Commodore, in New York City.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Toastmaster, it is fortunate that in these tragic days of struggle and sacrifice we can meet in the name and under the continuing inspiration of Thomas Jefferson.

The struggle of which I speak is one that is being waged not only for the preservation of the human rights which Jefferson did so much to establish, but also the right to assemble as we are assembled here, to discuss and debate them.

No such right exists now anywhere in that part of the world controlled by our enemies; and no such right will exist here if our enemies should triumph in this war. We meet, therefore, with a background of a century and a half of political, economic, and social development for which Jefferson's philosophy prepared the way.

Faced as we are with the most stupendous and world-embracing battle to preserve a world in which the mind and soul of man may flourish and be free, poised for the impending stroke which may determine its length and final issue, we confront three problems, none of which can be separated from the others.

First, we must win this war so crushingly and overwhelmingly that no class or clique in any of the Axis nations may again delude their people with the claim that they had not been defeated.

Second, we must work for and help to secure a peace which will be just; a peace that may be durable because it is just.

Third, we must organize the world for peace, so that the peace which we shall earn and set up may be preserved by the united and cooperative activities of those who have brought the enemies of peace to their knees and ushered in some form of world order in which the arts of peace and the will for peace may flourish.

Regarding the first of these three tasks, there is no important or substantial disagreement among the American people.

And there is no substantial disagreement that in the 2½ years since Pearl Harbor the United States, as a Government and as a people, have gone farther and faster in getting ready to fight than any nation ever went in the whole history of nations.

That we were not wholly prepared for this war when the Japanese treachery of December 7, 1941, broke upon us there is no point in denying.

That we were as well prepared as we were is due to the foresight, the warnings, and the insistence of the Democratic Party and the Democratic administration presided over by President Franklin Roosevelt.

I do not like to become partisan in the midst of war, even at a Democratic gathering like this. But a few days ago I read a speech by a prominent candidate for a Presidential nomination on the other side of the political fence in which he claimed that our military and naval weakness were due to the negligence of the present administration.

It is necessary to refute this only by recalling that from 1921 to 1933—12 years—during which the Democratic Party was not in power, not a single battleship was laid down for construction in the American Navy.

It might be well for some of these ambitious Governors to do a little cramming on American history between now and next November.

But while we were not prepared for all-out war when war was forced upon us, the same can be said of every war in which we ever engaged, beginning with the Revolutionary War itself.

The same can be said of every democracy in the world, including those which lay all around Germany and could look over the back fence and see what was going on under Hitler.

Democracies are never prepared for war at the drop of a hat. If they were, they would not be democracies but would be the kind of autocracy against which we are fighting to protect ourselves and the world.

Under these circumstances we, as well as our friends among the United Nations, have been compelled to fight the enemy back and hold him off with one hand, while preparing with feverish intensity with the other to forge the instruments with which to drive him back and crush him utterly and fatally

In this process we have transformed our Nation from a peace to a war economy. We had done some things before we were drawn into the war. But in the war effort itself we have exceeded in many respects what we hoped to accomplish in the training and equipment of the largest Army and Navy that ever fought under a single banner, and the quality of this Army and Navy is in every way commensurate with their numbers.

Now, in the performance of this task, and in the incredible progress we have made toward victory, there has been no distinction of politics, religion, race, or color. Industry, labor, agriculture, and finance have put on the uniform and shouldered a gun, and turned out the instruments with which men must fight.

This program required organization and concentration of energy. It required the delegation of power to somebody who could use it. For democracies cannot fight against aggression with a sprawling, disjointed, heterogeneous outfit without form and void.

I presume that even our opponents, those who are most critical and most partisan, will concede that this organization, this concentration, this transformation, and the magnificent results which have flowed from them took place under the guidance of a Democratic administration, headed by a Democratic President, chosen for the task by the people in a free election.

Again let me say that I prefer not to speak in a partisan vein even at a partisan assembly. But I do not propose that those whose chief business at present is the fomentation of partisan hatred shall fill our backyard with political hand grenades, even though none of them explodes. I shall at least contend for the right to call attention to their presence and their intent.

Some of these things have made it necessary to put into effect restrictions and regulations which have been irksome and irritating. Politicians bent on office and disunity will undertake to magnify and capitalize these disarrangements. But the American people know what is involved in this war. They are not children. But even if they were, as some loquacious and mendacious persons seem to think, they would still know that the inconveniences and hardships being experienced by those of us who still live in comparative comfort are not to be mentioned in the same breath with those being endured by the fighting men and women who are honoring the name of America all over the world.

Through all these energies and these efforts, we shall win this war. We shall win it so completely, along with our friends of Great Britain, Russia, China, and other peoples who are fighting by our side, that the world will not be bothered by another debate as to who won the war.

We cannot afford to allow the controversies and disunity growing out of a Nation-wide election to retard by a single item or moment the momentum which we are gathering and shall soon display.

There are some among us who deplore the fact that in the midst of war we must undergo a campaign and an election.

I am not one of them. The people have a right to pass judgment on their Government in war as in peace. We welcome the people's judgment upon our record in peace and war alike. We entertain no fears upon that score.

The only thing we ask is that the American people search and assess that record for themselves without prejudice, without malice, without heat, but will all the light they need to enable them to see, keeping in their memories the conditions we inherited, what we have done to alleviate those conditions, and keeping in mind our present task and its final and glorious consummation.

When the war shall end, our task will not be over. In some respects it will have just begun.

We shall reconvert our war economy back to a peace economy. We shall retransform our factories, our farms, our financial institutions, our manpower, back to the pursuits of peace.

We shall undertake to do this with speed and care.

We are already beginning this process so far as possible without impeding the war effort.

We shall bring back to their homes and families eleven or twelve million men and women. We shall be confronted with the duty of seeing that these men and women obtain work at fair wages. We shall see to it that they are reintegrated into the social and economic life from which they departed to serve their country. We must make sure that they do not return to an economic situation which requires them to sell apples and lead pencils on the streets in order to eat and sleep and support their families in a land that they have saved.

This great cause cannot be served by a resort to political heroics. It cannot be solved by appeals to ignorance or prejudice.

The kind of life to which our Nation and the world will return will be determined by the degree of cooperation, tolerance, patience, and understanding that may be brought about between Government and business, agriculture, finance, labor, and all other elements of our wonderful people.

None of these can do the job alone. All of them, working together with the same unity and determination which has characterized the war effort, can and will accomplish it.

Along with these national and economic readjustments, the peace itself poses a question of major consideration. Indeed, the kind of peace which will follow this war may determine not only the real outcome and effectiveness of this war, but whether another is to follow soon upon its heels.

Already the groundwork is being laid in a most nonpartisan atmosphere, for our return to economic stability and for our return to peace.

In both Houses of the Congress men of all political parties are serving upon committees to look in advance at the post-war probabilities, and be prepared to meet them. We have made much progress in preparing for peace.

In the international field, conferences have been and are being constantly held, that much of the underbrush in the thickets and jungles and forests of international relationships may be cleared away.

In this undertaking the heads of our Government are utilizing the ability, experience, and patriotism of men of all political persuasions.

Under our Constitition our President is charged with the conduct of our foreign relations. This is true no matter who is President or to what party he belongs

President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Cordell Hull have worked together in not only conducting our relations with other nations but in the formation of the consistent policy of our Government.

Sometimes they have conferred separately with the representatives of other governments, as at Moscow, Quebec, Casablanca, Teheran, and in the Atlantic, as well as in London and Washington.

To say that they have worked at cross purposes, or that their right hands are ignorant of what their left hands are doing, is a preposterous and fantastic misrepresentation

It was disappointing, and somewhat disillusioning, to hear such a claim come from one who became dry behind the ears on any kind of foreign policy after he had perceptibly slowed down his own synthetic flight from a Presidential nomination.

Out of this war must come a peace that is just and honorable, a peace to which all fair-minded men and men of good will can subscribe.

In order that such a peace may be ordained, the economic problems of impoverished and overrun nations cannot be ignored. Chaos and disorder cannot be the breeding ground of a durable peace. Hunger, starvation, and disease cannot constitute the fertilizer for a healthy growth of peaceful restoration.

It will not be necessary to set up an international W. P. A. as some prominent political candidates now pretend to fear. Nor is it necessary for our own salvation, nor will it shorten the war or hasten the peace, nor make a better peace, for such candidates to seek to destroy the confidence of our people in our allies for some local and temporary purpose.

When peace comes it must come as the result of confidence among the peoples who must win this war.

No blueprint of a peace treaty can now be exhibited. But we are looking and preparing for the day when the peoples of the earth may throw from their backs the burdens of war, stand erect again, and demand that all peoples and all nations that now assert their desire and intention to pursue the arts of peace shall do so in good faith.

When that peace shall come, it must be preserved.

Whether any discussed or projected organization to preserve world peace shall be launched before any treaty of peace is concluded, or shall become a part of it, or shall come afterwards and separately, is a question of details and mechanics. Many nations will have to be consulted and will have to agree.

But the substance is what will count ultimately in determining the value of any organized effort to preserve world peace.

We have learned now that when storm clouds gather over the world, threatening our own and the security of all peace-loving nations, we cannot rush into a storm cellar thinking that when the storm subsides and passes we may emerge to find our homes and institutions and our traditions untouched.

There is no such thing as individual freedom from flames when the world is on fire. We know that now, and only folly could dictate that we seek to shirk our share of responsibility for the peace of mankind.

I do not wish to disinter the bones of the Versailles Treaty or the League of Nations.

But a coy, demure, unannounced, but palpitating candidate for President a few days ago startled the world by revealing that the defects of the Treaty of Versailles grew out of the fact it was written by a group of tired old men who had enough life left in them to win a war but were too feeble to write a treaty of peace.

The petty implications in this observation are too obvious to need photographic exhibition or blueprint delineation.

That the Treaty of Versailles had defects no one will deny. So have all treaties contained defects, and many of them contained the seeds of future wars.

The Treaty of Versailles failed not because it was written by tired old men who had won a war, but it failed because a group of men, some of them malicious, some of them old, and some of them young, destroyed it before it had a fair chance to work or to have its defects cured.

In our own country it became the football of partisan politics and as a result we got nothing but a separate peace with Germany.

It does not serve our present generation, nor compensate for the enormous sacrifice which we are suffering in this war to reflect either upon those who wrote that treaty or those who opposed it. Our task now is to avoid such mistakes as were then made, if we can detect them.

It is our duty to protect future generations from the necessity of going through another slaughterhouse in order to preserve a decent civilization, elevate the ideals of the world in general, develop the resources with which God has endowed the earth, give remunerative labor to all who are able and desire to work, provide an opportunity for profitable investment by those who are able and willing to invest, lay the groundwork for a higher and more universal education, and cultivate the moral and spiritual values which exalt a nation in its own eyes and in the eyes of the world.

In behalf of such a concept of life the Democratic Party has fought for 150 years. In behalf of such a concept it calls now for the earnest and devoted aid and cooperation of men and women of all ages, religions, colors, conditions, and political persuasions.

A few local or temporary political victories or defeats may inflate or depress minds which look upon them as the supreme object of all life.

But—

"Truth crushed to earth
Shall rise again.
The eternal years of
God are hers.
But error, wounded,
Writhes in pain
And dies amid its worshippers."

The Arabian Pipe Line—A Proposed Venture Into Imperialism

REMARKS

OF

HON. LEON H. GAVIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to discuss briefly and plainly a subject which has commanded a considerable amount of publicity in recent weeks. That is the proposed pipe line across Saudi Arabia to some point on the Mediterranean Sea.

The project was announced early in February by Secretary Ickes, president of the Petroleum Reserves Corporation, which Corporation was chartered nearly a year ago by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It is, therefore, a Government-owned corporation and the money it proposes to spend on a pipe line would be taxpayers' money. The announced estimate of what the line would cost was one hundred and thirty-five to one hundred and sixty million dollars—a considerable leeway in cost and perhaps indicating that those who planned the line were not very definite on what they were setting out to do.

The Petroleum Reserves Corporation was chartered under authority in an act of Congress which was designed to enable Government to procure critical materials and metals for the war program. It is the opinion of many, including myself, that the authority in that act was stretched beyond recognition in forming this petroleum corporation. The act meant, for instance, to form a company to buy rubber—but not rubber plantations; tin, but not tin mines. The charter of the Petroleum Reserves Corporation authorizes it to do anything its directors choose to do in producing, refining, transporting and marketing petroleum and products in foreign companies. It was given unlimited borrowing power and, of course, freedom from taxation.

The officers chose to engage first in transportation of foreign oil. Crude oil is of no use to anyone without being refined, the pipe line would be followed by a refinery. One of the directors of the corporation said that would be the case. The cost of such plant would be many millions more; it would have to be a very large refinery, for the proposed pipe line would have a daily carrying capacity of some 300,000 barrels a day. With all the facilities that would be needed for this venture, it is easy to foresee the American taxpayers being tapped for a half billion dollars at least.

What is the purpose of this strange excursion into a country which one authority and historian has said is the cross road of all wars? Let me first tell you some of the things that it will not do, regardless of what its sponsors say.

It will not provide any oil for the conduct of this war. At first no such contention was made, but lately that reason was used. Mr. Ickes said in one of his public utterances that it would enable us to make good on the obligations which we would have to assume in the post-war world. This, it seems to me, was a case of creating a chicken before there was an egg to hatch it from. We would build a pipe line and then wait for some obligations to appear.

It would not help in this war, for it is estimated that 2 years would be needed to get the pipe line laid and in operation, even if started now. It cannot be gotten under way at once, first, because nobody has more than a hazy idea of how to do the job—it would go across a country that has no roads, no railroads, no bases for operation; all these facilities would have to be built. All the surveying and mapping is yet to be done. Next, there is no steel available now. It is needed for other purposes. It is needed, among other things, to drill wells in this country and try to keep that gasoline ration of yours from shrinking further. Further, we have a manpower shortage and there are no men available to send to Arabia and if anyone suggests that as much as one soldier be put on this job, I promise you I will raise as much disturbance as the alligator did when the creek went dry. Soldiers were used on that useless Canadian oil venture, the Canol project, before any of us knew it was going on, but it will not be allowed to happen again. The boys did not go into the Army to work on any Arabian W. P. A. job.

It has been suggested that the line would safeguard an oil supply for the next war. I don't know that we are supposed to be using our energies now to prepare for another war; let us finish this one first. In the event of another war, we would have to defend this 1,200-mile pipe line and the refinery to make it of any use to us and we would be tied to that part of the world with a huge Army and Navy.

The proposed line would open up no oil not already available. The oil fields in Arabia which it would serve are owned by two American companies. Another American company has a half-interest in the Kuwait concessions. All the oil from these two countries can be moved to the Persian Gulf through short pipe lines and transported by tankers to any point in the world. As much of it can now be moved by tankers as there is demand for—right away, not 2 years later. After the war ends the large tanker fleet that has been built to carry oil to the fighting zones will be available. The pipe line would render idle many of these tankers and it would duplicate an expense already incurred.

There has been a sly attempt to make it appear that somehow this line would get back some of the oil supplied to the British. There has been criticism that we have depleted our resources more than they have theirs. There is no truth in any statement that we would be helping save our reserves at British expense. All of the Arabian concession is held by two American companies and the British have no part in it. A British company owns half of the Kuwait concession, but that is the minor part of reserve which would be served by the pipe line. So it is already American-owned oil. Further, let us remember this, not one joint of pipe could be laid without the consent of the British. The Middle East is their sphere of influence, not ours. Do not think for a minute that, if the project goes through, it will hurt any British feelings.

I used the word "imperialism" in the title of this speech. That is what I think it is. Imperialism is a policy of extending the domain or control of a nation. It is the kind of policy this Nation has always avoided. Uncle Sam has never attempted to gain sovereignty over other nations. I don't think you want to see him dress up in a turban now.

Let me indicate quickly how determined some of our planners have been to horn into the Middle East, with all of its feuds and its hatreds. Is our Government being directly and strategically drawn under the pretext of oil and a pipe line into a maelstrom of continental politics? At the outset, they attempted to buy in the name of the Government and with taxpayers' money, the properties of the companies in Arabia. Mind you, this was not submitted to Congress—it never has been to this day. Congress, I believe, is supposed to appropriate money and to have some say in what is spent—at least, the Constitution says that is the case. The Senate's consent to treaties is required and treaties with the King of Arabia and the Sheik of Kuwait, which, in the latter instance, really means Great Britain, would be necessary to get the rights-of-way for a pipe line. No, Congress was not asked whether it might agree to this "Arabian Nights" adventure or not.

But the companies who own the oil refused to sell all or a part of their interest, so the planners next proposed a pipe line.

It is a venture that would commit us to the maintenance of a large Army and the establishment of naval bases in the Mediterranean. That could not be avoided. Do we want that? Do you want your boy stationed in the Middle East to preserve the peace there and protect a pipe line which is not needed, now or in the future? Remember—if trouble breaks out anywhere on Great Britain's lifeline between Gibraltar and Singapore or between any of the nations of the Mediterranean Basin or Indian Ocean, if we have military establishments there, which we must have, to protect Government-owned property, we shall become sooner or later involved. What is at stake in present Saudi Arabia controversy is: Shall our Government back our private oil operators there so long as they are fair and honest in their overseas dealings or shall Government itself take over, backing its acquired properties with American bayonets, battleships, in event countries in that area get caught between two great powers at war?

The oil of Arabia can be developed by private capital. It has been to date. All we need is a diplomatic policy with a backbone in it, conducted on a basis of realism and not beautiful rhetoric. The concessions which American companies hold in that country were obtained while Bainbridge Colby was Secretary of State. There was some common sense trading with the British—mutual recognition of rights there and in other parts of the world—and it cost not 1 cent of the taxpayer's money and not a soldier was sent to intimidate anyone.

One of the spokesmen for this pipeline project recently made a speech about it and he called his oration Oil for Alladin's lamp. I remember that story. When Alladin rubbed his lamp, a couple of oversized gremlins popped up to carry out his wishes.

But they had great capacity for evil, as well as good. I see more evil than good in this. Yes, it will provide oil for another war, or perhaps a series of them—wars which will be caused by our pushing into a place where we are on ground that is new to us and where we will be dealing with people we do not understand.

Our people have not been asked whether they want this scheme. It is the product of a few minds. They are willing to be reckless with your money, with the established policy of nonimperialism and with the futures of you and your sons.

The effort of Congress now under way to stop this headlong rush into turmoil and more debt and higher taxes should have the support of every American citizen.

Home Owners' Loan Corporation

REMARKS

OF

HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the proposal which I have long advanced for the liquidation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in the belief that the accounts now carried by the Corporation are readily marketable, let me call attention to a release dated May 8, 1944, by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, in which it announces that all of the 266 outstanding mortgages in the Territory of Hawaii have been sold to private finance and thrift institutions for cash plus a premium. This action implements the contention I have long made that the H. O. L. C. can sell its accounts and retire from the financing field at a reasonably early date.

To set out the whole case, I am enclosing herein a copy of the release and also a copy of a letter addressed to me by Commissioner John H. Fahey, of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, dated May 6, 1944:

NATIONAL HOUSING AGENCY,
FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., May 6, 1944.

Hon. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DIRKSEN: At the supplemental hearing before the Subcommittee on Appropriations on February 4 last you will recall that you asked me for certain information concerning proposals to take over H. O. L. C. loans in the District of Columbia and the Hawaiian Islands (see pp. 23 and 24 of the hearing). I supplied the facts requested (pp. 24–29, inclusive, of the hearing).

As I explained, all the efforts in the Hawaiian Islands were those of individuals and single institutions wishing to acquire the loans which would have given them attractive profits but which would have had a decided disadvantage and risk of loss to the Government. One plan, you will remember, involved an advance by the Federal Home Loan Bank of Los Angeles of one-half of the money which would be necessary to purchase the loans and an equal amount was to be represented by shares in the institution bought by H. O. L. C. with a final maturity of 10 years or more. As you doubtless know, 71 percent of the stock of the Los Angeles Federal Home Loan Bank is owned by the Government. In the case of the exchange of good loans for shares there was, of course, no assurance that the H. O. L. C. would get its money back even in a decade and if the institution was not successful in handling the loans and became impaired, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation would have to make good that impairment. Another proposal also was based upon an advance of a large part of the money necessary from the Federal Home Loan Bank of Los Angeles at not more than 2½ percent interest. In these cases the institutions interested wished to make exclusive trades eliminating opportunities for other institutions to join in making a proposal. As I explained, these proposals were not given serious consideration by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

From 1938 on various schemes of similar character were suggested consistent with the demands that were being made by some mortgage-lending interests that H. O. L. C. should turn its loans over to them as fast as they were made good, irrespective of the losses which might thereby be imposed upon the Government.

In view of the inquiry you made and the statements I supplied for the record, you will, I know, be interested to learn that we have just sold all of our remaining loans in the Hawaiian Islands for cash with a premium payment of 1 percent. We did not go to the expense of preparing lists of loans, information concerning the credit records of borrowers, appraisals or title information, and no bidding plan was followed. The institutions had been advised that when as a group they were prepared to take and pay cash for all of the loans at our regional office in San Francisco without any further responsibility on our part or any guaranties by us, we would consider the proposal. We also provided that borrowers would have to have the same terms they have thus far enjoyed. The Hawaiian associations finally accepted, signed an offer of purchase prepared by us, and accompanied by a forfeit of 10 percent of the purchase price. We have now finished the transfer of the mortgages and the associations assumed the responsibility of distributing them equitably among themselves.

I enclose a statement relative to the transfer which we have released for publication Monday.

I should explain that we have had in the Hawaiian Islands a situation entirely different from that which prevails on the mainland. The islands are so far distant from San Francisco, our regional office on the coast, that we could not service the island loans by mail or bill borrowers direct and maintain the accounts in San Francisco. It has been necessary for us to continuously maintain an office in Honolulu and handle all accounting, collections, and other work there without the savings and efficiency of machine operation such as that used in San Francisco in dealing with over 65,000 accounts. In Honolulu we also have to pay the salary allowance of 25 percent more than regular civil-service rates fixed for employees outside the United States.

You will note from the press release enclosed that the island loans transferred had been paid down to one-quarter of the amount we originally owned. They are now in such shape, the borrowers have developed such equities that they represent no risk to either the mortgagors or the institutions. We could transfer them with no disadvantage or loss of any kind to the Government. The interest income which we have collected on these loans up to the time of transfer has paid all the costs of operation in the islands including overhead and also the cost of interest on bonds outstanding equal to the full amount of the money advanced on the Hawaiian mortgages. The Government has, therefore, gotten back every cent it put into the loans in the islands.

As I have stated, we have not only been relieved of all future responsibility but in effecting this transaction we did not provide advance loan records, comprehensive information on each loan, which it is contended we should compile and make available to mortgage lenders throughout the country.

What it has been possible to work out in this transaction in the Hawaiian Islands would not be practicable in a separate State, city, or county, or part of a State, since our operations here at home are conducted on an area basis. They are centered in a few regional offices where a 100 percent machine operation is possible in servicing, billing, and collecting which is not restricted by State, city, or county lines and which makes handling costs very low.

Because of your special inquiry about the Hawaiian situation, I am sure you will be interested to learn of this development.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN H. FAHEY,
Commissioner.

WASHINGTON, May 7.—All the mortgages of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in the Hawaiian Islands have been sold to savings and loan associations there, it was announced by John H. Fahey, Commissioner of the Federal Home Loan Bank Administration.

"In view of the difficulty of servicing a small number of loans and maintaining a small accounting office more than 2,400 miles distant from our nearest regional office in San Francisco, the Corporation has sold to 7 savings and loan associations, operating in the islands, all of the 266 mortgages which we had outstanding in Hawaii," said Mr. Fahey. "The purchasers are paying in cash the full unpaid balance of principal and interest on these mortgages, plus a premium, without the necessity of reappraisals or the assumption of any other responsibility or expense by the Corporation.

"The sale of the Hawaiian loans has no relation to the demands of some mortgage interests that they be permitted to buy all the H. O. L. C. loans in the country, by counties and States—at par for some mortgages and at large discounts for others. That scheme would result in heavy losses to the Government and no compensating advantages.

"Within the United States proper, H. O. L. C. loan accounts are managed by regions at low cost and are within easy access and under direct supervision. Such conditions are entirely different from those met in dealing with loans at great distances in the Pacific islands, even though the loans in Hawaii have been reduced by collections to less than a fourth of the money originally loaned and now represent no risk to the mortgage holder.

"The institutions purchasing the loans in Hawaii have agreed that all rights reserved to the borrowers under the Home Owners' Loan Corporation mortgage agreements shall be preserved and continue in full force and effect. It is also agreed that no borrower shall be required to pay an interest rate in excess of 4½ percent, the rate which now obtains on these mortgages.

"During its lending period which expired in 1936, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation received 1,649 applications for loans in the Hawaiian Islands, representing a total of $5,828,159 in mortgages. It made 481 loans which, with necessary later advances, amounted to $1,296,349. These loans have now been reduced in number to 266, with a total indebtedness of less than $300,000. No foreclosures by the Corporation have ever been necessary in the islands and the Corporation owns no properties there. All of the loans now transferred have been reduced to such a point that the borrowers are in no danger of losing their homes, and the institutions were justified in paying a premium for their acquisition."

The purchasers of the Hawaiian mortgages are the First Federal Savings & Loan Association of Hawaii; Honolulu Building & Loan Co., Ltd.; International Building & Loan Association, Ltd.; Pioneer Savings & Loan Association; Territorial Building & Loan Association, Ltd.; American Savings & Loan Association; and the State Savings & Loan Association.

What's the Matter With the New Deal?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER THOMAS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask permission to proceed for 1 minute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, in the near future we shall hear very much about the so-called New Deal, and very much about bureaus, bureaucrats, and bureaucracy. I ask permission to have printed as a part of my remarks a statement on the question, What's the matter with the New Deal?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The New Deal will be an important issue in the pending campaign.

With respect to this issue the people are entitled to know the facts.

What is the New Deal?

To answer the question, we must first define the term.

To have a new deal, we must have had an old deal; hence, an added question arises—

What was the old deal?

The old deal is alleged to have brought on the depression.

All remember the depression.

All remember the unemployment, causing millions of men to tramp the streets and highways, begging for work.

All remember the vast surpluses of goods and commodities and consequently the low prices, yet the people could not buy because of a lack of money and buying power.

All remember the bankruptcies and business failures leading to still further widespread unemployment.

All remember the soup lines and the demand for governmental aid.

All remember the looting of stores and the rebellion against foreclosures.

The people have not forgotten the bank holiday leading to the closing of all the banks.

With all banks closed; with millions of men and women unemployed, ragged, and hungry; with soup lines in cities and towns; with stores and stocks being looted and with widespread rebellion against foreclosures something had to be done.

The old deal had cost and was costing the people more money than had been lost in all the wars in which we had been engaged.

It was obvious that the people could not protect themselves.

Cities, counties, and the States could neither check nor relieve the misery, suffering, and damage being caused by the depression which broke upon the people in October of 1929.

Conditions finally became so bad that it was not a question that something should be done, but rather that something must be done and done at once.

THE NEW DEAL

A remedy in the form of a program was developed and placed in operation.

What was the remedy proposed?

The New Deal did not bring about the depression for in 1932 the depression was already here.

The New Deal was the remedy proposed to cure the ills of the old deal.

Inasmuch as practically all the people were in distress, practically all had to be helped.

Two classes of relief were provided: First, temporary relief to tide the people through and, second, policies intended to be permanent were provided to prevent a recurrence of the terrible times the people were experiencing.

The temporary relief was provided by such agencies as the Works Progress Administrations (W. P. A.); the National Youth Administration (N. Y. A.); the Civilian Conservation Corps (C. C. C.); the Home Owners' Loan Corporation (H. O. L. C.); and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration (A. A. A.).

Early in the depression the Congress declared that a national emergency existed; an emergency productive of widespread unemployment; disorganizing industry; burdening interstate and foreign commerce; affecting the public welfare, and undermining the standard of living of the American people.

Pursuant to such declaration the National Recovery Act was passed.

Under this law fair competition was established; codes were agreed to; the oil industry was stabilized; relief for the agricultural industry was made available; and a program for public highway, public building and publicly owned instrumentalities and facilities; soil conservation; river and harbor improvement and flood control was undertaken.

The evidence of the success of this program may be seen at any point throughout the United States.

As the ills of the "old deal" were cured the depression abated and by 1939 prices of farm commodities were better, unemployment was relieved and the country was enjoying a degree of prosperity again.

Just as fast as these temporary agencies and policies had served their missions they were liquidated so that now they are matters of record only.

What were some of the permanent policies provided by the Congress to prevent a recurrence of a damaging depression?

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION (R. F. C.)

The first New Deal law passed by the Congress was the act creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

This law was passed to make Federal credit available for financial institutions, agriculture, commerce, and industry.

Later, the law was broadened to relieve destitution and to create employment by providing for a public-works program.

Still later, the law was amended to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting.

Funds were appropriated, loans were made, and the distress was relieved.

Question: What might have happened to our banks, trust companies, railroads, insurance companies, factories, farmers, the unemployed, and all who serve these groups, had not this law been passed?

So successful has been the operation of this law that we still have the R. F. C. serving not only our domestic economy but, in addition, it is promoting our war effort by financing a substantial part of our defense plants and factories.

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION (F. D. I. C.)

Another New Deal policy was the guaranty of bank deposits.

During the era of the old deal, bank and trust company failures were common occurrences.

At the end of the last war we had over 30,000 banks and when a failure occurred the depositors, as well as the stockholders, stood to lose their life's savings.

The old deal witnessed the permanent closing of over one-half our banks, causing hundreds of millions of dollars of loss to stockholders and depositors.

One of the most important New Deal policies was established by the creation of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Under this policy banks are not failing now but instead they are the safest, soundest, and the most prosperous in history.

The guaranty of bank deposits is a New Deal policy and, unless repealed, is here to stay.

SECURITIES EXCHANGE COMMISSION (S. E. C.)

For generations corporations and exchanges had been issuing and selling stocks and bonds in such amounts as the public would buy, all without legal rules or regulations and without any Federal supervision whatever.

Many people are convinced that the great 1929 depression was brought about by the speculation in worthless or near worthless stocks, bonds, and securities.

The Securities Exchange Commission is another New Deal policy created to regulate and supervise the issuance of stocks and bonds and therefore to regulate the several securities exchanges and the over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails.

The purpose of the act was to insure the maintenance of fair and honest markets in stock, bond, and security transactions.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION (R. E. A.)

This law provides Federal aid to farmers in securing electricity; such aid being in the form of studies, investigations, reports, and loans to cooperatives for the purpose of financing the construction and operation of lines to furnish electric energy to farms and persons in rural areas.

Under this New Deal policy transmission lines have been constructed in all parts of the country and, unless repealed, this program will become a permanent institution in all the States of the Nation.

Hence, the R. E. A. is another New Deal activity and those who are against the New Deal must favor the abolition of this program.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT (S. S. A.)

In order to provide for the general welfare of our senior citizens, for maternal and child-health services, for crippled children, and for blind persons, the Congress enacted the Social Security Act and has provided funds to be used in cooperation with the States in maintaining and developing the program.

The old deal program permitted crippled children and the blind to get along as best they could.

For our senior citizens who pioneered and developed the United States, the old deal provided only the poor house.

Today such institutions are practically nonexistent and will never been seen again unless the New Deal program is repealed.

SOIL CONSERVATION SERVICE (S. C. S.)

This program was provided to prevent soil erosion and to protect and improve the food- and feed-producing lands of our country.

All know that we are dependent upon the soil for the production of our food. All know that for many years soil erosion has been destroying many millions of acres of our farm land.

In 1935 the New Deal set up a Nation-wide soil conservation service for the purpose of saving the fertility of our soil.

Already, with the guidance of this service, soil-conservation districts have been organized all over the Nation by the farmers and landowners.

If this New Deal soil-conservation program is not abolished, it will stop erosion and depletion, conserve the soil, restore our forests, reduce dust storms and control, if not prevent, floods.

If the so-called New Deal becomes the paramount issue in the November election, and if the anti-New Deal party wins, then the Congress will have a direct and positive mandate to repeal all the laws passed and the policies inaugurated during the past 12 years for the benefit and protection of the masses of the people.

It must be admitted that a vote against the so-called New Deal is a vote against such policies as the old-age pension system, aid to crippled children, and aid to the blind.

Such a vote will be construed as being against the Federal supervision of the issuance of stocks, bonds, and securities, and, in addition, such a vote will be construed as being against the continuance of the rural electrification program, against the guarantee of bank deposits, against the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, against the Federal Communications Commission, against the Civil Aeronautics Board, and against the entire Farm Security Administration including the Soil Conservation Service.

The Government has relinquished all control over the planting of crops, but such benefits as soil conservation, loans on farm commodities, and the broad program of farm loans generally will be retained unless the whole so-called New Deal is scrapped.

SECOND WORLD WAR

In 1939, at the identical time when the people were working out of the depression, the Second World War broke upon the world, and then on December 7, 1941, our country was attacked at Pearl Harbor.

Since that fateful day we have been compelled to live under a strict war economy rather than under the program provided for a peace-loving people residing in a peaceful Nation.

In order to meet the concentrated power of our enemies we have had to concentrate our economic and military power in the hands of our Commander in Chief, the heads of the Army, Navy, and Air Corps and the departments charged with the responsibility for clothing, feeding, and equipping our armed forces as well as our people here at home.

In order to mobilize and concentrate our power we have had to do things that we would not even consider in times of peace.

Since the war started, conditions have been and are abnormal, and our people should realize that the things being done are war necessities and such rules, regulations, and policies will cease as soon as the war is over.

At that time our major task will be to promptly liquidate the war agencies, thereby permitting the people to return to normal conditions as quickly as possible.

BUREAUS, BUREAUCRATS, AND BUREAUCRACY

During the coming campaign we shall hear much about bureaus, bureaucrats, and bureaucracy; hence, an explanation is in order.

A bureau is a department of the Government such as the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which prints all our paper money and all the various forms of stamps and bonds.

Then we have, among others, the Bureau of Internal Revenue, which collects the taxes; the Bureau of Standards; the Bureau of the Budget; the Bureau of Census; the Bureau of Pensions; the Weather Bureau; the Bureau of Education; the Bureau of Mines; the Bureau of the Mint; the Bureau of Prisons; the Bureau of Reclamation; the Bureau of Animal Industry; and the Federal Bureau of Investigation. This Bureau was created to investigate and suppress crime.

Likewise, the special agencies created to help the people work out of the depression and to help win the war are additional bureaus of the Government.

The War Production Board, the Office of Price Administration, the Office of Censorship, the Selective Service System, the War Food Administration, the War Shipping Board, the War Manpower Commission, and the Veterans' Administration are all bureaus of the Government.

The officials managing these departments, boards, and commissions are sometimes called bureaucrats, and the services provided are by some called a bureaucratic form of government.

If we are to have these services, we must have the bureaus, and to have the bureaus we must have men and women to supervise and perform the work.

Who is there among us who would abolish the tax collector?

Who would abolish the takers of the census; the forecasters of the weather, or the inspectors of our mines?

Who would abolish the coiners and printers of our money; the writers of our pension checks; the teachers of our schools, or the investigators and detectors of crime?

Those who oppose the New Deal deny that they want to go back to the old deal.

Instead, they say that they favor a better deal.

Those who support and defend the New Deal as herein defined say to those who oppose that at any time they suggest and bring forth a better deal the Democratic Party will support their proposal.

Digest of Legislation Enacted by the Seventy-eighth Congress, First Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a digest of the legislation enacted by the Seventy-eighth Congress in its first session beginning January 6, 1943, and ending December 21, 1943.

There being no objection, the digest was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DIGEST OF LEGISLATION, SEVENTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION, JANUARY 6, 1943–DECEMBER 21, 1943

AGRICULTURE

Commodity Credit Corporation

(Approved July 16, 1943, Public Law 151, 78th Cong.)

The Commodity Credit Corporation is primarily a lending institution established for the purpose of financing the carrying and orderly marketing of agriculture products. The corporation was created by order of the President, October 16, 1933, and has continued to function by authority of various acts of Congress.

This legislation authorized the corporation to continue its function and duties until December 31, 1943.

(Approved Dec. 23, 1943, Public Law 219, 78th Cong.)

Continued the Commodity Credit Corporation as an agency of the United States until February 17, 1944. The Commodity Credit Corporation was subsequently extended to June 30, 1945 by Public Law 240, Seventy-eighth Congress, second session, approved February 28, 1944.

Farm labor

(Approved Apr. 29, 1943, Public Law 45, 78th Cong.)

Appropriation of $26,100,000 was made by Congress to remain available until December 31, 1943, for the recruiting, placement, transportation, subsistence, and health of adequate farm labor for the production and harvesting of agriculture commodities essential to the prosecution of the war. Thus the farm manpower shortage in specific areas was largely alleviated by introducing workers from areas having a reserve.

Feed for livestock and poultry

(Approved Dec. 22, 1943, Public Law 211, 78th Cong.)

This act permitted the importation from foreign countries, free of duty, during a period of 90 days, of certain grains and other products to be used for livestock and poultry feed. Domestic supplies were temporarily inadequate to meet the demands of increased production for war. This act suspended for 2 months the increase in the Social Security employment tax under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act, continuing the old rate of 1 percent until Congress should have sufficient time to examine the proposal to revise the 2-percent increase called for in the law.

CIVIL SERVICE

Overtime pay

(Approved May 7, 1943, Public Law 49, 78th Cong.)

Overtime compensation was provided in this act for Government employees. In line with the increase of hours and heavier duties necessitated by the war, increases in pay were provided throughout the Government service on a part with similar increases in private industry.

HIGHWAYS AND ROADS

Federal aid for highway construction

(Approved July 13, 1943, Public Law 146, 78th Cong.)

This act provided for the continuation of the availability of Federal funds appropriated for use of the States in building highways and roads; time for its use was extended for 1 year after the termination of the war. Shortage of manpower and materials prevents the States in many instances from using these funds during the war so that a backlog of construction and repair work has been created which will provide work for war veterans and unemployed former war workers after the war is terminated. This act also authorizes a survey and report on the need for express highways.

On January 12, 1944, the President submitted the report of the National Interregional Highway Committee to Congress (H. Doc. 379, 78th Cong.). This report outlines a broad program of national-highway construction for the post-war era.

HOUSING

National defense housing

(Approved Mar. 23, 1943, Public Law 15, 78th Cong.)

By increasing authorization for defense housing from $800,000,000 to $1,200,000,000 provision was made for decent housing to take care of war workers in congested areas and in new industrial areas where adequate housing did not exist before.

(Approved July 7, 1943, Public Law 119, 78th Cong.)

Authorized an additional $300,000,000 for defense housing as necessitated by expanding war production accompanied by increased employment and greater concentration of manpower in industrial areas.

(Approved July 15, 1943, Public Law 150, 78th Cong.)

Congress increased the appropriation for community facilities in defense-housing areas by $200,000,000. This appropriation, providing for better recreational facilities in defense housing areas, aided in bringing about more stable morale conditions in these areas and thus more efficient and effective war production.

IMMIGRATION

Chinese

(Approved Dec. 17, 1943, Public Law 199, 78th Cong.)

Congress passed the act repealing the Chinese Exclusion Acts and granting a preference up to 75 percent of the Chinese quota, with certain limitations, to Chinese born and resident in China. The right of naturalization was extended to Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent. This act was passed in full recognition of the friendship and mutuality of aspirations of the two nations on a basis of racial respect and understanding.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

President and Vice President of the Philippines

(Approved Nov. 12, 1943, Public Law 186, 78th Cong.)

This act continues in office the President and Vice President of the Philippines until the normal functions of government can be restored in the Philippine Islands.

The Japanese-sponsored puppet regime is thus served notice that its acts are under scrutiny and that collaboration with Japan will bring no permanent political advantage in the light of inevitable victory by the United Nations. Thus, the loyal population of the Philippines has been strengthened and fortified against the immediate future until the day of final deliverance from the enemy.

PUBLIC LANDS

Columbia Basin Project

(Approved Mar. 10, 1943, Public Law 8, 78th Cong.)

This act provided authority to prevent speculation in lands of the Columbia Basin project. It permits an agreement between the State of Washington and the Bureau of Reclamation to organize and further develop the Grand Coulee Dam project. This legislation alse provides safeguards for the investment of the Federal Government and the investments of the settlers in the Columbia Basin from the speculative real-estate practices of private operators.

RECIPROCAL TRADE

Foreign trade agreements

(Approved June 7, 1943, Public Law 66, 78th Cong.)

The President in this act is authorized to enter into foreign-trade agreements, for a further period of 2 years, until June 12, 1945, and to suspend such agreements when discriminatory treatment of American commerce results from the operations of international cartels. This policy of mitigating excessive international trade restrictions by methods of direct international collaboration in setting up bilateral agreements had been extended to 31 nations since 1934. Approval of this program has been of specific value to United States shippers and producers and has greatly implemented our diplomatic policy of the good neighbor.

SELECTIVE SERVICE

Fathers' draft

(Approved Dec. 5, 1943, Public Law 197, 78th Cong.)

This law provides for the delaying of inductions of pre-Pearl Harbor fathers as long as possible without affecting the usual regular and orderly flow of required manpower into the armed forces according to quota schedules. Occupational deferments were tightened by becoming subject to review by the appeal board for the area in which the registrant is employed. Provision was also made for setting up a board to review and recommend changes in physical, mental, and moral qualifications for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

Government employees deferment

(Approved Apr. 8, 1943, Public Law 23, 78th Cong.)

Deferment of Government employees from military service was stabilized and regulated by this act. Provision was made for the setting up of committees in the agencies and departments for the purpose of review and recommendation of deferments pursuant to Executive Order 9309, March 6, 1943. Power to request deferment was removed from the hands of bureau chiefs and personnel and responsibility placed with special committees appointed for that purpose.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Employment tax

(Approved Dec. 22, 1943, Pub. Law 211, 78th Cong.)

The increase in the Social Security Employment Tax paid by employees and employers was suspended for the first 2 months of 1944 and the former rate of 1 percent was continued for that period. This act enabled Congress to review the involved pay-roll tax situation to effect a final agreement and settlement of the percentage to be withheld for 1944. By temporarily freezing the current tax at the past level of 1 percent, Congress prevented a state of utter confusion developing among employers and employees in case Congress were to revise the 2-percent tax as provided in the existing law. More than 40,000,000 persons would be variously affected by such changes and industry would have found it necessary to revise complicated bookkeeping procedures.

Maternity and child welfare

(Approved July 12, 1943, Public Law 135, 78th Cong.)

The following sums were appropriated for the fiscal year 1944 to be used for maternal and child care:

1. $5,820,000 appropriated for grants to States for the purpose of enabling each State to extend and improve services for promoting the health of mothers and children, as authorized in title V, part 1, of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935 (42 U. S. C. 701).

2. $3,870,000 appropriated to extend and improve services for crippled children, as authorized in title V, part 2, of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935 (42 U. S. C. 711).

3. $1,510,000 appropriated for care of homeless or neglected children, or children in danger of becoming delinquent, as authorized in title V, part 3, of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935 (42 U. S. C. 721).

4. Four million four hundred thousand dollars appropriated for emergency maternity and infant care to provide in addition to similar services otherwise available, medical, nursing, and hospital maternity and infant care for wives and infants of enlisted men in the armed forces of the United States.

(Approved Oct. 1, 1943, Public Law 156, 78th Cong.)

Eighteen million six hundred thousand dollars additional appropriation was made for the fiscal year 1944 for emergency maternity and infant care, in addition to similar services otherwise available for wives and infants of enlisted men of the lower paid grades in the armed forces of the United States. This large appropriation provides for a greater extension of this type of aid to those who are least able to pay for it.

VETERANS AND ARMED FORCES BENEFITS

Dependents transportation

(Approved Nov. 28, 1943, Public Law 193, 78th Cong.)

Transportation of the dependents and household effects of personnel on active duty of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard was provided under this act in cases wherein a transfer to sea duty is involved; or transfer is ordered to a place in which no Government quarters are available or for reasons of military necessity the dependents are not permitted to follow; or in cases in which evacuation is necessary for military reasons or to relieve congestion.

Disabled soldiers and sailors

(Approved Dec. 17, 1943, Public Law 202, 78th Cong.)

The amount of Federal aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States was increased from $240 to $300 per annum for each person.

Merchant marine benefits

(Approved June 23, 1943, Public Law 87, 78th Cong.)

This act extended reemployment rights to persons leaving their positions for services in the merchant marine.

Personal property

(Approved Oct. 27, 1943, Public Law 176, 78th Cong.)

This act provided for reimbursement of officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees, when operating as part of the Navy of the United States, for property lost, damaged, or destroyed in such service. Replacement of such property destroyed or lost in naval action or ship sinkings had heretofore placed a heavy financial burden on the personnel included under the benefits of this act.

Servicemen's dependents benefits

(Approved May 10, 1943, Public Law 51, 78th Cong.)

Appropriated $2,000,000 for expansion of facilities for hospitalization of dependents of naval and Marine Corps personnel.

(Approved Oct. 26, 1943, Public Law 174, 78th Cong.)

Under this act allowances for children were increased from $12 to $30 for the first child, and from $10 to $20 for each additional child. Substantial increases were also provided for dependent parents, sisters, or brothers.

Veterans' Administration

(Approved July 13, 1943, Public Law 144, 78th Cong.)

Congress passed legislation providing for liberalizing and making more uniform the administrative provisions in veterans' laws pertaining to compensation, pension, and retirement benefits payable by the Veterans' Administration.

Veterans' insurance benefits

(Approved Mar. 23, 1943, Public Law 13, 78th Cong.)

This act provided for an automatic renewal of expiring 5-year level premium term policies of those in active military or naval service and certain other personnel outside the continental limits of the United States.

Veterans' rehabilitation benefits

(Approved Mar. 24, 1943, Public Law 16, 78th Cong.)

Vocational rehabilitation to overcome handicaps was provided in this act for any honorably discharged person who served in the active military or naval service at any time after December 6, 1941.

WAR FINANCE

Lend-lease extension

(Approved Mar. 11, 1943, Public Law 9, 78th Cong.)

The powers of the President under the original Lend-Lease Act of 1941 (Public Law 11, 78th Cong.) were extended by 1 year. Congress voted this extension in affirming the substantial success of the lend-lease program in shortening and winning the war by means of reciprocal aid between all the United Nations.

Lend-lease appropriations

(Approved June 14, 1943, Public Law 70, 78th Cong.)

Pursuant to the increasing demands of offensive warfare, Congress appropriated $6,273,629,000 additional for the purposes of lend-lease.

Monetary stabilization

(Approved Apr. 29, 1943, Public Law 42, 78th Cong.)

This act extended until June 30, 1945, authority contained in the Gold Reserve Act of 1943, as amended (Public Law 87, 73d Cong.). Continuation of the stabilization fund was provided. This fund was established for the purpose of maintaining the value of the United States dollar abroad thus aiding in preserving an equitable balance and an even flow of international trade. Increased activities under lend-lease made continuation of stabilization an imperative part of the war program.

Pay-as-you-go taxes

(Approved June 9, 1943, Public Law 68, 78th Cong.)

This act provides for the current payment of individual income taxes, at the source, whereas in the past a person at the close of the year filled out an income-tax form and paid taxes in a lump sum, or in installments, during the following year. Thus current income was bearing the burden of old taxes and in many cases the Federal Government was unable to collect these taxes. In collecting at the source of income the taxpayer has been relieved of the necessity of withholding income for tax purposes and the Federal Government is more certain of tax collections. In addition, servicemen are allowed an additional exemption of $1,500 over the regular amount of exemption.

WAR PROSECUTION

Antistrike legislation

(Passed over veto, June 25, 1943, Public Law 89, 78th Cong.)

The War Labor Disputes Act was passed by Congress for the purpose of halting strikes and other labor disturbances in plants, mines, or facilities producing articles or materials useful or necessary to the war effort. Provision was contained for Government seizure of plants so affected or about to be affected by labor difficulties. Penalties were included for persons who instigate, coerce, conspire, induce, or encourage any person aiding in any strikes, lock-outs, slow-downs, or other interruptions or interference with production and operation. One section of this act prohibited campaign contributions by labor organizations. This act was vetoed by the President, who did not disagree with the purpose and principles of the act (S. Doc. 75, 78th Cong., 1st sess.) but believed that the methods to enforce compliance would not prove to be satisfactory. Congress passed the War Labor Disputes Act over the Presidential veto in affirming its belief that this legislation would provide the guaranties necessary to protect the Nation's war production.

Civilian employees of contractors with the United States

(Approved Dec. 23, 1943, Public Law 216, 78th Cong.)

This act amended that of December 2, 1942 (Public Law 784, 77th Cong.) in providing for continuation of 100 percent of average weekly wage of those civilian workers who were taken prisoner by the enemy, and for payment to dependents of 70 percent of such weekly wage.

Diving duty pay increase

(Approved Apr. 10, 1943, Public Law 33, 78th Cong.)

This act recognized the dangers and hazards of diving duty, as well as the technical skill and specialized training required in such work. Diving duty pay was increased by $5 to $30 per month, over the old rate, and by $5 per hour for work under extremely hazardous conditions.

Female physicians and surgeons

(Approved Apr. 16, 1943, Public Law 38, 78th Cong.)

The medical and surgical skill and ability of women surgeons and physicians was emphasized by the Government in this act, which provided for their commission in the Army and Navy Reserve, receiving the same pay and allowances, rights, privileges, and benefits as members of the Officers' Reserve Corps of the Army and the Naval Reserve of the Navy.

Induction limitations of the Navy and Marine Corps

By this time the shipbuilding and training-station construction programs of the Navy were sufficiently advanced so that there were adequate facilities for training men and new fighting craft for them to use against the enemy. All previous restrictions on the number of inductions into the Navy and Marine Corps were lifted by this act of Congress.

Landing and auxiliary craft construction

(Approved May 26, 1943, Public Law 61, 78th Cong.)

With the halting of further Axis expansion in Russia, Africa, and the Orient by the fall of 1942 and the beginning of the drive upon the fortress of Europe and Pacific islands, the construction and planning of landing craft of all types was more clearly defined as the future course of the campaigns took shape. Such construction was thus able to make use of the knowledge gained in battle and recent technological advances in boat and shipbuilding research. Preparing for the assault on the Continent, Congress authorized the conversion and construction of 1,000,000 tons of landing craft and auxiliary craft suitable for amphibious operations and for intra shore-based forces and fleet services.

(Approved June 17, 1943, Public Law 76, 78th Cong.)

In addition to the authorization for 1,000,000 tons of landing craft (Public Law 61, 78th Cong.), Congress authorized construction and conversion of 1,000,000 tons of auxiliary craft for offensive use of the Navy.

(Approved Dec. 17, 1943, Public Law 204, 78th Cong.)

An additional 2,500,000 tons of auxiliary vessels, landing craft, and district craft was authorized by Congress.

Manpower shortage

(Approved Dec. 23, 1943, Public Law 217, 78th Cong.)

The Farm Labor Act (Public Law 45, 78th Cong.) was extended until January 31, 1944, and provision was included for the War Manpower Commission to continue use of funds to facilitate the movement of Mexican and Canadian nationals to the United States for industrial and railroad employment, essential to the war effort. Severe labor shortages in the field of transportation, repair, and maintenance was effectively lessened by this program of employing workers from our neighbor nations.

Military appropriation

(Approved July 1, 1943, Public Law 108, 78th Cong.)

The Military Establishment appropriation for the fiscal year 1944 was $59,034,839,673. Of this sum the Air Corps received $23,655,481,000.

Naval station and public works construction

(Approved Mar. 26, 1943, Public Law 19, 78th Cong.)

Naval war activities required the construction of vast shore stations and facilities, including public works such as roads, buildings, accessories, and services. For the necessary immediate construction work $1,256,607,000 was appropriated by Congress.

Navy appropriation

(Approved June 26, 1943, Public Law 92, 78th Cong.)

Congress passed the $27,434,000,000 Navy appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1944; $6,324,120,000 of this sum was included for new construction and replacement of naval craft of all types and classes and for machinery and equipment for these vessels,

Nurses for war and home fronts

(Approved June 15, 1943, Public Law 74, 78th Cong.)

In Europe and Asia and on the islands of the South Pacific as the tempo of offensive war increased, casualty figures rose. At home, the longer hours of work in business and industry, general war fatigue and tension paved the way for numerous minor and some major civilian ailments, all damaging to the requirements for increased war production. A greater supply of nurses was imperative on the war fronts and at home. Congress promptly enacted legislation providing for the training of nurses for the armed forces, civilian and Government hospitals, health agencies and war industries by providing grants to institutions training nurses. Tuition fees and other expenses are paid by the Government.

Pharmacy Corps

(Approved July 12, 1943, Public Law 130, 78th Cong.)

This act established in the Medical Department of the Army a corps to be known as the Pharmacy Corps. Recognition was thus given to the outstanding services of the pharmacists of the Nation in aiding the prosecution of the war.

Protection of vessels and ports

(Approved July 9, 1943, Public Law 127, 78th Cong.)

This act provided severe penalties for the willful violation of regulations or orders respecting the protection or security of vessels, harbors, ports, or water-front facilities.

Silver for war and civilian needs

(Approved July 9, 1943, Public Law 137, 78th Cong.)

For war and civilian uses Congress authorized the release of silver, held or owned by the United States, for a period not longer than 6 months after the present war. The disappearance of many metals from the world market necessitated use of substitutes. Silver was held in great quantities by the Government and many urgent war and civilian needs could thus be adequately met by the substitution of silver.

Technical-industrial education for soldiers

(Approved Mar. 6, 1943, Public Law —, 78th Cong.)

Amending Public Law 435, Seventy-seventh Congress, this act deleted the 2 percent limitation heretofore imposed on the number of Army personnel who might be detailed as students at technical, professional, and other educational institutions, or as student observers and investigators at industrial plants, hospitals, and other places. This provided a greater opportunity for in-service training of a larger number of military personnel and afforded the Army a closer contact with the sources of war production in this country as well as providing a pool of highly trained men to aid in the reconversion of occupied territory abroad.

Vocational Rehabilitation

(Approved July 6, 1943, Public Law 113, 78th Cong.)

Amendments to the Vocational Rehabilitation Act of 1943 provided for vocational rehabilitation of war and other disabled individuals through State plans approved by the Federal Security Administrator; and allowed a minimum of 60 days after meeting of State legislatures for compliance with such act.

Removed the limitations on the amount to be paid States for vocational rehabilitation upon approval by Federal Security Administrator, and extended provisions of the act to include Alaska and the District of Columbia.

Provided for payment to the States of administrative expenses and (1) necessary expenditures for vocational rehabilitation services for war-disabled civilians; (2) one-half of expenditures for rehabilitation and medical examinations where necessary to determine eligibility, and necessary expenditures of disabled individuals (including corrective surgery, therapeutic treatment, and hospitalization where such will reduce handicaps to employment; transportation, occupational licenses, equipment, etc.; prosthetic devices essential to employment; and maintenance during training); (3) full costs of States unable to provide funds prior to July 1, 1945, on the basis of comparative State per capita incomes.

Authorized the Federal Security Administrator to make studies with respect to abilities of handicapped individuals and to train necessary personnel.

War contract fees

(Approved July 14, 1943, Public Law 149, 78th Cong.)

The payment of excessive fees or compensation in connection with the negotiation of war contracts was prohibited by this act. In negotiation of war contracts there had been numerous instances wherein large fees had been paid to so-called contact men or middlemen who presumed to offer their services to industry at excessive rates in making contacts with war agencies. This act defined as subcontracts all those contracts where fees or commissions are contingent upon actual procurement or amount of the contract, or under which any part of the services consist of the solicitation or procurement of the Government contract. Such contracts were then made subject to renegotiation and the prohibition against payment of contingent fees and commissions for procurement of Government contracts would become effective since commissions and fees could not be included by the contractor as a part of his cost statement in the renegotiation proceedings.

Women's Army Corps

(Approved July 1, 1943, Public Law 110, 78th Cong.)

The Women's Army Auxiliary Corps was formally constituted a part of the Army of the United States for the duration of the present war and 6 months thereafter.

Address by Robert E. Hannegan at Thomas Jefferson Dinner, New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able and instructive address delivered by the Honorable Robert E. Hannegan, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, at the Thomas Jefferson dinner at the Commodore Hotel, New York City, last night. I had the very great pleasure of listening to Mr. Hannegan's able address.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Since accepting the assignment as chairman of the Democratic National Committee last January, I have visited 20 States and talked with hundreds of American citizens in every walk of life.

Tonight I want to report to the Democrats of New York that it is my firm conviction that the Democratic Party will win the national elections in November and that our standard bearer will be New York's greatest son—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Everywhere I have been, I find that there is in the hearts and minds of the American people the resolute determination that our great President must lead us to the conclusion of the relentless war against the enemies of liberty and then utilize his leadership and vision to establish a just and lasting peace.

There is also among people a firm conviction that the Republican Party, irrespective of its promises and the utterances of its leaders, cannot be given another opportunity to destroy or confuse the hope of mankind that we will have both victory and peace in the great war that is now reaching its climax. Yes, I am certain that the American people have learned the lesson of history. They are determined that the vision and idealism of Woodrow Wilson shall not again be submerged by the cynicism and the opportunism of another Harding.

The people of the United States are determined that Franklin D. Roosevelt shall complete the assignment which destiny has given him. And I can say to his fellow Democrats of New York that, whatever might be the purely personal desires of the President, the Democrats of the United States and millions of other Americans will demand that a great historical process be completed without interruption. And despite the malicious whispers to the contrary, I can assure you that the President is fit and ready for the fight.

I wish to make it clear that I have not discussed with the President the question of his own desires or intentions with respect to these demands of the people that he again become a candidate. I am only reporting to you my personal opinion and the conclusions which I have reached after discussions with hundreds of persons throughout the Nation.

It is my personal opinion that the people of America, always the masters of their Nation's destiny, want to finish the job now on hand with the same leadership that has taken them so far toward ultimate victory.

It is my personal opinion that our people have adjudged the life-and-death risks of total war too great to entrust the responsibility of waging it from here on, to a novice or a lesser soldier of freedom.

It is my personal opinion that the mothers and fathers, the wives and sweethearts of the men serving in the armed forces, the workers in our factories and shipyards, the owners of farms, and the enlightened leaders of our great industries, alike are coming to a single great realization: That the future, not only of their own private interests, but of their country, is at stake, and that the stakes are too large, the penalty of inexperience too heavy, to shift the tasks that lie ahead to an unpracticed hand.

And it is my personal opinion, ladies and gentlemen, that we must and shall, over the next 4 years, retain our great leader who is able to tackle those jobs with the practiced hand—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

I wish I could tell you more. I wish I could have come to you tonight with something more to report than the will of the people, for it is true that any man, no matter how vital his services may be to his country, must himself give the final answer to the call of his party and his country.

I can say to you, and certainly I shall say to him, that both his party and his country are making the demand that there shall be continuity of leadership in this crisis. And for myself, I am convinced that whatever his judgment in the matter may be, the good of his country will come first, the safety of our people will dictate the decision that he makes.

I can go further with you tonight. I can give you an idea of the case that we, the Democratic Party organization, are preparing to lay before the President. I shall be pleased to know whether it convinces you.

We shall state at the outset our candid opinion that through service rendered, President Roosevelt, more than any other man in America today, has earned the confidence of the American people.

I have the best reason in the world for believing that the people are ready to express that confidence overwhelmingly at the polls next November. I have talked to a considerable and representative sample of them and they have told me so.

It follows, therefore, that our President, better than any other man in America today, stands as the bulwark against opposition views which, if put into practice, would endanger our country both in war and in peace.

What are those views?

First, on the matter of winning the war. Looking back today, every American knows how dangerous were the views, when war threatened us, of certain Republican leaders in the Congress, who opposed preparing the island of Guam for use by our Navy, who were against changing the Neutrality Act, who opposed appropriations for fighting planes, who were against lend-lease, and in most cases opposed selective service.

No one can predict what the world situation would be today if the views of these obstructionists prevailed. The American people not only have the right, but the duty to inquire into their records before political decisions are made. The electorate knows that instead of marching to ultimate victory, we should be facing the possible humiliation of a shameless deal with the Fascist oppressors if the Nation had not had leadership with the courage to prepare swiftly to meet the forces of aggression.

Looking ahead today, nobody knows better than does President Roosevelt how dangerous to the peace are the views of those Republican leaders who run with the hares and bark with the hounds, who cry out, between elections, against the other great powers that are fighting this war side by side with us, and who smoothly declare, as election time draws near, their newly-inflamed passion for the principle of international cooperation.

Nobody knows better than does President Roosevelt how dangerous to the world of tomorrow it would be to entrust the peace of that world to men who learn their lessons late. And such lessons as these Republican leaders have learned at all, they have learned very late indeed.

The Governor of this State, the Honorable Thomas E. Dewey, who copies down the answers on his little slate after the examination is all over, gravely told the people of America on January 20, 1940:

"Insofar as the present administration has adhered to the policies of his predecessors, it has met with the general approval of the American people. But it has occasionally strayed from the path. A conspicuous and most unfortunate departure was the recognition by the New Deal of Soviet Russia."

You folks in the audience cannot see the underlining of that last sentence in the notes I have here, but the italics are mine.

It was "most unfortunate," said the Governer of New York, that our President recognized Soviet Russia. Of course, he said that 4 years ago, and at that time, unless a person was gifted with a rare insight into the play of great forces in the world, unless he had in him the quality of statesmanship which would enable him to judge accurately of the pull and direction of those forces, he could not have known—could not have realized—the great peril in which our country stood in 1940; he could not have recognized the heroic roles which the people of Great Britain, the people of China, and the people of Russia were to play; he could not have foreseen how, in fulfilling their own destinies, they were to halt the menace that threatened us.

Our President, by his actions before and since that time, move by move, play by play, in this grim game of checkmating a world-wide aggression, has shown that insight—that quality of statesmanship—and those characteristics go far toward explaining today the steady march of the United Nations toward final victory.

By the same contract between the abilities of men, the minds of men, we may explain many a similar masterpiece of miscalculation which can be accredited to the present Governor of New York. They bejewel his utterances in those reckless days when he forgot to wait for the teacher to give out the answers before copying them down on his own little slate.

"At last," he said, again in 1940, and again I am quoting, "At last I think our administration will stop trying to make deals with Russia. We need no such partnerships."

A few days ago, speaking his piece this time after the answers had been given out and the examination was all over, Governor Dewey said:

"No initial measures against Germany and Japan, however drastic, will have permanent value unless they fall within the setting of a durable cohesion between Great Britain and ourselves, together, I hope, with Russia and China."

Now, perhaps I do not have a proper understanding of what a "durable cohesion" is. Perhaps a "durable cohesion" is not a "deal" or a partnership.

But I do know the historical fact that the government of Russia with which Governor Dewey wanted to have no truck in 1940 is the same government with which he hopes we shall have a durable cohesion in 1944. The only major change pertinent to this question that has taken place inside Russia since that time is the elimination of somewhere around 8,000,000 Germans.

To borrow from the Governor's bright lexicon, I for one would be better able to understand these gems of statesmanship that he is scattering among us plain Americans if they fell within the setting of a durable cohesion between one phase of this crisis and the next.

But perhaps this uncohesive record is a part of the Governor's studied technique. Perhaps he considers it good politics. You know, in modern warfare the strategists strive to maintain a "fluid front."

Well, the Governor was plenty fluid when he analyzed the question of national defense 4 years ago. Perhaps some of you will remember his brilliant exposition proving that we could not possibly produce 50,000 airplanes. He had all the figures to show how and why it could not be done, and how even the plant to build that many airplanes would take us at least 4 years to construct.

Then he cinched the argument and boxed it in an ironbound coffin of defeatism by warning us that—I quote—"To use airplanes you have to have an air force. To maintain and fly 50,000 planes, an air force of about 750,000 men is necessary."

These, the Governor continued, "are sobering facts."

Today the present Governor of New York must be very sober indeed. Today, 4 years after he showed us how 50,000 planes could not be built, how an air force to man them could not be trained, America has produced for the armed forces 184,000 planes, and we have an air force of 2,385,000 fighting men.

Again, the difference between men's abilities, men's minds. And I suspect, too, a little of the difference between men who have vision and set their sights high and men who lack this quality and keep them low.

Let us remember that difference. To the people of this country, it is something more than a casual observation on the human species. To our children and our children's children, that difference will mean something more than a paragraph or a chapter in their history books. If we, the electorate of 1944, are not sufficiently aware of this difference, the history that will interest our children could be tragically different.

What new dangers are there going to be, what pitfalls shall we be threading our way through, after the last shot is fired on the battlefield of World War No. 2? And in dealing with the delicate problems that will arise among nations, the dangers that may threaten our own and all other free peoples, in anticipating the world of 1948, will the Governor of New York show the same great lack of comprehension that he has exhibited for the 4-year stretch since 1940?

In calling on President Roosevelt once again to lead his party and his country we shall continue to review this record of defeatism of the opposition.

We shall point out to him the distaste of the people for campaign tactics which, even at this early stage, the Republican opposition has already adopted. We shall point out to him the recklessness, the desperation of a political party so utterly bereft of an issue that it must comb through the newspapers from day to day and catch as catch can their issues out of the emergencies of this war.

We shall call attention to the character of a so-called loyal opposition which lashes out blindly at its Commander in Chief in time of war and prejudges any measure he may take to save the homefront from weakness or from chaos.

In only one respect have I been able to observe any improvement in the intemperate character of recent utterances of the various elements opposed to the President and his policies.

We have recently been provided with certain very vital statistics, politically speaking, from the States of Oklahoma, Massachusetts, Florida, and Alabama. And since that time I have not heard repeated the prediction that the Republican Party could win with anybody.

The victories of our two valiant warriors, Senators CLAUDE PEPPER and LISTER HILL, appear to have silenced the Republican talk of a trend. They had been talking for a long time about a trend.

I think the publishers of Webster might well point out, under the definitions of that word, that a trend is something the Republicans see only when the Democrats don't get out and vote.

If there is any trend running through the months and years that lie ahead of us, it will be the trend to victory, and may that trend reach upward, sharp and high.

It will be the trend to a peace that will prevail over a world of free peoples.

It will be a trend to a better life for our people, a trend to those freedoms for which one man, Franklin D. Roosevelt, has worked so long and fought so wisely and so well.

Address by Senator Truman Before Missouri Democratic State Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] before the Democratic State Convention at Jefferson City, Mo., on May 8, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, honored and distinguished guests, and fellow delegates, it is always a pleasure to meet with Missouri Democrats. Of the many blessings a generous Providence has bestowed upon me, the one I value most is the privilege of coming home to Missouri. That same thought is uppermost in the minds and hearts of the thousands of Missouri's sons and daughters who, in the service of our country, are stationed today all over the world. Their duty is plain. They will not cease, they will not flinch, they will march forward united, until this war is won. Our duty is also clear. It is our plain duty to stand united—to bind ourselves together in unity and harmony, to bring about the earliest possible termination of this dreadful conflict.

Our dual purpose—the two keynotes to which we pledge ourselves today are:

1. Win the war, and
2. Protect the peace.

As citizens of the greatest democracy in the history of mankind—yes, as Missouri Democrats, we must prevent any action, avoid any word which would promote discord and weaken the force of our war effort and thus prolong the fighting by so much as even 1 day. Nor will the end of the war remove all of the dangers facing the cause of democracy. It must be guarded and protected in the days beyond, when—after victory—we still must plan, produce, and preserve a permanent peace.

This is an election year both in the State and in the Nation. Judged by any standard of comparison, the coming elections must be considered the most important in our history because they will not only decide who will carry on our Government during the most critical stage of the war, but they will also determine upon whom will fall the equally portentous responsibility of planning the foundation and building the structure of the peace.

Thus, while meeting the challenge of enemies abroad, democracy is called upon to face a test at home. We would not have it otherwise, even in the throes of a world-wide war, it is not only appropriate but necessary that these processes go on. The right to vote is one of the great privileges of our American democracy. It is likewise one of the fundamental processes of free government and of the democratic way we are fighting to preserve. Even so, the demands of this war are so compelling, that this country cannot afford to become embroiled in political controversy. We cannot neglect, for one moment, the vigorous prosecution of the war.

The present conflict is rightly called a total war. All of us are in it. In cooperative effort gigantic military and naval forces have been drawn together—on the land and in the air—on the water and under the sea—labor, manufacturing and industry, agriculture, railroads, and all other forms of transportation; and to the extent that each person has labored in war production, or bought War bonds, or given his blood to be converted into live-saving plasma—to that extent each one has contributed to the largest single combined enterprise ever conceived by the human mind.

This has not been achieved by accident. Your Government, a Democratic administration, has not only been a vital, integral part, but at the same time has been the guiding and directing force of the whole collective effort.

Destiny placed at the head of this Nation in 1933 a great President, who before all others, recognized the danger to this country of the impending conflagration. The brutal Nazis were across the Atlantic, and across the Pacific were the cruel and cunning Japanese.

These diabolical gangsters constructed a war machine of such power that it was scientifically calculated to overwhelm every free people and subject the entire world to slavery. The scheme was perfected, the weapons were forged, the hour was chosen—and the blitzkrieg struck. Hitler said the democracies were soft. He is reported to have said America would be an inside job, meaning, of course, that our people would not hold together over the long, hard road to victory.

We are meeting this powerful enemy in mortal combat. That we are as well prepared as we are to make an effective contribution now to this war is due to the foresight, courage, and wisdom of a Democratic President, supported by a Democratic Congress.

Destiny has charged a Democratic administration and a Democratic Congress with leadership in this emergency. There are those, a minority, I believe, who would change this leadership. In their ambition to promote political ends they concentrate their criticism upon our brave and gallant President.

But these critics, in the same old "business as usual" Republican politics, have not succeeded in hiding the deeper objective which is to transplant into the control of new hands (selected, of course, by the Republican Party) the manifold activities necessary to the conduct of war.

In their frantic search for candidates to offer the voters they have even gone so far as to nominate an entire Cabinet for their as yet unnamed Presidential candidate. To be sure, each member of this prematurely nominated cabinet is a dyed-in-the-wool, gold-plated, old-guard Republican.

We are confident the people will decide that the present leadership must be supported and continued. It requires no demonstration to perceive that a Democratic defeat at the polls this year would confuse the conduct of the war, perhaps imperil the peace, and thus give aid and comfort to the enemy.

The war rulers of Germany have repeatedly expressed the hope that America would become divided that our Democratic administration would be defeated. They now see that as long as America remains united behind this administration there is no hope for the eventual victory of the dictatorships.

The present war is a continuation of the World War we fought in 1917 and 1918. Out of the ashes of that war a group of German militarists kept alive the spark of hate that the Nazis later fanned to flame.

We are again warned that the over-all strategy of the German war lords includes a preparation for the eventuality of defeat. This is their plan. If the Allies can be separated; if an internal division in the United States can be created; if a negotiated peace can be obtained on easy terms then Germany is free to plot and to lay the foundation for a third world war. If we know anything of German history, this is exactly what they will do. As one who has seen the rough and seamy side of both World Wars No. 1 and No. 2, I urge my fellow countrymen and all lovers of peace wheresoever they may be to take the bold steps necessary to rename the Second World War. Let it be the last world war, and let us be sufficiently strong, sufficiently awake, and sufficiently united to make it mean just that.

A Republican Senate with a few disgruntled Democrats jettisoned the League of Nations in 1919 when our great Democratic President, Woodrow Wilson, had made plans for a lasting peace. As we go on to certain victory, let us not be unmindful of the reactionary tactics of the Republican Party in 1919. Let us remember that in the few years, perhaps months, ahead of us, a peace will be made that will affect not only our generation but the generation to come—your children and your grandchildren. Let us keep the administration of this Government in strong, firm, tried, and proven hands.

America and her allies are defeating our enemies on land, in the air, and on the seas. Under the brilliant guidance of our Commander in Chief and the generalship of our military and naval staffs, combined with our success in organizing industry and transportation, the fighting forces of the United Nations are now receiving a veritable flood of the finest war materials. From the laboratories of our distinguished scientists have come the devices that protect our soldiers and sailors. We have advanced the development of aeronautical science by a full generation. We have won the Battle of the Atlantic by defeating the U-boat. We have mastered the technique of three-dimensional war on land, sea, and in the air.

The production of guns and planes and ships and all the armaments of war is flowing with ever-increasing momentum from the factories of America. We have built ships of all types, the estimated 80,000 landing craft to be used in the invasion, the over 20,000 other kinds of vessels in use by the allies. From the famous Higgins landing boats to the world's largest and greatest battleship, the mighty Missouri, this Nation has become the arsenal of the world, and through the assembled might of the free people who form the United Nations the ravagers of the peace of the world are being subdued and total war is being brought to the enemy's home territory.

Modern war is the most highly specialized endeavor. It is divided into the three branches—strategy, tactics, and logistics. Strategy includes the over-all planning. Tactics puts the plans into action in the field. Logistics means having all the matériel of war delivered on time to the proper place and in sufficient quantity for effective use. We have now solved our problems of supply, and by universal consent the American fighting man is the best clothed, best fed, best equipped fighter that ever stepped forth to do battle. American agriculture, management, and labor under the inspired leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt have combined forces. Under his leadership the war will be won.

In applauding the success of this great Democratic administration in uniting America to meet the challenge of war, let us not forget the tremendous achievements in human advancement which were made by the same administration during the peace.

Let us think back to March 4, 1933. On that day a man of destiny became the President of the United States. That man, who has so faithfuly fulfilled the duties of his office, is Franklin Delano Roosevelt. As I listened to him on that Inauguration Day I knew that he realized the plight of the common man. How proud I was that he was a Democrat when he promised that he would drive the money changers from the temples—the money changers who, under Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover had exploited America, for the special privilege of the few and the neglect, yes, even the oppression, of the many. You men of agriculture remember those terrible days. Corn was 15 cents a bushel. Wheat, cattle, and cotton prices were at rock bottom. You could not feed your families on the pittance thrown to you. Millions of unemployed walked the highways and byways of this country looking for work. We all well remember that fear clutched at the very heart and soul of this Nation. These were the conditions which faced Franklin D. Roosevelt when he swore to uphold the Constitution of the United States, and became the President of this country.

The gravest economic crisis in the history of this Nation existed on that March 4 when Herbert Hoover relinquished the responsibility of President and Franklin D. Roosevelt took up the challenge. He imparted to America some of the confidence which was his own. Boldly and almost overnight he restored the financial structure of this Nation and brought the real meaning of free enterprise into being once again. The history of his entire administration has been to relieve want, suffering, and to restore and maintain our ideals of democracy.

Through the loosely administered banking laws, the manipulations of the financial vultures of Wall Street, this Nation's financial structure was crumbling in every city, village, and town. The life savings of the citizens of this Nation were being wiped out overnight. Lines of people stood with despair on their troubled faces as the doors of failing banks slammed shut before them. Try to picture the courage and the deep conviction that must have been the President's when he declared the bank holiday.

Out of the dark shadows of the conditions that led into the banking holiday, President Roosevelt guided this Nation to safety. Legislation was passed for the first time to protect and guarantee the hard-earned savings of the people.

The Securities and Exchange Commission was created to guard the widows and orphans and thousands of small stockholders formerly helpless in the face of bold and ruthless Wall Street manipulators.

The Wagner Act has been justly called the modern bill of rights for those who by their labor have made this country the industrial giant of the world.

These are only a few of the many steps which have been taken to restore the dignity and self-respect of the comman man—to translate into a living and breathing force the true principles of democracy.

And so from the dark days of the Hoover administration—from a state of chaos and fear—Franklin Delano Roosevelt has led us into our rightful heritage as American citizens. Today the fighting men of our country offer their lives that this heritage may be maintained. Our fighting men are carrying the war to our enemies. Americans are fighting, as they have always fought in the past, with honor and with glory.

Out of the dark retrospect of these past 2 years a total war, one fact, one shining reality, now stands recorded in language that all the world can understand.

That reality, that established and many times reestablished fact, is the tremendous hardihood of our democracy. It is the durability, under extreme stress, of our form of government and of our rights as a people under that government. It is the everlasting strength of those foundations laid nearly two centuries ago by the architects of our Nation.

The language that now advertises this strength of ours to the world is the language of action. In action our meaning is carried, strong and clear, to both our friends and our enemies, in a stern rhetoric which our friends will understand and which our enemies cannot misunderstand.

We who are so close sometimes miss the mighty demonstration which these past 2 years have unfolded. We take for granted and look with familiar gaze upon that which should make our hearts exult.

It is well for us, therefore, to take new account of our Nation at war, to open our minds to the full import of these 2 years of action, this proof of the toughness that is America, of the temper that is democracy.

What we accomplish, then, is simply the reaffirmation of our faith. What we find is our own way of life—a way long despised by its enemies, long underesteemed by the world at large, and long under attack even from within—yet still firm, still unshaken at its simple, massive base, man's will to be free. And what we see around us is a people still dedicated to that way of life and still marching on the road to victory.

Of him who is not moved by this realization I would ask only that he think of the tests of total war, tests which our democracy has had to meet, but which its enemies, lacking concern for human life, lacking scruple for human rights, could brush aside.

Of him who is not stirred to wonder at the survival of his own liberties, I would ask only that he consider the pressures that have been put upon the authority of government which protects those liberties. They are pressures which our enemies could ignore because they have granted no liberty to their own people.

Of him who is not filled with pride, and with humble gratitude, but the fighting power mobilized in time to meet the challenge of our enemies, I ask only that he recall the handicap of years which had to be overcome within a matter of months under this same free system.

Our Government is meeting all these tests. It is withstanding all these pressures. It is overcoming all these handicaps.

But its triumph was not automatic—a thing to be taken for granted. That triumph is a triumph of sound administration. It is the triumph of a loyal people. And the work that must yet be done on the home front still exacts of each one of us all the participation of which we are capable. The same free system which safeguards our rights calls upon us in ever greater measure to fulfill our responsibilities.

It has been my assignment and my privilege to serve in this war as an answerable observer for the Congress. That duty evolved upon me when the senatorial leaders of the Democratic Party advocated the creation by the Senate of a Special Committee to Investigate the War Program and honored me with the position of chairman.

The purpose for which that committee was created was to search out the obstacles that were hampering the war program and to see that they were removed without fear or favor. What is more, the investigation was to be a continuing one. The committee was determined to do the job assigned to it without resorting to either a whitewash or a smear.

It is in that capacity of first-hand observer that I can give this heartening account of our progress on the home front. I cannot, however, make out any record of this home-front effort that is entirely without blemish.

We have among us, as we have always had in every great crisis, a certain minority of the unenlightened, the unwilling, or the unscrupulous.

Some of these persons and interests place individual privilege or private advantage above the national welfare, war or no war. They are the unenlightened; or, to use a shorter and I think a better term, they are simply plain chiselers.

Some entertain a wholesome dread of our enemies but a less wholesome hope that somehow, from the sacrifices necessary to defeat those enemies, they themselves will be exempted. They are the unwilling.

And some deliberately attack their own Government in public utterance and in the public prints for the political capital which they hope to make for themselves or their party out of these attacks, whether or not the result is constructive, whether or not the cause of this Nation will suffer from the poison of disunity which they spread. They are the unscrupulous.

All these, we have among us. By their actions they add to the strains of war upon our democracy, they increase the pressures that endanger our rights as free citizens; and wittingly or not, they offer by indirection, that aid and comfort which our enemies must inevitably derive from our own dissension.

I want particularly to call your attention to the dangers to our war program which are created by those whom we may describe as the politically unscrupulous. With a national election in the offing, in the months ahead they are likely to become ever more vociferous, ever more extreme and irresponsible in the attacks they make upon their Government. Judging from the character of their past utterances, I think we must assume that neither the absence of truth nor the consequences in terms of the harm they work upon the cause of their country will deter them.

From the records of the Senate committee which I have named you will find much that has been criticized openly and vigorously. Our one thought has been to win the war as quickly as possible. The administration has not taken the position of hiding mistakes. Rather, its policy has been to bring them out in the open so that they can be corrected.

This has led some of the guiding figures of the Republican Party to seek a special advantage for themselves by harping on the mistakes that we ourselves have brought to light.

The propaganda emanating from Republican sources on this subject, in content, in the character, and in its very tone, must be held suspect on this ground. Unmistakably, that propaganda carries the brand of partisan politics attempting to make capital out of this war.

Whatever the intentions of that party's leaders may be toward the early defeat of our enemies, the character of their public utterance subordinates victory in war to the hope of victory at the polls.

In their belief that they can actually turn the crisis of war to their own political purposes; in their belief that they can successfull embitter the American people against necessary war measures; in their belief that in so doing they can unseat the administration that has shown the foresight and generalship to put those measures into effect, these Republican leaders are, I believe, riding to their fall. Meanwhile they ride roughshod over the public interest and over the cause of their own country at war.

Take, for example, the incessant outcry against rationing. So avidly have these spokesmen for the Republican Party seized upon any slightest imperfection in the system, so bitter has been their resentment, so exaggerated their complaints, that they do not condemn the agencies and local boards and volunteers who have given time and effort to the problem. They condemn only themselves.

They cannot claim the license of constructive criticism. Their hatred of the administration responsible for rationing shows through too clearly. Their motives of tearing down, of working on the emotions of a war-beset people cannot be concealed under the pious claim of constructive criticism.

No, this is not an attack on inefficiency in rationing. This is an attack on rationing itself. Those responsible for it cannot now escape the weight of their guilt by styling themselves "critics." They are self-condemned as obstructionists, and they must meet the impact of that condemnation at the polls next November.

The same charge must be made against the Republican leadership in the matter of price control. Here, too, they go beyond the bounds of criticism, they stand self-condemned in their efforts at obstruction and defeat.

We hear the defense made for this clique of the self-styled "loyal opposition," that it supports the general principle of price control. Nevertheless it has attacked relentlessly the Government agency established to make price control effective. Its leaders are now trying to cripple the law itself with amendments that would strip the Federal authority and pave the way for chaotic markets.

Is that course indicative of support for the principle of price control? Are the Republican leaders in Congress who have adopted those tactics merely seeking, as they would tell you, to perfect the law and the agency set up to administer it?

No; those counsels of perfection are not born of the wish to cure. Like the hunter's decoy, they are set out for the kill. And already our entire system of price control, basically essential to the war economy, is menaced.

But here, too, the mask is too thin, the defense too far-fetched. The American people will not be deceived. Those who are responsible for this studied effort to undermine the Office of Price Administration and to perforate its legal authority with countless loopholes for the benefit of special interests will be answered. And that answer also will be given them at the polls in November.

So, too, with those who have deliberately tried to implant in our people the false fear of encroachment on free enterprise. Before them, as they stand at the wailing wall and mourn the death of free enterprise, that same free enterprise rises today to new heights of achievement under the administration of the same great President who directed its recovery from a Republican prostration 12 years ago.

Of course I believe in free enterprise, but in my system of free enterprise, the democratic principle that, there never was, never has been, never will be, room for the ruthless exploitation of the many for the benefit of the few.

There must be, and is, ample room in this country for free enterprise, room for every citizen to have the right to achieve and progress according to his capability and his industry and integrity.

There must be, and is, ample room in this country to be an individualist, to be free, and to be independent.

That is the concept of free enterprise that has been advocated and that has been kept alive and vigorous by the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt since March 4, 1933. It is not the concept of free enterprise of the days of Republican domination of affairs in America. It is not the concept of free enterprise that permits the devious operations of powerful groups to circumvent the will of the American people.

Yes, we of the Democratic Party believe in free enterprise and private initiative. And we pray God that it will be a Democratic administration that will unravel the chaos of this war so that every individual in America may truly enjoy the benefit of free enterprise.

For 12 long years the American people have witnessed this farcical Republican ritual of mourning over the death of a free enterprise that has not died. For 12 long years we have heard the Wall Street funeral march, we have seen the phantom victim laid in its grave, and the mourners have gone about the streets. It is time for the little man, for the worker in the factory and the farmer in the field, to ask, "How long, O Lord, how long?"

But their answer is on the way. Perhaps it will take years, perhaps a generation, to clear the American political scene of that social bankruptcy into which Republican leadership has lapsed. But cleared it must be, for the viewpoint of that leadership, its economics, its philosophy, its approach to the problems of Government at home and abroad, are no longer of this world.

That leadership wants to turn back the clock to the day of Hoover, of Coolidge, of Harding. And those days—thank God—are gone forever. There has been no change in the form of our Government. There has been no jettisoning of our Constitution. There has been no sacrifice of our right to be governed by public servants of our own choosing.

All these the Republicans have charged. They even complained that elections in this country were finished. When they were confronted by the fact that there was an election, then they predicted that it would be the last.

But if none of these dire predictions has materialized, what has happened in America? What is it that now outdates the traditional Republican philosophy which builds up tariff walls, exploits the backward or underprivileged peoples of the world, resists a more equitable distribution of the vast wealth of this Nation, gives a free hand to the predatory in business, pampers the monopolistic in industry, and isolates its own Nation from the part which that Nation must play in the world of tomorrow?

It is outdated because the free peoples of the world have moved ahead since the days of Harding, of Coolidge, and of Hoover. And the great American majority, under the Democratic administration of Franklin D Roosevelt, not only have moved with the world, they have been leading the way.

Constructive legislation passed by the Congress over the 10-year period from 1933–43 under Democratic leadership has saved the financial structure and the banks of the Nation, saved the farmer from ruin, gave labor its Magna Carta, put industry and small business on its feet. Now I wonder just what sections of this legislation the Republicans would repeal. I'll tell you they dare not repeal any of it. Their only claim is that they could administer it better. We have only their 12-year record by which to judge what they do and it won't stand up. After 12 years of Republican power, from 1921 to 1933, banks were busted, farmers out of business and 14,000,000 people were walking the streets in want.

It makes me sick at the stomach to hear these ingrates throw bricks at the administration. They remind me of BARKLEY'S story.

Neither do I admire that brand of Democrat who has profited financially and politically from the Democratic Party and who suddenly becomes a statesman and forgets the party that gave him prominence and prosperity. We suffer somewhat from this brand of Democrat right here in Missouri.

It is party responsibility that has made this country the greatest republic the sun has ever shown upon and when a man rides to pomp and prominence in his party's band wagon and then forgets what made him, he's the worst form of human animal, an ingrate.

No, we are not going back to the days when enterprise was not free, when this Nation was not safe, when its people were not employed. The thing that has happened to America during these 12 years past was the awakening of a great people to a great destiny, a destiny in logical harmony with its growth through these many generations, a destiny that is founded squarely on the base that was laid in 1776 by those master architects, the founding fathers of our country.

Toward that destiny our Nation will continue to march through the years that lie ahead of us, and though the horizon of permanent peace and prosperity is not yet crossed, with a Democratic administration leading us, we are on our way.

The Citizen and His Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARLAN J. BUSHFIELD

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "The Citizen and His Government," delivered by the Honorable George E. Stringfellow, of West Orange, N. J., before the Young Men's Business Club of New Orleans, on April 26, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

May I say at the outset that a service club, civic organization, or an individual, that avoids controversial subjects because they are controversial or political, is not rendering the community or the Nation a maximum service. If we are to preserve and improve our form of government, we must practice the philosophy of Voltaire, who declared, "I wholly disapprove of what you say but will defend to the death your right to say it."

It is recognized fact that our democratic form of government thrives best in an atmosphere of frank and open public discussion of its strength and weaknesses. To emphasize its strength alone is to unbalance the scales of human wisdom.

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

The distinguished committee which awarded the Pultizer Prize to the late William Allen White for an editorial in which he said, "Only when free utterance is suppressed is it needed, and when it is needed, it is most vital to justice," subscribed to White's philosophy.

WOODROW WILSON

During the last World War, Woodrow Wilson recognized this philosophy when he said he would rather have unfair and unjust criticism than to lose the value that comes from constructive criticism.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Abraham Lincoln said: "It isn't only the right of the citizen, but it is his duty to criticize the administrators of Government in war and in peace when, in his opinion, the administrators * * * are doing things * * * destructive of our Government."

We have in our country partisans who place the welfare of their political party above that of the Nation, and who, therefore, charge that to criticize our Government in time of war impedes the war effort, aids the enemy, and is therefore, unpatriotic and downright disloyal. That blanket indictment is supposed to muffle all criticism but, that smoke screen does not deceive any thinking citizen.

When attention is called to the inefficiencies of the New Deal party, we are told to be silent for the sake of unity. But, unity, I submit, is an ideal only when there is freedom within a united people to criticize and change its leadership at will. How else can a government be kept efficient, honest, and the servant of the people? Were we not told by the President that freedom of speech is one of the "four freedoms" for which we fight?

Men have told me that they would like to contribute to the financial support of political parties and to agencies fighting to restore and protect our liberties, but that they dare not have their names on such lists lest they suffer discrimination from one of their principal customers—the Government of the United States.

To that I can only reply—if an American citizen has to make his conscience dependent upon the will of a customer—the business is not worth the price.

Our daring forefathers who threw England's tea into Boston Harbor never thought of their safety or profit.

Our ill-fed, ill-clad, and ill-housed troops at Valley Forge thought not of their comforts or safety.

Those great men who appended their names—that all might read—to the Declaration of Independence, which established us as a Nation, cared little for their safety.

Our sons, who are so gallantly fighting today on the battle fronts of the world, think not of their safety. They willingly lay down their lives that principles of government—principles for which our forefathers also fought—may live.

One of those principles—private enterprise—is today threatened; threatened by policies promoted by persons who hold public office subject to the will of the President and who are, therefore, high in the council of the New Deal party.

They believe, or say they believe, that the "rebuilding of America"—to use their own phrase—must be done by bureaucratic dictation to private enterprise and controlled largely by Government spending and subsidy. While paying lip service to free enterprise, these advocates would subtly substitute a Government-planned and dominated economy for our system, which has given us the greatest liberty and the highest living standard experienced by any country in the history of the world.

These 11-year pests swarm through the lobbies of Congress and the cocktail bars of Washington spreading their poisonous New Deal philosophy. They burrow through the fabric of our Government like unseeing moles.

Their foreign philosophy, put forth under the guise of restoring democracy to the people, is incompatible with every form of freedom, for it concentrates all political and economic power in the same hands which always has and always will result in tyranny.

Recognizing that there is no human being to whom we can safely entrust concentration or political or economic power, our founding fathers wisely adopted a Constitution to prevent concentration of political power and enacted laws to prevent concentration of economic power.

To prevent concentration of political power in Government, they divided it between the Federal and State Governments, and further divided it among the executive, judicial, and legislative branches of each government.

To prevent concentration of ecoonmic power in government, our founders prohibited the taking of private property without "due process of law and just compensation." However, today, in the name of national emergency, Washington bureaucrats issue directives, signed by the President, taking over private property without "due process of law and just compensation."

This may be necessary in time of war, yet, in light of our experience, prior to and since Pearl Harbor, what assurance, I ask, do we have that these powers will be restored to the people after we have won the war, if the philosophy of the New Deal party continues to rule our lives?

To prevent concentration of economic power in private hands, wise statesmen enacted laws for Government regulation of monopolies, and antitrust laws to enforce competition in competitive industries. Imperialistic Japan, Nazi Germany, and Fascist Italy have demonstrated how right our statesmen of past generations were, in believing that concentration of political and economic power in government would destroy every form of freedom.

Such concentration of power has formidable backing—backing of billions of the taxpayers' dollars which can be used as the President and his bureaucrats may elect.

The responsibility of saving our free-enterprise system and other cherished freedoms is yours and mine. If we are good citizens, we will not shirk that responsibility. If we are loyal citizens, we shall never permit anyone to camouflage revolution in the robes of patriotism.

To save our form of government, we need to awaken in our people the kind of crusading spirit that made our Nation the strongest, most prosperous, and freest on the face of the earth.

In Seattle, Wash., recently Vice President HENRY WALLACE, who is not to my knowledge a symbol of success in any business undertaking, charged that American Fascists are trying to ruin our country. The New York Times observed, "It is such vague, reckless charges and abusive language as Mr. WALLACE employs that endangers our national unity."

What is a Fascist, you ask—an American Fascist?

Communists use that word rather frequently. It is always applied to somebody the Communists don't like.

Fascist originally was Mussolini's blackshirt political organization which kept Italy from going communistic. Then it took on an additional connotation of Italian and German participation against Russia's participation in Spain's civil war.

In this country it is a $4 smear word and is used by Reds, "pinks," and their fellow travelers, to plaster anybody they don't like—capitalists, Jews, Roman Catholics, and other religious organizations. Charlie Chaplin said, "Joan Barry is Fascist-minded"—because she wanted more than $25 a week for past services. Of course, anyone who opposes Mr. WALLACE is a Fascist because the Communists are for him, and, insofar as I am concerned, they may have him.

In the same address Vice President WALLACE alarmed those who believe in our form of government and still take what the Vice President says seriously by saying, "We are not going to use the whole Russian political and economic system here in the United States."

Who is this person, HENRY WALLACE, to presume to tell us that we shall substitute any part of our American way of life for Joe Stalin's.

A month or so ago we witnessed the complete, the almost comic degradation of an assemblage—of the members of the national committee of a so-called independent political party—"solicit" the chieftain of their party to run for the Presidency a fourth time so that the Government's foreign nations with which our country is allied in fighting the war might rejoice.

We have heard this same chieftain, seeking his second term of office, define those who differed with him as "forces of selfishness and lust and power." He informed us that he wanted it said "of my first administration * * * these forces * * * met their match," and "of my second administration * * * they met their master."

Can you imagine George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson, or Theodore Roosevelt desiring to be the master of those who differed with them?

Who are these "forces of selfishness and lust and power," you ask?

You, if you urged the Chief Executive of the Nation to live up to the platform promises on which he was elected.

You, if you are opposed to waste and extravagance.

You, if you are opposed to demagoguery and pressure groups.

You, if you are opposed to inciting class and race hatred.

You, if you are opposed to the packing of the Supreme Court.

Following his reelection, which was influenced by Government spending of the taxpayers' moneys and rosy promises which were not kept, we witnessed the Chief Executive, in his lust for power, call upon the citizens of the sovereign States of Georgia, Iowa, Maryland to purge such outstanding public servants as Senators GEORGE, GILLETTE, and TYDINGS, who dared to oppose his attempt to pack the Supreme Court.

Blocked in his effort to concentrate the power of the judiciary in the Executive, the President's long tenure of office, death and resignation of members of the Supreme Court enabled him to appoint to that Court a majority who subscribe to his philosophy and thus accomplished his purpose. This is another reason why the third-term tradition should not have been violated. Now there is talk of a fourth and even a fifth term.

We have witnessed a Governor in the State of Michigan refuse to enforce the law of the land—repudiated by the electorate—and then appointed Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

We have witnessed the high standard of that Court diluted by the appointment of a professor who taught his bright boys—who later infested the Executive Department of our Government—how to make the law say what its makers never intended.

We have witnessed that Court, as it is today constituted, rule in favor of pressure groups and violence.

Associate Justice Roberts recently remarked, "The tendency to disregard precedents (speaking of the Court's decisions) has been so strong—as to leave courts below without any confidence that what was said today will hold good tomorrow."

We have witnessed the substitution of administrative bureaus for our courts of law and justice.

Our Government will never be any better or more secure than you and millions of others like you determine to make it. It will be as bad and corrupt as you and others like you permit it to be.

We, who are privileged to remain at home while millions of our citizens risk their lives in the armed forces, must recognize—that we are trustees for them, that we owe them the obligation to preserve American institutions and freedoms so that when they return, they do not find their substance wasted and their country materially and spiritually impoverished.

The businessmen and women who stay out of politics, who refuse to discharge their civic responsibility as citizens and who are reluctant to sacrifice their comforts, or who will not risk being smeared, are undeserving of the free institutions of which they are the beneficiaries.

We should make up our minds that it has to be either the citizen and his Government or dictatorship and its slaves. There can be no compromise. In their relentless drive for power, demagogues never compromise. With them, it's all or nothing.

The good citizens of this Nation cannot afford to be apathetic or cynical about our grave predicament. They must come out of their cellars of silent submission—into the open space of free political discussion.

This is where they belong and where they can best serve and save the greatest system of government ever conceived by man.

More Evidence of Huge Profiteering

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "More Evidence of Huge Profiteering," published in the Williams County (N. Dak.) Farmer's Press of March 30, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORE EVIDENCE OF HUGE PROFITEERING

Few issues are of more vital importance than taxes. The fairness with which they are levied and the effectiveness with which they are collected may make or break a nation.

As everyone familiar with the situation knows, our tax laws are full of loopholes through which wealthy individuals and corporations are escaping their fair share of the cost of government.

As between Congress and the executive department, we do not attempt to assess responsibility for this situation. Both must share the blame. That is abundantly demonstrated by shocking disclosures in two official reports made public recently.

According to Randolph E. Paul, general counsel of the Treasury, the tax laws provide a post-war windfall for business that may reach the staggering figure of forty-five and one-half billion dollars, even if the war ends this week. The total will be larger if the conflict extends beyond that period.

Before entering Government service, Paul accumulated a good-sized fortune as tax adviser to business concerns. He can't be accused of radicalism or prejudice against business.

Tax legislation enacted in 1940, Paul pointed out in a speech before a gathering of businessmen at New York, permits business to obtain a refund of taxes paid during the war to meet the cost of conversion to peace—"a subsidy in the guise of tax relief," is the way he describes it.

For 2 years after the shooting stops, if their factories do not turn a wheel, industrialists are assured of profits at least equal to their pre-war earnings. Paul fears they may get more by inflating their costs and losses.

For all its generosity, this provision does not satisfy certain business groups. They insist that wartime taxes be returned to them now and retained in their own treasuries. They plead they can lay nothing aside for post-war readjustment. Paul exploded that statement.

He pointed out that, after paying taxes and all other charges, corporation profits during 1943 and 1944 alone will be three times average profits, after taxes, during the period from 1936 to 1939, inclusive. Furthermore, he emphasized, these corporations—after paying taxes and dividends and greatly increasing the salaries of their officials—have already accumulated from their war profits more than twelve billions of undistributed profits.

If we add the tax refunds to the undistributed profits, we will find these big concerns will have a post-war nest egg of fifty-seven and one-half billion dollars—or 30 percent more than the entire national income during the last year of the Hoover administration.

Additional light on the fantastic profits of war contractors was furnished a few days ago by the Truman committee, which for 2 years has been investigating various phases of the war program.

The bulk of war business has been given to 100 corporations.

"Of these 100 corporations," the committee asserted, "only 9 have been found wholly free of excessive profit in 1942."

For the remainder, profits range all the way from 25 to 600 times normal peacetime profits. Concerns which before the war emergency were never out of the red, were able to pile up millions of profits in 1942 and even greater sums in 1943, the committee said.

The committee cites chapter and verse on the profits of various contractors. It tells of a New York aircraft corporation which had average peacetime profits of $32,493, but multiplied that figure 168 times in 1942, after paying taxes and dividends.

A small Pennsylvania airplane company which reported an average deficit of more than $70,000 between 1936 and 1939, had a profit of $11,400,000 in 1942; a cable-making concern in New York in 1942 increased its profits 25 times; an Ohio locomotive plant increased its profits 42 times; a Pennsylvania corporation increased its profits 10 times.

"The story could be extended endlessly," the committee said. "The illustrations given are not exceptional. They happen to have been taken at random from among the 100 corporations holding the largest volume of war contracts. For smaller companies the profit picture is equally as excessive."

Only occasionally, the committee declared, did a manufacturer bob up who placed his country's welfare above his pocketbook. One such is the United Aircraft Corporation of Connecticut, whose officials came to Washington and turned back $286,000,000 to the Government. They said they were ashamed to take the money.

"But, after making these refunds," the committee observes, "the company still had left after taxes in the year 1942 $17,000,000 of net profits, which was a little more than three times its average profit of $5,000,000 a year during the pre-war base period."

What becomes of President Roosevelt's promise that "a new crop of millionaires" would not come out of this war?

What becomes of the plea of certain leaders in House and Senate that we can't increase the taxes of the rich and that if we are to get additional revenue we must place new tax burdens on small incomes?

Fire Prevention Vital to War Effort

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. IVOR D. FENTON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include in the RECORD the following excellent address on Fire Prevention Vital to War Effort, as delivered at the Wartime Fire Protection Forum in Philadelphia, Pa., May 8, 1944, by Dr. David J. Price, president of the National Fire Prevention Association. It represents the thoughts of a nationally known expert in the field of fire and explosion prevention, and I believe is very timely to the war effort:

WARTIME FIRE PREVENTION

It is quite appropriate that the forty-eighth annual meeting of the National Fire Protection Association should be held in Philadelphia—the "cradle of liberty." At such a critical period in the history of our Nation, a wartime fire-prevention conference, therefore, is very essential and of utmost importance to our national welfare.

In this conference we are gathered together to consider and analyze the serious problem of fire-waste control in wartime. We believe that this meeting, like our war conferences in Chicago last year and in Atlantic City in 1942, will be recognized as a vital contribution to the war effort in providing to the members present and to a still larger group through our printed proceedings a clearer over-all picture of the problems and responsibilities that we are called upon to meet. There is no doubt at all in my mind that the knowledge gained here will enable all of us better to perform our important and varied war tasks.

The National Fire Protection Association has been established in the historic city of Boston since 1896 to promote the science and improve the methods of fire protection and fire prevention, to obtain and circulate information on these subjects, and to secure the cooperation of its members in establishing proper safeguards against loss of life and property by fire.

The importance of fire prevention in wartime is very apparent and should be definitely recognized by all agencies and individuals engaged in any capacity in this vital war effort. It is, therefore, a source of extreme gratification to the members of the National Fire Protection Association to direct national attention to the contribution made by our association to the development and application of measures for the effective prevention and control of fire and explosions that have such a vital effect on the war effort.

EXTENT OF FIRE LOSSES

All of us appreciate that we are in a period of sharply increasing fire losses. The fire loss in the United States for 1943 has been estimated at approximately $380,235,000—a loss of approximately $65,000,000 greater than the loss for the previous year. This means an approximate increase of about 21 percent in 1943 as compared with 1942. The fire losses in 1943 were at the rate of better than $1,000,000 a day. The dollar value, however, of fire losses in wartime is relatively meaningless. I wish somehow that we could devise a procedure that would carefully analyze and clearly show the indirect losses that accrue from a destructive fire in a plant producing war supplies. If we could but realize the effect of such a loss in terms of delay in delivery of goods to the war fronts, in terms of the possible danger to our soldiers and sailors, in terms of the precious man-hours of production lost, in terms of the difficulties in replacement of machinery and buildings—then we would more fully appreciate the dire effects of fire destruction on our war-production program.

LARGE-LOSS FIRES OF 1943

Some idea of the seriousness of our situation can be gained by a study of large loss fires in 1943 which will show very clearly that we have very much still to do. We have been concentrating valuable war supplies in buildings of inferior construction and excessive areas and we have failed to provide adequate fire protection in many places where such protection is of vital importance.

During 1943 there occurred in the United States and Canada a total of 105 large-loss fires, each of which resulted in a loss of $250,000 or more. There were hundreds of other fires resulting in smaller losses. This information is based upon reports received by the National Fire Protection Association, department of fire record and is not necessarily complete. Nine of these large-loss fires of $250,000 or more occurred in Canada.

This 1943 record—our second year of war—of 105 large-loss fires represents an increase of 25 fires, or 31 percent over the number reported in 1942. In this connection it should be very definitely noted that the 80 large-loss fires reported in 1942, the first year of war, was a 67-percent increase over 1941. An increase in 4 times the number of large-loss fires during the past 5 years as indicated as a matter worthy of utmost concern to a Nation at war.

$250,000 loss or more:	Fires
1939	28
1940	33
1941	48
1942	80
1943	105

Some of the factors responsible for these large-loss fires in 1943 include (1) structural factors, such as inferior construction, excessive areas, lack of sufficient exposure protection, and unprotected vertical openings; (2) occupancy factors, such as highly flammable contents, excessive amounts of burnable stocks, flammable liquids and gases, unsafe heating equipment, and of special importance in wartime—contents of unusually high value; (3) fire protective factors, such as lack of adequate private protection, lack of fire doors or cut-offs, and lack of adequate public fire protection; (4) fire fighting factors, such as difficulty of access to fire, poor fire-fighting methods, inadequately trained firemen and inexperience in fighting and handling fires; (5) delays in giving alarm, such as headway of fire when discovered, efforts made to extinguish fires without giving alarms, and confused watchmen; (6) water supplies, such as inadequate water supply, shortage of hydrants, and pump failures.

INCREASE IN INDUSTRIAL FIRE LOSSES

There has been a marked increase in industrial fires during the war period as compared with mercantile and residential fires. For instance, in 1941 the fire loss in industrial plants was estimated at approximately $88,000,000 while in 1942 it was more than $100,000,000 and went up to approximately $145,000,000 in 1943, an increase of 65 percent in 2 years. Many of these fires were in industrial plants producing vital war materials.

An analysis of industrial fires during the second year of this war made by the National Fire Protection Association shows that fires in the metal-working industry, lumber and mill-working plants, and foodstuff warehousing and manufacturing plants, predominated in 1943 in hindering our war effort. In the United States, 101 fires out of a total of 512 important wartime fires occurred in the processing and storage of agricultural products—approximately 20 percent of the total number of fires—with a loss of about $25,000,000.

In wartime when food is being rationed, we can ill afford to destroy valuable food and grain supplies by fires and explosions. Every fire that destroys war-production facilities, raw materials, finished products, foodstuffs, housing, and other essential property hampers the war effort.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR FIRES

The responsibility for these industrial plant fires usually cannot be assigned to any one place. They are usually due to a combination of different factors such as: lack of proper planning on the part of the management, acts of carelessness on the part of employees, lack of adequate fire-fighting facilities and personnel, and a variety of other factors, no one of which can be blamed exclusively in any individual fire. But underlying all the faults of omission and commission, however, is the fundamental lack of appreciation of the importance of fire safety. Of all the measures of fire protection, the most important and the one most commonly neglected is that of subdividing combustible materials so as to minimize the total possible destruction in any individual fire.

An increase in the number of fires is to be expected in wartime during a period of increased production. Most fires however can be prevented but some may occur despite all precautions and what is most important is to avoid conditions which will permit a small fire, whatever its cause, from assuming disastrous proportions.

The measures for fire prevention and fire protection that should be employed to prevent these disastrous fire losses are clearly outlined in standards of the National Fire Protection Association, and information on the important features of construction, protection, and organization of fire safety can be obtained for the asking from fire-protection authorities throughout the country.

WARTIME SERVICE OF NATIONAL FIRE PROTECTION ASSOCIATION

Since December 7, 1941, and in fact for a very considerable period prior to our actual entry into the war, the National Fire Protection Association has turned its efforts almost wholly toward activities that are of direct value in the successful prosecution of the war. Many special publications designed to meet conditions arising from the war have been developed and widely circulated.

Shortly after the outbreak of the war, the board of directors instructed the executive office staff to devote as much time and effort as seemed desirable to matters connected with the war effort and that order has been consistently followed to the fullest extent. The officers of this association feel that the principal function in wartime is to provide our members and others with every bit of useful information possible to further the war effort, and since the outbreak of war, the association has been pouring out material in greater volume than in any period in its history.

It has seemed to me that one of the major contributions that our association has made since the outbreak of the war has been in effectively publicizing the seriousness of the fire losses that have occurred through the series of picture bulletins on wartime fires, through two impressive and factual reports entitled "Fires in 1 Year of War" and "Fires in the Second Year of War," and through the records of fires published in the Quarterly and in the News Letters. This material has not alone been distributed to our membership but has been put in the hands of all of the important officials and important industrial leaders and this has all been accomplished in the face of increasing difficulty in securing factual reports because of the tendency in wartime to keep information about fires and explosions confidential and restricted.

We are glad that the Office of Censorship has not hampered in any way the publication of data that we could obtain but has seen the wisdom of permitting the National Fire Protection Association to publicize information about fire losses and fire causes for the benefit of all concerned. Our fire record department has labored under great difficulties to perform a service that has been truly valuable and I hope that all will recognize that there is only a constructive desire to be of service in the attempts of the association to secure and publish information about all important fires.

It has seemed to me that the association has been building all through the years to reach the place of usefulness it has attained in this war period. All of us can feel proud of the service rendered by the association and its members. All of us I feel recognize the great increase in the amount of useful material that the association has provided for its members and others and no member has, I feel, begrudged the policy of the association and its board of directors in turning the activities of the staff and the membership generally into an all-out effort to be of service in the successful prosecution of the war. We have not insofar as I am aware declined to provide information and assistance requested of us by any Federal, State, provincial, or local government agency or by any war industry in spite of the fact that such requests have multiplied enormously in the last 2 or 3 years. Our association is stronger in prestige and usefulness right now than ever before in its history.

I wish that there might be time to recount to you in some measuure the many and varied contributions to the war effort made by the members of our association. It would indeed be a most satisfactory record of constructive accomplishment. Most of our members have been informed through the News Letters and otherwise of the many and varied activities of our headquarters staff. Perhaps because I am in Washington, I appreciate more fully than many of our members the amount of time and effort put in by the staff in assisting various Federal agencies in Washington since the beginning of the war. Our staff has really made a contribution of which we can all be proud.

LONG-RANGE PLANNING POST-WAR ACTIVITIES

In my presidential address last year in Chicago I indicated the prominent part our association could take in post-war planning in fire-prevention matters and the recommendation was made at that time that the National Fire Protection Association take leadership in this matter by setting up a committee to deal with this subject. A little later in our session you will hear the first report of our special committee on long-range planning for fire protection. The tremendous gains in fire prevention which have been brought about because of wartime necessity must be conserved; there must be no relaxation in our constant fight to save lives and to minimize destruction of property.

FARM AND RURAL FIRE PREVENTION

Let us consider a field for our activities in which I have long been personally intensely interested—that of fire prevention and control in farm and rural areas. We have only scratched the surface in what might be done to make our farms and our large rural areas, that do not have the benefit of competent and fully paid fire departments, safe against fire destruction. Great opportunities lie before our association to see that proper protection is provided to all places throughout the country. The enormous amount of fire protection equipment built for war purposes must be utilized to the fullest extent and in the most efficient manner after the war is over. When we consider the large amount of rural area now unprotected from the hazards of fire, a very important post-war service could be rendered by the development of a plan for allocating to these unprotected rural areas any war emergency fire-fighting equipment and appliances which may be available after the war. It seems to me that one of the greatest opportunities for constructive effort that we have before us lies in the expansion of our work into rural areas where at the present time the annual fire losses total more than 60 percent of the entire fire loss of the United States.

MEMBERSHIP GROWTH

The increased membership growth is indeed a source of extreme gratification and other reports that you will hear later in this evening's session and in other sessions of our meeting will emphasize the remarkable growth in the association's membership and in its services. It is perhaps enough for me to say here that when I became president of the association 2 years ago we had approximately 6,000 members, whereas today we have close to 9,000. Two years ago our volunteer firemen's section was made up of less than 15,000 members from 750 fire departments; today we have approximately 17,500 members of the section from 1,050 departments. Such growth cannot be undeserved. It is a reflection of the ability of our association to provide useful and constructive service.

The remarkable growth in membership is in my opinion very largely due to the well organized activities of our extremely faithful and hard-working chairman of the membership committee, H. E. C. Rainey, of Washington, D. C. The association owes him a very great debt of gratitude for his untiring efforts and faithful service.

I can foresee great opportunities for us to expand our influence and service throughout the work in the post-war period and I believe that we will see a great growth in our membership in all parts of the world. There is no other association in any other country so well equipped to perform a world-wide service in the interest of fire-waste control.

PROGRAM FOR WARTIME CONFERENCE

The program for this wartime fire conference will cover the latest information on current developments in the fire field, and will offer opportunity for discussion and interchange of information on wartime fire-protection problems. Certain of the sessions will be restricted to identified members and representatives of the armed forces in order to permit the discussion of confidential information.

A special session has been planned to enable speakers representing military and other Government agencies to present latest information on Government policy in fire-protection matters. Another feature of this conference will be a special session for industrial plant fire chiefs.

A general forum session has been provided during which the Committee on Long Range Planning for Fire Protection will present its report and there will be a general discussion of post-war planning.

Another War Industry Fire Protection Clinic following the pattern established at the conference last year will be conducted and a special session has been provided for the volunteer firemen's section. All committee reports included in the program for this conference will be largely limited to those having definite application to the war effort.

This conference will prove to be a very important historical meeting vitally affecting the present and future welfare of our country. The National Fire Protection Association has accepted its full responsibility for service during this critical war-emergency period. The association will continue this service and definitely plan for our future welfare to make this world a proper place for future generations to live. We therefore pledge our faithful support and cooperation to our national government and go forward to still greater achievements for the benefit of our national welfare.

Hugh D. Hart's Plan for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BROOKS HAYS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, recently Mr. Hugh D. Hart, of Monmouth, Ill., prepared an outline for "a simple plan for the maintenance of world peace" which contains some interesting and constructive suggestions.

Mr. Hart is a well-known life insurance executive. He is a native of Arkansas, where he served under the administration of two Governors as chairman of the State commission of charities and corrections. He was a delegate to five international Rotary conventions. He holds an honorary degree from the University of Vermont, and is the author of several books, including The Mature Person, Life Insurance as a Life Work, and Lincoln—the Man of the Ages. Under leave to extend my remarks I include his statement and the plan:

FOREWORD

Secretary Hull said in a radio broadcast to the Nation not long ago, that the State Department had been aided in its post-war planning by suggestions that had come to it from people who were thinking constructively of the problems that will follow in the wake of the war. That is the true way of democracy. American citizens generally should ponder the vital problems which will require solution in time of peace and, in frankness and sincerity, make suggestions to their leaders.

It is in this spirit and with due humility that I submit A Simple Plan for the Maintenance of World Peace.

HUGH D. HART.

THE PROPOSED PLAN

ARTICLE I

The United States, Great Britain, Russia, and China are to become founding members of the International Peace Association.

ARTICLE II

The founding members are to select from among the other nations two other types of members, namely, adhering members and consulting members.

ARTICLE III

Each nation joining the International Peace Association shall have five permanent delegates. This applies to founding members, adhering members, and consulting members.

ARTICLE IV

Only the founding members and the adhering members shall have the right to vote. The consulting members shall have the right to advise but not to vote.

ARTICLE V

It is the intention of the International Peace Association to establish and maintain peace throughout the entire world. Inasmuch as the greatest responsibilty for attaining this objective has rested and must continue to rest with the four nations comprising the founding members, they shall constitute the executive committee of the International Peace Association, with full power to vote on any issue involving, directly or indirectly, the peace in any part of the world.

The adhering members shall, likewise, be entitled to vote on such issues. The majority vote of the adhering members shall have coequal force and effect with the vote of each of the founding members. Thus, five major votes are to count upon each issue before the International Peace Association, as follows:

(a) The four votes of the founding members, plus—

(b) The one vote determined by a majority of the adhering members—all five votes to be coequal in effect.

Thus, three out of the five votes will determine the recommended policy of the International Peace Association.

ARTICLE VI

When the recommended policy has thus been determined, each nation shall be consulted by its accredited International Peace Association delegates for decision as to whether it desires to participate in the recommended policy. Any nation deciding not to approve, adopt, or participate in the recommended policy of the International Peace Association shall be free to disapprove, reject, or decline to participate in such recommended policy.

ARTICLE VII

The Axis Powers shall be admitted as consulting members, without the right of voting but with full right to be heard on any issue before the International Peace Association.

ARTICLE VIII

The International Peace Association shall sit continuously in the pursuance of its duties.

ARTICLE IX

The Executive Committee shall establish the rules governing procedure of the International Peace Association. In cases of emergency it shall be empowered to fix time limits within which votes shall be taken. It may also establish the rules granting withdrawals and acceptances of memberships, or changes of status of memberships.

ARTICLE X

Each nation's voting delegation of five shall be bound by a majority vote within the delegation.

ADVANTAGES OF THE INTERNATIONAL PEACE ASSOCIATION PLAN

1. It provides a continuing international peace organization.

2. No military alliance has ever preserved the peace for any extended period of time. The International Peace Association plan furnishes an organization to analyze issues and to recommend measures, policies, and remedies relating to the preservation of peace. Such recommendations would involve no coercion, legal commitment, or obligation by or upon any of the member powers, but would have the force found in concerted international recommendation by a body of specialists whose only function is to study the problems of peace in collaboration with all other national representatives comprising the International Peace Association and to make recommendations. It is believed that the prestige of the International Peace Association would grow as it dug deeper and deeper into the factors of war remedy and war prevention, and gave sound recommendations to the policy makers of the respective member powers.

3. The International Peace Association would be not only a fact-finding body, but also a policy recommending organization. It would not be charged with implementing its recommendations. This function would be retained by the respective sovereignties that might voluntarily decide to approve or adopt such recommendations.

4. Treaties have not served to maintain peace. Treaties are usually static. While entered into under certain conditions, yet the execution of their commitments often must take place under far different conditions. Hardly a nation in the entire galaxy of powers, great or small, has failed to violate one or more peace treaties or treaties of mutual defense into which they had solemnly entered. On more than one occasion, even the United States has done so. Peace can be maintained only by voluntary cooperative action of the powers at the time of threat to peace and in the light of all the facts and conditions prevailing at that time. This continuously sitting body would be prepared to make its recommendations on an up-to-the-minute basis, and in the light of all the facts and conditions prevailing at the time.

5. This plan preserves the complete sovereignty of all its members. No nation would need fear to become a member, as no part of its sovereign right to decide questions of vital national or international interest would be finally reposed in the body. For example, in case the International Peace Association should consider armed attack necessary to prevent or stop aggression in some part of the world, it would promptly make that recommendation; then each nation would consider the weight of the recommendation and act according to its judgment and through its constitutional methods, or by such processes of authority as comprise its normal governmental way of arriving at decisions as to policy.

It might be objected that since the final decision in each instance rests with the sovereign government anyway, there is no reason to have the International Peace Association as additional machinery. Why not let the departments of state or foreign offices of the various powers handle these questions affecting peace, as they have heretofore? There are several sound answer to these arguments:

1. The overwhelming answer that this method has prevailed for a thousand years and has not prevented war.

2. Foreign offices are concerned with a multiplicity of duties and responsibilities having no relationship to peace, hence the maintenance of peace is a mere sideline with them, whereas the International Peace Association would have only one concern, namely, the maintenance of peace. Hence, the International Peace Association would attain greater competence in mastering the problems and solutions of peace than foreign offices, hedged in as they are by innumerable political, administrative, and diplomatic duties, having little, if any, relationship to the issues of peace and war.

3. No single foreign office of any power, great or small, could have the prestige of a coordinated body, internationally composed, which devotes its entire efforts to the questions of peace preservation. The prestige of its recommendations would be world-wide in scope, and almost overwhelming in weight.

4. Foreign offices operate through the cumbersome, intricate, and devious processes of diplomacy. Those processes are too slow and too weighted down with tradition to meet the peace needs of a modern world in which an armada of war planes may swoop down anywhere in a few hours in a devastating attack. Decisions must be reached promptly. The International Peace Association would help the foreign offices to make their decisions quickly and soundly by making recommendations based on information, which, because of the association's constant study of trends, conditions, and developments bearing on the issues of peace or war, would be up to the minute.

The foreign offices would have the spotlight of world scrutiny thrown upon them by the recommendations of the International Peace Association, which means that world public opinion would be focused on the various nations following a recommendation by the International Peace Association, and this would tend to inspire more prompt, more efficient, and more upright action than would be possible under the old methods of secret diplomacy.

5. Foreign offices cannot always confer in times of crisis, as witness the futile efforts of Sir Edward Grey, in the crisis of 1914, to engage in effective negotiations with the German policy makers, and also the refusal of the Nazi authorities to confer with Poland in the hectic days preceding the invasion of the latter country, in World War No. 2. The International Peace Association would always be in session, thus obviating this problem.

6. This plan provides a method for marshaling the world's attention and opinion upon the issues affecting peace and war. Public opinion, in the last analysis, is the most potent force among the nations, but heretofore it has lacked a proper instrumentality for its crystallization and dissemination.

7. The International Peace Association would provide the powers with the machinery for reaching voluntary agreements concerning sanctions, strategy, military movements, international police measures, and other drastic war preventatives at the time required and on a temporary basis, without the necessity of entering into dangerous alliances, long-term peace or mutual-defense treaties, or other commitments which might prove embarrassing in the light of possible unforeseen historic developments. It also would enable the major powers to marshal, by persuasion and discussion, the good will and cooperation of many or all of the adhering members and perhaps to restrain, by such peaceful methods, the consulting members.

8. The International Peace Association would constitute a great watchtower of peace, manned by the highest type representatives of the various member nations, and throwing great searchlights of publicity, understanding, reason, common sense, and moral appeals into every corner of every mind. It might, upon occasion, cast the red glare of deadly warning also, where aggression might seem to be again about to raise its sinister head.

The preservation of peace requires such a central instrumentality to mobilize the moral factors for peace at all times and under all conditions, and to keep them mobilized.

9. The International Peace Association would be a powerful restraining force in preventing well-intentioned, as well as evil-intentioned nations, from committing international blunders which might throw the world into the turmoil of war. For example, it is inconceivable that the Munich Pact could have received the approbation of this International Peace Association, had it been in existence. Certainly three of the proposed founding powers (Russia, the United States, and China) would have voted against it, and it is highly probable that the majority of the adhering nations would have given a vote against it, led by Czechoslovakia and Poland, and other small nations directly or indirectly to be vitally and adversely affected by the proposed appeasement of the dictators. Thus, Chamberlain and his government would likely have faced an adverse vote of four out of five possible votes by the International Peace Association. It is very doubtful if Chamberlain would have entered the appeasement betrayal plan in the face of such serious mobilized opposition on the part of a body constituted as is proposed under this plan; and, if he had defied its adverse recommendation, his government would likely have fallen.

10. The voting plan and general method of organization would give preponderant weight to the four great powers that chiefly won the war, the founding nations. And yet it would not grant them power to bind any of the other nations—or each other—to any course of action. All action would be voluntary on the part of any member nation, of whatever class, as has above been stressed. But in the powerful moral act of voting recommendations for action, there would be a proper balance between the four great nations on whom has rested primarily the burden of winning the war and who must chiefly bear the future responsibility of maintaining the peace. It is proper that their votes should each carry more weight in proposing recommendations than that of any of the adhering powers. Small nations that must cry for help from big nations in times of war when they are assailed, may not expect to exercise equal influence on world policy with these big nations during times of peace.

It must be borne in mind that the four founding nations are strong enough to arrange a four-power alliance that would entirely leave out of consideration the adhering nations and the consulting nations. The International Peace Association is designed to avoid either dominance by coercion or entire disregard of the other and weaker nations. Under this plan, even the defeated Axis Powers would be admitted as consulting members if they chose to join. Their point of view would certainly be valuable, even though it might not coincide with the more enlightened attitude of the peace-loving powers.

11. The plan has flexibility. Note, for example, article IX.

12. All previous peace plans have measurably failed, due primarily to causes not inherent in this plan. Among these causes of failure of previous peace plans are the following:

(a) Commitments to go to war were imposed.

(b) Commitments not to go to war were imposed.

(c) National sovereignty was delegated to others or shared with other sovereignties or with external instrumentalities.

(d) Dependence was placed on the binding force of treaties, which frequently have been broken.

(e) Future commitments were made, based on conditions which were prevalent at the time they were entered into, but which frequently were radically different at the time the commitments were due to be executed.

(f) Lack of continuing machinery for exploring means of maintaining peace.

(g) Mutual suspicion generated by fear of embarrassment through commitments entered into by signatory powers.

(h) Long range agreements impregnated with serious contingencies or liabilities.

(i) Lack of the principle of voluntary, independent decision at all times by each nation.

(j) Sacrifice of national pride or even of national sovereignty.

(k) Contingent threats of punishment inhered in the arrangement.

(l) Lack of force to back up decisions, or unwillingness to use force for that purpose.

(m) Coercion within the framework of the plan by one or more powers upon others.

I submit that not one of the above factors which have defeated all previous peace plans is contained in this International Peace Association plan. It might be objected that (l) above—"Lack of force to back up decisions, or unwillingness to use force for that purpose"—is inherent in this plan and that it constitutes a weakness fatal to its success, as was true of the ill-fated League of Nations.

The answer is that this plan does not embrace the making of any decisions by the International Peace Association except decisions as to what to recommend to the member nations. Therefore no force would be required by the International Peace Association itself. The member nations would have adequate force with which to implement any of its recommendations. This is particularly true of the founding nations. They will possess the strongest land armies, the mightiest air armadas, the most powerful fleets—in fact, the greatest combination of resources of all kinds that ever existed in the world before. It is for the nations themselves to decide whether to use their force when and if the International Peace Association should recommend its use in a given situation to preserve peace.

It is, of course, not possible to prophesy definitely whether they would, or would not, do so. We believe, however, that the probability is in favor of such action. Having already expended so much blood and treasure to win the war, they would hardly refrain from employing a comparatively small additional fraction of their blood and treasure to avert another devastating war.

LIMITATIONS OF PEACE PLANS

One of the great dangers attaching to any proposed peace plan is that its proponents may lead the people to expect too much of it.

It is too much in the light of long and tragic historic examples, to expect nations always to keep their treaties, where peace and war are involved. There are some notable exceptions, it is true, but we cannot expect to maintain peace by dependence upon such exceptions.

We cannot maintain peace by military alliances.

We cannot maintain peace by a "balance of power" arrangement.

We cannot maintain peace by arbitration.

All these have failed in the past.

Perhaps you will be tempted to say simply, "Peace cannot be maintained by any method whatsoever." That may or may not be true—but the hope for peace must never be allowed to die in human hearts, and the striving for it must be an eternal quest.

All that can be expected of any peace plan is to provide an organization through which nations may do the following things:

(a) Join together in good faith, constantly to seek the attainment of world peace.

(b) Consult continuously to avoid war.

(c) Endorse and recommend to the various sovereignties a course of action, at the proper time and on time, by which the peace may be preserved.

(d) Respect each other's right of decision, without coercion and without encroachment upon their individual sovereignty.

(e) Constantly cultivate and create, through this instrumentality, good will between the different peoples, and thereby stimulate among the nations the will to prevent war.

(f) Bring the pressure of moral suasion to bear to enforce and preserve peace, but failing in this, powerfully to urge the necessity for warlike measures, if, as a last resort, armed force must be used to avert aggression.

(g) Operate actively a preventive policy, designed to keep wars from starting, rather than waiting until after war has begun, to stamp it out.

This is about all any peace plan can do. Nations cannot be forced to keep their treaties at all time and under all conditions, to maintain good relations with their neighbors, or to exercise good faith and idealism in all their dealings.

The League of Nations failed by reason of several defects not present in this plan. One of those defects was that the United States was not a member. Another is found in the treaty liability imposed by the League of Nations plan. There is no treaty liability or any other immediate or future liability under this International Peace Association plan. Another defect was the lack of any international unity and "will to peace," such as now prevails among the more powerful and enlightened nations. Even the League of Nations would have a better chance of succeeding today than following the First World War.

Any plan, to succeed, must have the backing of the United States, as well as of Russia, Great Britain, and China, and preferably of the remainder of the United Nations group. None of them should sponsor an arrangement based on a long-range military-alliance principle, on the balance-of-power principle, or on treaty war commitments of any kind. Certainly no undertaking should be entered upon which imposes a surrender of individual sovereignty by any country involved.

The only sort of plan that has a ghost of a chance of working out in practice is one such as we have outlined, which would depend entirely on voluntary action by the respective nations, founded on sensible practical recommendations, deliberately and reasonably arrived at by a body whose only function would be to advise the nations of the world how they might best maintain the peace.

Every country is eventually going to act according to what it considers its own best interests, no matter what sort of pact or plan it may have entered into, and no matter what its commitments may be.

Every country is bound to respect the findings, endorsements, and recommendations of a body international in character, which would constantly be studying practical ways to preserve peace. This body would come to know more about the prevention of war than any other organized group in history. It would receive the approbation of the majority of the human family, and the enthusiastic support of enlightened public sentiment in almost every nation in the world.

It would provide intelligent moral suasion for peace, backed up by a group of the most powerful countries on the globe, who would use force, if need be, to avert war, provided they might act voluntarily in each case, in the light of the current circumstances. The International Peace Association would provide the necessary facts and considered reasoning on which the several sovereignties might intelligently arrive at their decisions as to policies in any given instance.

Status of Pretheological Students in the Draft

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I should like to invite the attention of the Senate to an issue which has come to me from numerous sources during the past 3 weeks. I refer to the status of pretheological students. I am advised that national headquarters of Selective Service is currently giving study to this problem. They are now at work on a statement setting forth the historical background and the current status of deferments and exemptions as covered by section 5 (d) and other provisions of the Selective Service Act. Whether it is a matter which can be adjusted fairly and equitably by administrative action, or whether legislation will be necessary, apparently awaits the outcome of the present study.

In this connection I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial How Essential Is the Church? which appeared in the May 10, 1944, issue of the Christian-Evangelist, of which Dr. Raphael Harwood Miller, formerly pastor of the National City Christian Church, of Washington, D. C., is editor.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW ESSENTIAL IS THE CHURCH?

We get a little tired of repeated Government statements about the importance of religion and the essentiality of the church, accompanied by flagrant disregard of the interests and well-being of the church.

The Nation at war has called upon the church for "the greatest provision in history for spiritual ministry" to the men in the armed forces, and the church has responded with men and money even to the sacrifice of its work at home.

The church had men prepared to meet the exacting requirements for the chaplaincy—4 years of college, 3 years in seminary, and other years of experience in pulpit and pastoral service.

The appeal for more chaplains is a testimony to their essential place with the Nation's forces, and the church will pay the price to provide them.

On April 13, General Hershey, under a directive to draft all of draft age except those in "essential occupations," at the same time, canceled deferments for all pretheological students.

This order seriously affects the future supply of ministers for Protestant churches.

The Catholic Church may not be affected to the same extent. If it is, Government will hear a protest to which it will give heed.

Youth for the priesthood take their whole training in Catholic schools and can therefore be listed as theological students, even at the youngest draft age. But Protestant boys intending to enter the ministry take their pretheological work in public high schools and in liberal arts colleges. It is more difficult to register intended ministers as theological students.

Various Protestant communions have sent protests to General Hershey against what they consider an arbitrary discrimination against the church.

At its meeting April 17 the board of higher education, Disciples of Christ, expressed grave concern over the intention of selective service to cancel deferments for pretheological students.

The United Lutheran Church in America wrote to General Hershey, "As a church we express our unalterable position and vigorous protest against this action which will rob our country of this future Protestant leadership, particularly since the number involved, approximately 1,750 men for the country as a whole, is utterly insignificant as compared with the total Military Establishment."

The cancelation of deferments for pretheological students will close every Protestant theological seminary in the country within 3 years. The result will be disabling to religious life in America.

The protest of church leaders against the ruling was not because of desire to spare the minister or the church the sacrifices which all are called upon to make while the Nation is at war. It is just because the church knows what will be expected of it in the reconstruction period that it now petitions Government not to prevent the preparation of a limited number of ministers to be ready for the hour of the great demand.

Are not spiritual leaders as essential to the life of the Nation as are physicians and engineers?

Yes; war is hell. But a hell deeper and more awful than war will follow unless provision is made now to conserve and increase the moral and spiritual forces to recover the Nation and the world from the demoralization which threatens to engulf civilization even though a military victory be won.

Where are the ministers and missionaries and teachers for religious schools to come from if the supply is shut off at the source?

Either the Government should cease to classify the church as "essential" or act in harmony with its own declarations and remove unnecessary barriers from the church's power to serve.

The Montgomery Ward Case—A Sordid Story

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address delivered by me over the Columbia Broadcasting System's Network, May 9, 1944, from Washington, D. C.:

On December 8, 1941—the day after Pearl Harbor—the Congress of the United States recognized the existence of a state of war—a war thrust upon the American people by a treacherous sneak attack. In that resolution, which bespoke the unity and the determination and the sacrificial spirit of an outraged people, Congress told the world that, "to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States."

This resolution did not pledge to our war effort all the resources of the country except those of Mr. Sewell Avery. The declaration of war did not exempt Montgomery Ward and Co. Today, by his contemptuous defiance of the National War Labor Board and the Commander in Chief, Mr. Sewell Avery has raised a fundamental issue. That issue is today before the courts, before the Congress and before the American people. Insofar as legal questions may be involved, they will be and should be settled by the judicial department of our Government. Attorney General Biddle has voluntarily submitted the Government's case for impartial adjudication in the United States District Court. Insofar as legislative policy may be involved, that policy will be and should be settled by the Congress of the United States. Insofar as issues of public sentiment are involved, those issues will be tried in the forum of free discussion.

The fundamental issue is whether the United States of America or Mr. Sewell Avery shall be supreme in time of war.

The National War Labor Board was set up to prevent those interruptions to the war effort which might follow if labor disputes were not finally and authoritatively disposed of by an impartial tribunal. The National War Labor Board derives its powers from a law enacted by this Congress. It was not the creation of executive whim. That law requires the National War Labor Board to assume jurisdiction over any labor dispute whenever the United States Conciliation Service shall certify that such a dispute may lead to substantial interference with the war effort. The Board is required to conduct a hearing on the merits of the dispute and—here I quote from the language of the statute—to "decide the dispute and provide by order the wages and hours and all other terms and conditions * * * governing the relations between the parties, which shall be in effect until further order of the Board." This Board is composed of outstanding Americans, four representing public, four representing industry, and four representing labor. It has settled 7,000 disputes, and has sent only 15 cases of noncompliance to the President, of which 2 involved Mr. Sewell Avery.

On January 13 the National War Labor Board ordered Montgomery Ward & Co. and its employees to continue for a temporary period the collective-bargaining agreement under which they were operating so that the National Labor Relations Board might conduct an election to determine whether the contracting labor organization represented a majority of the employees of the company. Six members sat in the case. The two public members, the two labor members, and one of the two industry members concurred in the decision.

Let me make it clear to you that this order merely preserved the status quo. It imposed no new terms or conditions of employment. The National War Labor Board simply instructed the company and the union to continue their old contract on a temporary basis until an election could be held. Certainly there is nothing novel, unusual, or unfair about such an order. It is the Board's standard procedure.

Over a period of almost 3 months Mr. Avery refused to comply with the Board's order. On April 5 the Board once more ordered Montgomery Ward to renew the old agreement. This order was unanimous. All our industry members joined in it. The company's answer was again to defy the Board's order. On April 12 the Board unanimously referred the case to the President for appropriate action. On the same day the employees went out on strike.

On April 23 the President sent identical telegrams to Mr. Avery and to Mr. Wolchock, president of the union. The President ordered the union to call off the strike and ordered the company to comply with the directive of the War Labor Board. The union complied. Mr. Avery, on the contrary, answered the President with an insulting and defiant telegram which was blazoned throughout the Nation's press in paid newspaper advertisements.

The President then had no alternative but to enforce the law. The Constitution of the United States, which the President is sworn to protect and defend, laid upon him a solemn obligation to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

The President could not shirk his duty. If he did not enforce the law against Mr. Avery, then he would have broken faith with millions of employers and employees who had faithfully complied with the orders of the National War Labor Board. Any other course would have encouraged all recalcitrant employers and employees to defy the Board's orders.

The President was obliged to act—and he did act. On April 25, the President ordered Hon. Jesse Jones to take possession of the properties of Montgomery Ward & Co. in Chicago in order to prevent interference with the war effort.

The Under Secretary of Commerce handed to Mr. Avery a certified copy of the President's order. Mr. Avery's reply was a sneering defiance. The Under Secretary them summoned a number of deputy United States marshals. Mr. Avery once more refused to recognize the Government's authority. Pursuant to the President's order, and having no alternative but to impress upon Mr. Avery the authority of the Government, the Under Secretary then requested the assistance of soldiers to obtain possession of the property. On the morning of April 27, Mr. Avery defiantly appeared at his office and instructed all his subordinates to conduct a sit-down strike against the Government. Mr. Avery was asked to leave, but replied that only force could remove him. Having exhausted all other means to secure recognition of the Government's power and enforcement of the President's order, the Under Secretary then directed two soldiers to remove Mr. Avery from the premises.

Immediately, in order to secure a determination of the Government's legal position, the Attorney General voluntarily filed an action in the United States district court. A temporary injunction was issued to prevent Mr. Avery from interfering with the Government's possession of the premises, and tomorrow the district court will render its final decision. Meanwhile the National War Labor Board has ordered an election among the employees, which took place today, and soldiers have been withdrawn from the premises.

In this Montgomery Ward case, the President acted in precisely the same manner as he had acted when John L. Lewis defied the War Labor Board. But, when the mines were seized, Lewis recognized the law and called off his strike, but Mr. Avery in this similar situation cursed our Government and immediately ordered a sit-down strike.

Certainly this is a sordid story. It is enough to make every citizen feel a humiliation that the head of a vast commercial enterprise would thus, on the eve of unprecedented military operations, defy his Government and raise the standard of discord. Strangely, however, those who are determined to court martial the Commander in Chief have sought to make of this sneering outlaw a national hero. Mr. Avery has flown the skull and crossbones from the flagpole of Montgomery Ward. If Hitler and Tojo had been able to place a paid agent at the head of Montgomery Ward, he would have duplicated Avery's conduct in every detail. The President, by upholding the supremacy of the law and enforcing the order of the National War Labor Board, has run down the pirate's flag and run up the American flag. I do not believe that the loyal citizens of America, once the truth has been presented to them, will ever be fooled into believing that Mr. Avery's disloyal defiance of his Government is an act of patriotism. Of course, I do not assert that all those who defend Mr. Avery are disloyal; but I do assert that all those who are disloyal will defend and applaud him.

What argument have these advocates of dissension used to justify Mr. Avery's amazing conduct?

They have but a single argument. Montgomery Ward & Co., they say, is not in this war. The President's critics contend that, because this vast enterprise is engaged primarily in distribution rather than manufacture, it is not subject to the Government's authority.

Montgomery Ward & Co. is not a corner grocery. In 1943 it did more than $600,000,000 worth of business. It has more than 600 stores and establishments, located in every State of the Union. It employs more than 70,000 people. It owns four factories which make farm supplies and machinery, carburetors, propellers, and gun mounts. War Food Administrator Marvin Jones has stated, under sworn affidavit, that Montgomery Ward & Co. distributes supplies in every State of the Union which are vitally necessary for the production of critical foodstuffs. Officials of the War Production Board have sworn to the fact that Montgomery Ward & Co. has in thousands of cases been granted priorities and preference ratings for the distribution of essential goods. The company has received certificates of war necessity for large numbers of trucks, which are now operating for them in the 48 States. The company has contracts with the Government for the supply of essential items to the Navy and to our allies under lease-lend. Its headquarters in Chicago are located in the very center of a vast industrial region. It supplies thousands of war workers with civilian goods which are necessary for the maintenance of their productivity.

To compare this vast Nation-wide enterprise with the corner grocery and the corner filling station is so manifestly absurd as to convict of pure hypocrisy those who make the analogy. This is the smoke screen which has always been used by those interests which sought to exempt themselves from regulations imposed by Congress in the public interest. Our constitutional history is replete with distinctions drawn by the courts between enterprises of national importance and those activities which are purely local concern In every case where the Congress has sought to regulate the activities of enterprises which affect the national welfare, pleaders for special privilege have sought to shield themselves behind the corner merchant and the filling station.

I can vouch a special interest in the problems of small business in America. Ever since I have been a Member of Congress, I have fought the battle of the little merchant and the corner store. I am a coauthor of the Robinson-Patman Act—the golden rule in business law—which is designed to protect the right of the small merchant to stay in business.

Incidentally, Montgomery Ward has been five times adjudged a violator of this law by the Federal Trade Commission. It has also been found guilty of disseminating false and misleading advertisements.

I am now chairman of a Special Small Business Committee set up by the House of Representatives in order to protect the little man from extinction during this war and during the period of reconversion which is to follow. Over all these years I have fought the battle primarily to protect little business against the ruthless encroachments of the national chain stores and the mail-order houses. Mr. Avery and his pernicious gang have a lobbying record that has never been paralleled in the history of this country in trying to destroy independent merchants and independent business generally before the legislatures of the 48 States and before the Congress of the United States. They have resorted to the cruelest methods imaginable, which were unfair, unethical, and illegal to ruthlessly strangle their weaker competitors. This record of Mr. Sewell Avery represents one of the slimiest trails that ever crossed the page of time. Had this effort been successful, there would have been today no corner store in which Mr. Avery could hide under the counter.

Now, then Mr. Sewell Avery, the head of a vast mail-order house, defies his Government and his Commander in Chief in time of war; he hides under the counter of the corner grocer and the small merchant to shield himself against the authority of his Nation.

We are now poised for a gigantic military offensive. There are 10,000,000 vacant chairs in the homes of America. Millions of American soldiers, sailors, and airmen, after months and years of rigorous training, are straining to go. Before many days have passed they will launch a terrific and destructive assault against the last bastions of Nazi tyranny. These boys have submerged every interest in life and every personal gain. They are ready to sacrifice themselves without questions, without stint or limit in order that our free way of life might survive. Their courage and their skill have brought pride into the hearts of our citizens at home. It is shameful and humiliating that in return for the example of self-sacrifice which they have set, Mr. Sewell Avery has sent to them a message of disunity and arrogant self-aggrandizement.

Our Commander in Chief, by his courageous and decisive action, has sent back to the far-flung battle fronts of the earth a message that the law is still supreme and the authority of the Nation is still paramount. To send a different answer, or to impair the effectiveness of the answer which the Commander in Chief has already sent, would be an act of cowardice and betrayal.

Our boys have struck terror into the hearts of the enemy. General Eisenhower has said, "Tell the American people to stick together." Here at home, let no act of disunity or discord permit Mr. Sewell Avery to give Hitler or Tojo a ray of hope.

My Country

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, often have I been accused of disloyalty because, while agreeing that we should be friendly and cooperate with other nations, I have insisted that, when the issue was as to whether, in dealing with other nations, we should sacrifice our sovereignty, become a part of a united states of the world, the interests of my country, the protection of my country, should be given preference.

As the days go by, it is becoming clear that Stalin does not intend to sacrifice the interests or the sovereignty of Russia by any present or post-war agreement with other nations.

Churchill has many times stated it to be his unalterable purpose, not only to preserve the economic and territorial interests of the British Empire, but to expand that Empire at every opportunity.

While here at home an attempt has been made to attach a sinister meaning to the term "isolationist," Churchill and the dominion premiers, who recently met with him to reassert the policy of the British Empire, announced to all the world that Great Britain intended to think first of the Empire and its dominions; that it, as to the rest of the world, was an isolationist nation.

An editorial from the May 5, 1944, issue of the Chicago Daily Tribune clearly states the case. That editorial reads as follows:

ON ISOLATIONISM

The meeting of the dominion premiers with Mr. Churchill in London invites a reexamination by Americans of the term isolationism.

Obviously a nation can achieve isolation in either of two ways. It can, by its own will, hold itself aloof from foreign commitments; or the nations with which it might cooperate can refuse to play ball. A nation that is thrust aside is no less isolated than one which declines to entangle itself.

Now it is a curious fact that those American citizens who profess to be most alarmed over isolation by our own choice are not disturbed at the prospect of this country's isolation through the actions of others. This is a curious fact, but by no means an inexplicable one. The people in this country who use isolationism as a term of reproach are, generally speaking, people who prefer another country to their own, as is shown by their desire to use the men and wealth of this country for the aggrandizement of the nations they so greatly admire. The objection of these Americans to isolationism sprang from the conviction that England, or Russia, had need of us. Of course, if England or Russia or both of them together decide to make other arrangements, those Americans whose opinions are guided by the desires of London or Moscow will accept American isolationism without serious protest.

And that is what appears to be happening. The American opponents of isolationism call their policy cooperation, but they have never thought of it as a two-way street. Thus they have not been disturbed by Mr. Churchill's recent announcement that the British islands off our shores are to remain British despite any desire that Americans may have to enhance our national security. Likewise our cooperationists have not been upset by the reports from the commonwealth conference in London. Nothing else was expected.

To these minds Premier Curtin, of Australia had a right to be as grudging as he was in acknowledging the debt of his country to the American soldiers and sailors (and taxpayers) who have saved it from a Japanese invasion. Your American cooperationist regards this as a normal, natural, and wholesome attitude toward America. Americans, it appears, have no more right to complain of this than of the presence at the conference, as a representative of India, of one of its native oppressors, as if to advertise to Americans the fact that they are fighting for the preservation of a particularly odious form of imperialism.

The fact is becoming increasingly apparent that any isolation of America from the British Empire that can be found today is at the initiative of the British. The commonwealth conference and, before that, the very close Anglo-Russian alliance established in the treaty of May 26, 1942, indicate all too plainly the lines on which our principal allies propose to operate after the war. The rest of the world, including ourselves, is to occupy a secondary position. To these extents we are isolated not only from Britain but from Russia as well.

It is worth noting, also, that, though we have saved Australia from the Japanese and have opened the Mediterrancan to British ships, and are about to furnish the great preponderance of troops and supplies for the invasion of the continent of Europe, Britain is giving us only negligible help against Japan, and Russia is actually helping Japan against us.

Yes, we are fairly isolated; and isolated, it should be noted, precisely by those countries which snobbish Americans are seeking to exalt at our expense. Quite evidently it was not isolationism as such to which these sycophants objected; it was isolationism for the benefit of America.

Before this war is over, Stalin, Churchill, Russia, and the British Empire will force an ever-increasing number of Americans to the realization that every nation, every people, are thinking of their land, of their interests, of their national integrity, first, and that they are acting upon that thought for self-preservation.

I see no reason why Americans should not now and hereafter insist that we here at home think of America first.

A Vote Survey

OF

HON. ROBERT L. RODGERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. RODGERS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a report of a survey made by the students of Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa., regarding the votes cast in that city at the primary election, April 25, 1944.

The result of this survey is thought-provoking and is, no doubt, more or less representative of the attitude of the people throughout all sections of our country:

ALLEGHENY STUDENTS EXPOSE CITY GROUPS' VOTING HABITS—CHALLENGE BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL MEN WITH SURVEY WHICH FINDS ONLY SMALL PERCENTAGE OF PROFESSORS, CLERGYMEN, AND DENTISTS AT PRIMARY POLLS APRIL 25

A group of Allegheny College students offered a sharp challenge to Meadville's business and professional classes as they announced results of a survey conducted this week in an attempt to allocate responsibility for the city's record low turn-out for the April 25 election primaries.

Statistics compiled by the political science students who checked on nine local groups revealed that only lawyers and "the Chestnut Street business man" provided a 50 percent or better response to the franchise opportunity.

And, judging civic interest by the group's turn-out, the survey exposed college professors, with their 28.4 percent response, as most detached from the political scene.

The history and political science majors who investigated a situation which found only 33 percent of the city's eligible voters at the polls are: Mary Lou Sweet, of Erie; Nancy Altman, of Whitman, Mass.; Marjean Moore, of Latrobe, and Joanne Rothrock, of Geneva, Ohio. They worked under direction of Dr. Paul H. Giddens.

Meadville's 17 lawyers, 15 of whom voted, recorded an 88.2 percentage and left a lapse of some 36 points between them and the next group, the businessman, which aggregated a 52.1 percent turn-out.

Percentages of response of other groups ranged from the labor union officers' 47.8 down to the college professors' 28.4 and included: Industrial leaders, 45.8; high school teachers, 37; physicians, 34.7; clergymen, 32; and dentists, 31.8. Clergymen, dentists, and professors, the survey indicated, fell below the entire county's 33 percent level.

A barometer of the community groups' political-mindedness as found in the table compiled by the students:

	Eligible	Registered	Voting
Lawyers	17	17	15
Chestnut St. businessmen [1]	46	42	24
Labor union officers	23	18	11
Industrial leaders [1]	24	23	11
High school teachers	27	21	10
Physicians	23	19	8
Clergymen	25	18	8
Dentists	22	16	7
College professors	45	36	13

[1] In these 2 cases not all, but a representative number from the groups were checked. Voting records of all in the other groups, however, were tallied.

A survey conducted of the business and professional groups' wives provided as interesting contrast, although their voting record percentages averaged considerably lower than their husbands'.

Lawyers' wives led the list with 46.4 percent; physicians' wives were next with 33.3 percent, while the dentist's wife set the record low for both men's and women's groups at 16.6 percent. Wives of college professors was the only group to outshine their husbands—their 29.6 percentage was 1.2 higher. Wives of Chestnut Street businessmen recorded a 31.1 vote; wives of clergymen polled a 28.5, and wives of industrial leaders a 27.2 percent vote.

Results of the check among women:

	Eligible	Registered	Voting
Wives of lawyers	15	15	7
Wives of physicians	18	16	6
Wives of Chestnut Street businessmen	45	30	14
Wives of college professors	27	19	8
Wives of clergymen	21	11	6
Wives of industrial leaders	22	20	6
Wives of dentists	18	11	3

In an over-all picture the college students showed that of 346 men and women in the various groups eligible to vote, only 136 exercised their franchise. Entire Meadville vote totalled some 1,600 against a figure of 5,300 eligibles.

Translating their results into accusations, the students asked, "How can a government function democratically when people take so little interest in expressing their preferences?"; "Are teachers and professors setting a good example by this attitude for their students?"; "Are businessmen and industrial leaders who oppose increased taxation, socialized control, and Government regulations justified in their criticisms if they neglect to voice their opinions through voting?"

The Organization of Congress—Remarks of Representatives Dirksen and Monroney

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 4, 1944

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, the following observations were made by my colleagues, the Honorable EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, Member of Congress from Illinois, the Honorable A. S. (MIKE) MONRONEY, Member of Congress from Oklahoma, and me, to the national convention of the League of Women Voters in Chicago on April 26. The Honorable HAROLD H. BURTON, United States Senator from Ohio, also participated in the program.

REMARKS OF MR. DIRKSEN

While the Constitution creates a Government of three branches, yet our system of government rests essentially upon the powers conferred upon the Congress. A cursory examination of its powers will make this abundantly clear.

No inferior courts or agencies of government can come into being except as they are created by Congress. No taxes can be imposed save by authority of Congress. Not a soldier or sailor can be enlisted or conscripted nor can a warship be built unless authorized by the lawmaking branch. Not a single dollar can be appropriated out of the Federal Treasury except in pursuance of law, and that means action by the Congress. No Executive order has validity unless it rests upon statutory authority, and that means authority derived from Congress. The lawmaking branch is the basis of our National Government.

POWER IN RETREAT

For a decade legislative power, here as elsewhere, has been in retreat. This unhappy condition began in 1933, when distress was upon the land, when the Nation demanded action, and when broad delegations of power became the rule rather than the exception. These grants of power were accompanied with blank checks, the creation of countless administrative agencies, an expansion of bureaucracy, the rapid rise of administrative law, and the expanded use of rules, regulations, orders, and directives. Such powers, when once granted, were difficult of repeal and we moved through a period of legislative drift and Executive mastery.

CONGRESS NOT ENTIRELY BLAMELESS

Congress is not entirely blameless for this unhappy condition. It must bear criticism for any failure to exercise its full constitutional responsibility and for any weakness in the congressional structure and processes which prevents it from operating as an efficient instrument of Government. If it fails to equip itself with the tools and techniques to carry out its full powers under our organic law, it is manifestly not exercising its full responsibility for economy, efficiency, and sound Government.

SOME CLARIFICATION

It should be made clear that in a complex economy there must be agencies to discharge ministerial and administrative functions and that certain powers must be delegated. Congress as such cannot well administer the railroads. It requires an agency like the Interstate Commerce Commission. Congress cannot handle the administrative details which are involved in a public power program. These must be entrusted to an agency like the Federal Power Commission. Congress cannot well make the intricate studies which are the basis of tariffs and duties. These must be made by an instrumentality like the United States Tariff Commission. But Congress can do this: It can first carefully define and delimit the powers which are delegated and spell out the guide lines under which such powers are to be exercised. It can establish the qualifications for the persons who are to be entrusted with such powers; it can then follow through to make certain that those powers are properly, efficiently, and economically administered for the general welfare. This, then, involves in a general way the delegation of authority, the supervision of that authority, and the appropriation of public money. How, then, can Congress improve its structure and processes in securing best results for the people?

SOME SUGGESTIONS

Within the limits of the time set, I should prefer to emphasize the fiscal aspects of this matter but want to embrace the opportunity to include a few general suggestions. In a number of special fields, and particularly in time of war, the use of carefully selected joint committees of House and Senate would be useful and fruitful in saving time because time is such an important element. An adequately staffed legislative reference service in the Library of Congress could be of inestimable value to both committees and Members in dealing with the complex problems and policies which come before Congress. A streamlined committee structure would be in the interest of efficiency. A better coordination of the revenue and appropriation functions of Congress could develop substantial results in the field of economy. A method for the sustained study of policy legislation in other countries and the results of such legislation might prove definitely useful in connection with our own problems. And finally there is the responsibility of Congress in so utilizing its investigatory powers to achieve maximum benefits for the taxpayers of the Nation.

FISCAL COMMANDOS

The fiscal processes of Government are not quite so involved as they appear. The bureaus and agencies of Government all appear before the Bureau of the Budget with estimates of their financial needs for the year that lies ahead. The Bureau investigates the request. Its staff is limited and investigations of projects in the field are rather casual. When agreement is reached with respect to various items of estimated expenditure, it is finally presented to the President. The estimates are then incorporated in the annual Budget and are submitted to Congress. Hearings are then held by subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee, and agency and department heads quizzed about the various items. They may be approved, increased, or reduced. The subcommittee which handles the matter then reports to the Appropriations Committee and the estimates then go to the House for approval. A similar technique is employed in the Senate. The funds then become available for expenditure. At that point, the congressional process becomes a kind of post mortem. In the following year, the subcommittee seeks to ascertain by means of cross examination, without benefit of real investigation by Congress itself, how the money was expended. It is not a very precise or revealing process. If Congress were equipped with an adequate staff of investigators to make researches in the whole structure of Government, year in and year out to determine how efficiently public funds are expended, whether there is overstaffing of the various bureaus, what Federal functions are of doubtful value and could be discontinued, whether there is duplication of overlapping, Congress would then be equipped with the basic and accurate information which is indispensable to a thorough discharge of the appropriating function of the law-making branch. This power of investigation is one of the most salutary and effective powers in the hands of Congress.

If it were placed upon a truly scientific basis and given the dignity and importance which should attach to an inquiry where billions of dollars of public funds are involved, it could become the greatest force in the land for genuine economy, the elimination of waste and extravagance, the elimination of unnecessary personnel from Federal rolls, the discontinuance of Federal functions which are more ornamental than useful or necessary, the adoption of sound and approved business practices throughout the governmental structure, the consolidation of duplicating activities, the coordination of related functions, the abolition of bureaus which have no bona fide existence, the revitalization of the morale throughout the Federal structure, and generate in the public mind a new and better respect for government. To do this requires facts and information. To obtain that information in a form that would be useful to Congress requires expert investigators. The use of the investigatory power must be made constant, expert, and scientific if real results are to be obtained. It is a responsibility of the Congress.

REMARKS OF MR. MONRONEY

In approaching the problem of improvement of the machinery of Congress, I do not mean to reflect upon the job that the Members do, are trying to do, and wish to do. The problem is bigger and more complex than one of personalities alone.

I don't believe that 435 saints, or even 435 Democrats, could possibly make the present congressional machinery fill the enormous strain that is placed upon it. It just doesn't have the potency, this 1,800-man legislative dog to wag the 3,000,000-man executive tail. It can't pull its load or outrun the fast moving and powerful bureaucracy any more than a Model T can outrun a Mercury of today.

When you consider that in this broad land of 48 States and 135,000,000 people, there is only one man elected with power to direct the executive machine of this Government with all of its ramifications, you can easily and plainly see the need for proper legislative supervision. This was intended by the framers of our Constitution—this is the job that the Members of both Houses of Congress are trying to do—yet the job is plainly impossible with present tools.

Congress is trying to run the world's largest establishment as its board of directors—holding a check-rein on the hundreds of agencies and allocating the money and prescribing policy that we wish to be followed. Yet this mighty business—about 100 times as great as Ford, General Motors, and General Electric all rolled into one—is being run by directors who still must sit on an old-fashioned high stool and in an antiquated ledger scribble notes with a quill pen.

Not even a board of geniuses could possibly run only General Motors without modern mechanical aids, a thoroughgoing modernization, and departmentization of its work and an adequate personnel to keep itself informed.

It must have a thorough understanding and knowledge of what is going on in the plant, the sales department, and the many other departments of the business. The problem is even more important in Government where the lines of authority are complicated and made complex by political machinery, political policy, and even in many cases by overzealous personnel.

To those who site great progress in democracy, I frankly admit that Congress, up to World War No. 1, was able, because of its limited duties and functions, so limited because the Federal Government's activities were only a small fraction of what they are today, to do an outstanding job. But because a bridge once was long enough to reach across the creek is no sign that it still can span a canyon. Increased Federal activities, a trend clearly indicated by the tremendous growth of appropriations, point to the need for improved congressional machinery.

The expenses of Government have increased from $426,027 in 1789 to $78,178,885,241 in 1943. Most of the legislative machinery was set up to handle a Government which spent only $318,040,711, which was the amount spent in the year 1890 when 95 percent of the existing committee set-ups were made and completed.

Naturally, if the size of the job has increased so tremendously, the facilities for doing the work must also be improved and increased. Without tools, no master workman can fashion his product, no matter how great his desire or his ability.

Congress has the right and the power to direct changes in Government. Many of the changes that have improved our condition have been directed by the Congress itself. Still other changes, improvements, and consolidations have taken place in the executive departments by Executive order. The Army and the Navy by facing the problems of modern warfare have completely changed their organization, equipment, and methods.

Congress must change its own procedure, since under our Constitution no one else but Congress has this right. There are dozens of suggestions for improving the techniques, organization, communications, and money appropriating systems of Congress. These range from such proposals as that made by Senator O'DANIEL to limit the term of Members of Congress to 6 years down to many excellent ones by Congressman DIRKSEN, of Illinois, and particularly by Congressman KEFAUVER, of Tennessee, to provide for a question period of members of the Cabinet before the Congress at regular intervals. The number of proposed changes and the interest in this number indicates that Congress is aware of the need for change.

Because the problem is so varied and complex, it seems to me that the best course of action lies in an approach by a special nonpartisan committee of both Houses of Congress to study the organization of each House of Congress, the relationships between the two Houses, the relationships between the Congress and the other branches of the Government, the employment and remuneration of personnel by the Members and the committees of the Congress and the structure of and the relationships between the various standing, special, and select committees of the Congress.

We all know that there are many reforms that are needed, and to pass one without examining the other needs would do little to solve the problem of equipping the legislative arm of the Government with adequate power to do the job. Such a committee study would open up all of the proposals and would have the strength of a nonpartisan committee behind carrying their recommendations into concrete effect. Without this, one Member, fostering one bill, will have little chance of securing any reform.

I do not question the adequacy of the parliamentary procedure of the two Houses. There are some flaws, but they have stood the test of time in legislative practice. But everybody knows that the majority of the work of both Houses is done in committees. Beyond this, the adequate information and staff given to the individual Member is of vital importance.

As I view it, a proper study would embrace the following three courses:

1. Committee system.
2. Proper staffing of Congress.
3. Closer cooperation between legislative and executive departments.

I am not unmindful of the tremendous task of securing passage by the House and Senate of any legislation changing our present committee system. It is a good system, but I fear it is a loose and inefficient system, incapable of meeting the gigantic problems of today's government. The House has some 47 standing committees and 5 special committees. The Senate has 33 standing committees and 10 special committees.

These are just like Topsy—they just growed. As need arose for committees, the legislative machinery created them—just as now they should consolidate and reorganize them for efficiency in our operation.

More than 95 percent of our committees were established prior to 1890. In that year the Federal Government spent $318,040,700. Thus, we are bound by machinery designed for a work load of less than 0.003 percent of what it is carrying today.

There was nothing sacred about the establishment or the preservation of the committees, excepting inertia to change. Business of Congress was first handled by select committees and the Third Congress had 350 special committees. In 20 years this number had fallen to 70 and by 1813 it had fallen to 35.

Conversely, the growth of standing committees enlarged. While there were only 6 when the eighteenth century began, there were 10 in 1810 and by 1865 there were 40, the 50 number being reached in 1893. These committees were the result of added duties and needs. In the course of duty, Congress saw fit to remove the appropriations power from the Ways and Means Committee and give it to the legislative committees, then to place it in the Appropriations Committee. Likewise, banking and curernncy matters were removed from the Ways and Means Committee. The House Committee on Education and Labor because two committees and the Committee on Elections, following this ameboe system, became three in 1883. Still others were evidently the desire of a chairman of a special committee to continue his committee as a standing committee, witness the Census Committee of 1901.

I am suggesting not that committees be abolished, but they need to be reorganized, the lines of authority clarified to prevent overlapping and duplication as exists today, and that their procedures be improved.

Procedural changes are also badly needed. One of the worst systems is the lack of organization of hearings. Members begin hearings, often without an opportunity of having studied the legislation and a catch-as-catch-can-proceeding usually develops. Every committee, it seems to me, should plan in executive session before its hearings open the general framework of its study and discuss the issues of the case considered. Ample, but not superfluous, time should be allowed both the public and the Government for their statement of the case.

Now, under present system, a committee may spend months in hearing a case, taking evidence and studying statistics, but will then rush like mad to report the bill they have studied for so long within an hour or two after the hearings close.

A blue pencil for editing and briefing or condensation of hearings is badly needed, both by committees and by the membership itself. No Member can find time to read 2,000 pages of testimony upon a bill, yet unless he is willing to accept the inadequate skeletonized report, he has little or no information on the issue involved. Debate brings out a few of the high points, yet the art of digesting voluminous subjects has improved so much in recent years, a readers digest report on a 2,000-page hearing would be easy and practical to supply the membership.

More than anything else that Congress needs is some way to free itself from the avalanche of reading matter, and yet still be able to get a digest of the important facts and statistics.

Especially important is this in relationship to appropriation hearings. No Member can possibly read and understand completely the 900 page finely printed budget of the United States. Likewise, they cannot possibly digest the lengthy hearings that the Appropriations Committee hold on the money bills.

One simple procedure to put the figures in the budget on a punch-card machine and tabulate Government expenditures in a show-case accounting style. Another would be to improve their technique by having each department submit a uniform operations sheet, clearly showing the numbers of each class of employment, compared with previous years and also their other miscellaneous expenditures such as travel, telephone, and other expensive sidelines of government.

There are hundreds of ways in which improved housekeeping techniques in committees as they now exist would and could improve our operation were we not so wed to tradition.

One of the most important of these goes into the next subject but is closely alined with improving our committee work. That is the matter of staffing, no only the Members of Congress, but particularly the committees. While we struggle to pass policy-making legislation, we rely on a legal staff that is hopelessly small and inadequate. The House Drafting Service has only five attorneys on its pay roll and the Senate Drafting Service has three, although they are allowed five. The total cost is $83,000. Contrast this with the Office of the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture with 600 employees and an appropriation of $1,679,105 for 1944.

The staff of the Appropriations Committee consist of four clerks in the Senate and eight in the House, plus special investigators. Contrast that with Budget office of the same Department of Agriculture costing $609,584.

Contrast, too, the fact that none of the important major committees handling legislation of tremendous importance employ a single attorney on their staff, yet deal with agencies who have thousands. My Committee of Banking and Currency must pass on legislation that controls the following departments: Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Reserve System, the Federal Housing Administration, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Office of Price Administration, and the Commodity Credit Corporation in addition to the R. F. C. with the following branches, Defense Plant Corporation, Defense Supplies Corporation, Metals Reserve Corporation, Rubber Reserve Corporation, R. F. C. Mortgage Co., Federal National Mortgage Loan Association; Disaster Loan Corporation, and the War Damage Corportion. We have no committee consultants, attorneys, or specialists in any way on whom we can rely.

The most vital need, as I see it, is for legislation to be written by the Congress itself, yet because we fail to furnish ourselves with a legal staff, both in the drafting service and in the committees, we must rely on bills written and prepared downtown by the agencies that the legislation affects.

Likewise the Appropriations Committee largely must rely on the one-sided showing made by the departments in seeing money. I often think that a "house dick," empowered to knock on the doors of the agencies and ask, "Who are you, who have you got in there, and what are you doing?" would be a good thing.

An adequate system of staff aids is needed, both in research and in many cases in the Member's own office. I am more inclined to favor heavier research and digesting aids in the Legislative Reference Service as an arm of the Library of Congress. A quick comparison of the deficiency in the service that Congress has, compared with the avalanche of statistics, data, economic studies, and other material collected by the departments is amazing.

The Legislative Reference Service has only 66 on its staff, 6 of whom are stenographers and 44 are paid at $2,600 a year or less. For example, they have one specialist in banking and currency paid at $2,600. Contrast that with the hundreds of specialists downtown paid at $5,600 a year or more, yet these departmental employees are collecting facts and figures upon which Congress must base its decisions.

We have one specialist in social welfare paid at $2,600 while the Bureau of Labor Statistics spends more than $2,000,000 and the Social Security Board more than $3,000,000 in collecting and organizing studies of this same nature.

The service's lone expert on Foreign and Domestic Commerce is paid $3,200 while the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce employs 300 and the Bureau of Agricultural Economics has 770 on its pay roll.

Throughout the entire Federal set-up you have this same example of mountainous executive staffs and microscopic congressional facilities to deal with and control them. Obviously, if the Congress is to do the kind of a job that the public has the right to expect it to do, if it is to hold down expenses and prevent abuses of legislative intent, it must have the facilities to cope with the problem.

I will leave to others here the problem of dealing with adequate staffing of individual Member's offices, but I do know that many representing extra large constituencies find themselves unable to cope with the demands upon their offices. It has been estimated by many Congressmen that they spend one-third to more than one-half of their time answering requests for assistance, information, and service from their own districts. This reduces to too great an extent the effective time that the Member has to spend upon hearings and study of legislation and full attendance at the legislative sessions.

The third problem in my outline, that of bettering the relationships between the legislative and the executive departments would be improved by better management of the congressional duties. It might also be helped materially by such resolutions as Congressman KEFAUVER who proposes a question period at regular intervals of Cabinet members and other administrative officers before the Congress itself.

Now we are completely without any means of approachment of the ofttimes varying views of the legislative and executive bodies. Better committee relationships can, as in one outstanding case in the House, give us that improved relationship. I refer to the case of the House Naval Affairs Committee, where an outstanding job has been done.

A study such as we propose undoubtedly would develop other workable means of keeping the gulf from widening between these two all-important governmental branches. At least it is a problem worthy of a study and unquestionably could be helped materially by even informal suggestions. At the present the only way that the average Congressman has, when he feels that congressional authority as defined by law is being exceeded or the law is not being administered as planned, is to get up in the well of the House and lob a block-buster speech downtown at the agency. This adds to confusion and misunderstanding and does nothing to promote unity or efficiency in government.

The fact that such organizations as the League of Women Voters, the American Society of Newspaper Editors, and others are interested enough in this question to begin its study leads me to believe that we can and must bring our legislative arm of Government up to meet the needs of today's problems.

Inertia, existing in all organizations, and particularly in legislative bodies, must not block needed reform.

Just as the committee system, our legislative rules and practices developed as the need for them arose, so should the renovation and reorganization of our machinery and workshop be made when the need for it clearly is shown to exist.

REMARKS OF MR. KEFAUVER

Next to winning the war the great job confronting the people of this country, and indeed the people of the world, is to secure and maintain a just peace. If after this holocaust we do not create a better world in which justice and neighborliness supplant tyranny and war, then the sacrifices being made by our fighting men will have been in vain.

If peace is to be maintained the United States must play a leading role and, if we are to play a leading role, there must be a better working agreement between the Executive and Congress on international affairs, and Congress must be better informed and more currently informed.

The sudden entrance of the United States upon the world stage in a leading role finds us horribly ill equipped for the part we must play. If we are to have a foreign policy over a long course of years, if we are to join effectively with other nations to prevent wars, we have got a lot of reorganizing to do. To play a leading role we must have a Government that speaks with authority. There must be one foreign policy—not one for the President and another for Congress. In international relations we must work in closer harmony—the ends of Pennsylvania Avenue must be brought closer together.

To do this it is necessary for Cabinet members and heads of agencies and Members of Congress to get together and talk things over. Congress must be kept fully and currently informed of the Executive's plans and commitments. Unless we do something to change the trend we may be heading for the same catastrophe that was visited on the American people after the last war.

Moreover, on the home front there is a desperate need for more direct liaison and for a clearer understanding between the legislative and executive branches of our Government. So long as the United States was half empty, prosperous, and well protected by broad oceans, the old system was tolerable. But now that the Nation is crowded, harassed by serious social and economic problems, and deeply involved in world affairs, better teamwork is necessary for our welfare and security.

There is nothing wrong with the membership of Congress. I have a very high regard for the ability, integrity, and patriotism of my colleagues. But the truth is, we need to improve the tools with which we work. Much of our mechanism is outmoded. We are not keeping pace with, and we cannot hold our own with the rapidly expanding bureaucracy. We are not kept currently or well informed on international affairs. We need fuller and more accurate information. We will continue to have difficulty with our legislation until we get it.

One of the basic techniques of democracy is a system for reporting by and interrogation of executive officials. One of the great virtues of the town-meeting plan of local government is that at any meeting a citizen may stand on his feet and ask for an explanation of the executive officials of the town. This process of open interrogation is good for the officials as well as the citizens. It provides the best possible opportunity to find how the people are affected by a given course of administration, and it enables the executive to find out what the people are thinking. It gives the executive an opportunity to explain his problems to the people and to defend his course of action. The citizen may, of course, not get what he wants, but he knows why he doesn't get it and he knows his interest is not disregarded. This tends to give him confidence in the integrity and fairness of the executive officials.

In the larger units of government, such as the Federal Government, the method of direct interrogation by citizens cannot be employed. Comparable results may be obtained through questioning by the elected representatives of the people. Any workable plan for this purpose would be beneficial to the Executive, the Members of Congress and to the people of the Nation. There are many things that should be done. These improvements are contemplated by the resolutions introduced by my able colleague, MIKE MONRONEY, and by Senator MALONEY. I hope their resolutions are passed. I am trying to give the kitchen a coat of paint. Mike and Senator MALONEY are interested in painting the whole house. Likewise, I am strongly in favor of the proposal by my distinguished colleague, EVERETT DIRKSEN. It is shameful that congressional committees do not have better staffing and that Congress as a whole does not have a more adequate information service. Senator LA FOLLETTE deserves much credit for his effort to rearrange the committees of Congress. Many committees should be abolished and the jurisdiction of committees should be redefined. I hope that Senator LA FOLLETTE has success with his proposal.

In House Resolution 327 I have proposed that we have a report and question period on the floor of the House of Representatives at least once every 2 weeks. During this report and question period a particular member of the Cabinet, or the head of an agency, would be invited to appear on the floor of the House and answer written questions, which had already been prepared and submitted to him by the legislative committee issuing the invitation.

This procedure would give the Executive an opportunity of preparing answers to the questions and the legislative committee would be able to direct the course the discussion is to follow. The last half of the period would be taken up with questions by Members from the floor of the House. The time for questions from the floor would be under the control of the chairman and ranking minority member of the committee which issued the invitation. The Rules Committee of the House would fix the length of time for the period, which in any case would not be more than 2 hours, and the Rules Committee would also fix the priority of appearances in the event more than one invitation is pending at any one time. The purpose of all of this is, of course, to bring the Executive face to face with the representatives of the people in order that the country may have the benefit of a free, open, and candid consultation between them.

There is ample historical precedent in this country for the closer collaboration of the Cabinet and the Congress. I think the men who wrote the Constitution intended that there should be a better teamwork. I do not think that the Constituion contemplated the Cabinet and the Congress should be so separated that they could not work together in the interest of the country. The precedents are that in the First Congress President Washington, with Members of his Cabinet, appeared on two occasions in the Senate to advise with the Senators in connection with a treaty which was pending at that time. During the First Congress several Cabinet officers appeared in person before the Senate and the House of Representatives. The reason I say the type of procedure I am suggesting was contemplated by those wise men who wrote the Constitution, is that Washington was the chairman of the Constitutional Convention. Many Members of the First Congress were members of the Constitutional Convention. Certainly they would not have started this practice if they had not thought it was in conformity with the intention of the Constitution.

In the House of Representatives the average tenure of membership is a fraction over two terms. There is no adequate way under our present system for Members of the House to keep abreast with the rapidly changing problems of Government. We have no easy way of finding out about the plans and problems of the departments. The committee system tends to make specialists of the Members of the House and it does not give us an over-all picture, particularly of international problems. The departments file annual reports, but these are voluminous and are postmortems. The system of securing information by resolution is clumsy and unworkable.

Congress could do its work better, the executives would be more alert, and the public would be better informed if a method for face-to-face discussion could be put into operation.

I am grateful to the National League of Women Voters for devoting a part of your program to the problem of revitalizing Congress. You are an intelligent group without any axes to grind. You are interested only in the general welfare. If the various chapters of your organization would put this subject on their agenda for discussion for the coming year, you will, indeed, have rendered the Nation and the world a great service. It is only by focusing the searchlight of publicity upon the shortcomings of democratic institutions that improvement can be secured.

On Guard Against the T. V. A. Assault

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Baltimore Sun:

ON GUARD AGAINST THE T. V. A. ASSAULT

Friends of orderly government will come to the alert again as the time approaches for another congressional show-down on Senator MCKELLAR'S anti-T. V. A. amendments to the independent offices appropriation bill. The first of these bills would disrupt the very efficient fiscal system on which T. V. A. now operates. The second would subject all appointments carrying more than $4,500 in salary to Senate confirmation. This latter amendment applies not only to T. V. A. but to all Federal jobs in the indicated range.

The show-down on these amendments will come in the conference between the two Houses which is now considering the independent offices appropriation bill. The House passed this bill, free of the McKellar amendments, on January 31 of this year. In the Senate the bill was considered in normal course by the Appropriations Committee. Senator MCKELLAR is acting chairman of this committee and he persuaded it to report favorably on his two amendments. The Senate adopted these amendments March 24. The conference will take them up according to present indications some time early in May.

Even to those who object in principle to the T. V. A. experiment, the flaws in the McKellar proposals are perfectly apparent. First, take the amendment having to do with T. V. A. finances. Senator MCKELLAR wants to force T. V. A. to turn its balances regularly into the Treasury and, consequently, to appear before Congress regularly as a petitioner for appropriations. But this would demolish the distinctive and valuable organizational form in which T. V. A. now does business. T. V. A. would be reduced to the status of just another Government bureau operated politically from Washington

As everybody knows, the perils of bureaucracy, of overcentralization, of Government red tape are too great to risk in a highly technical enterprise like T. V. A. It was for just that reason that the sponsors of T. V. A. experimented with a new kind of organization for Government enterprises. That organization is patterned closely on the private-business corporation.

This kind of structure, says T. V. A. Chairman David E. Lilienthal, in public as in private business, holds management "strictly accountable not only for what it does, but for how well it does it. Such fixing of responsibility increases initiative and gives an opportunity for enterprise and experiment." There may be room for debate as to the completeness with which this policy is carried out, but there can be no denying that the executives in the field must have responsibility.

In line with this theory of fixing responsibility, the present T. V. A. finance system provides for rigid audits of T. V. A. books by the office of the Comptroller General, who reports what he finds to Congress. Hence, Senator MCKELLAR cannot argue that the change he seeks is necessary to keep Congress informed on T. V. A.'s finances. Congress is amply informed under the present system—as it should be. And the present system has positive advantages which ought not to be jeopardized.

The second McKellar amendment is equally objectionable. It would sweep all the over $4,500 jobs, of which there are many, into the patronage mill. The significant appointments in Government—those to ambassadors, to Supreme Court justiceships, etc.—are rightly subject to Senate confirmation. Appointees to these high posts have a primary impact on policy, for one thing, as no mere $4,500 man does. And the very eminence of these posts is something of a protection against the gross kind of patronage finagling which the relative unimportance of the $4,500 jobs might invite.

Senator MCKELLAR, in brief, is wrong on both scores. Let the conference committee so find and let the House and Senate back the committee up in that finding.

State Control Versus Federal Control of Education for Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein a statement made by the American Council on Education representing 50 national organizations concerned with education. The statement speaks for itself.

The issue or difference between the educational provision contained in S. 1767 as amended and reported by the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation of the House of Representatives and the bill reported by the Committee on Education of the House is Federal control versus State control of public education.

The Committee on Education had under consideration the subject of education for veterans for approximately 6 months and has given a great deal of time, study, and attention to the subject. The Committee on Education of the House is firmly of the opinion that education should remain under the control of the States and not become the subject of bureaucratic control in Washington.

Representatives of 50 national organizations concerned with education on all levels, both public and private, met today in Washington at the call of the American Council on Education. The pending legislation in Congress providing for the education of returning veterans was considered at length. The following statement was adopted unanimously:

1. The conference wishes to affirm its deep conviction in the wisdom of the traditional policy which reserves control of education to the States and localities, prudently left there, by the Constitution of the United States.

2. We are in agreement with the general purposes of the Clark omnibus bill recently passed by the Senate and the Rankin omnibus bill now before the House of Representatives. But the educational provisions of these bills violate this essential and fundamental principle of our form of government by setting up Federal bureaucratic control in education.

3. We believe that the educational provisions of the Clark and Rankin bills present the most serious threat to the existing State and local control of education that has yet appeared in this country.

4. We hold that if this menace to State and local control of education is to be defeated immediate action is needed on the part of all who oppose this invasion of States' rights by Federal agencies. To be effective such action must be taken before May 10 on which date it is reported that the House of Representatives will vote on this legislation.

5. The Barden bill, H. R. 3846, now before the House of Representatives, provides for State advisory committees, State selection of institutions, administration through State educational agencies, State counseling services for returning veterans, and the use of existing educational agencies and institutions. These provisions assure that existing facilities will be used under the direction of the several States, thereby providing greater educational benefits and services to returning veterans than would be possible under Federal bureaucratic control. We therefore urge that the Barden bill should be adopted. As an alternative we urge that the Rankin (H. R. 4357) and Clark (S. 1767) bills be amended by striking out title II, chapter IV, "Education for veterans," and substituting therefor the provisions of the Barden bill.

A. J. Brumbaugh, representing the North Central Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools; O. C. Carmichael, chairman of the American Council on Education; J. H. Saunders, representing the National Education Association; John J. Seidel, assistant superintendent for Vocational Education, Maryland State Department of Education; Edward V. Stanford, O. S. A., representing the National Catholic Educational Association; members of the resolutions committee.

Road Construction Costs Are Too High

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BROOKS HAYS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix, I include the following letter from Hon. C. P. Newton, judge of the county court of Pulaski County, Ark., and an outstanding citizen of my State. I trust that this timely statement will receive the thoughtful consideration of the House and of administrative officials who are dealing with the important problem of controlling costs of road construction.

DEAR BROOKS: About once a year, perhaps not so often, I write a Congressman a nonpersonal letter, and this is mine for 1944. I am writing Senator JOHN MCCLELLAN, a similar letter.

Despite the war, big things are brewing for the peace to come, among them being a gigantic program for road construction—National, State, and county highways. I have no suggestion to make about how the financing should be done, how it should be coordinated, but the primary object of my letter is to insist that the Congress take an interest in per-mile, per-square-yard, per-ton costs for such a program.

The outrageously high cost of primary road construction in the past has been a disgrace to everybody connected with it. At last, we do have a few experts who admit that road building expense per unit must be brought down. I refer mainly to material costs, and not so much to engineering and labor costs, which are high enough within themselves.

I do not know what Congress can do toward this end, but I am strongly impelled to ask that you look into it. As a matter of truth and justice, the United States Bureau of Roads should lead the way. The people simply cannot pay the price they have been paying in the past for hard roads. The "dehydrating" effect of this total war upon earning power and everything else is going to be devastating. We are due to revise our sense of values in every vital relationship of life. Of course, there must be no backward step in our American way of life, and it is the hope of all of us that our standards of living will not be lowered too much.

The laboratories of certain forward-looking corporations are working out some comparatively low-cost road materials, and it is the hope of every county judge in the land that some of these methods and materials will find their way into general use, without the trimmings of high fees or downright graft. I know you will welcome this suggestion of mine even if there is nothing you can do about it immediately.

With kind personal regards for you always, I am,

Fraternally,

C. P. NEWTON.

Congress Simplifies Tax Program—Tax Reports Less Complicated

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 5, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, we have completed discussion and passed H. R. 4646, a tax-simplification measure submitted to the House of Representatives by its Committee on Ways and Means. Having carefully read the bill and the committee report, I can say that, with the exception of a few details and provisions, I am pleased with the excellent job the committee has accomplished.

This bill, H. R. 4646, when enacted into law, will eliminate to a great extent a controversy that has been raging between administration officials and Members of Congress. Each blames the other for the complexity of the tax laws and the tax forms.

It is to be hoped that in view of the splendid job done by the Committee on Ways and Means, that the Treasury Department will see fit to send out instructions with the tax forms phrased in language which can be readily understood by the average layman.

Since the first income-tax law was written nearly 30 years ago, hundreds of amendments have been added. Each amendment further complicated the tax structure.

With the event of World War No. 2, 50,000,000 Americans were required to file returns and pay Federal income taxes, Many of them had never heard of surtax, capital gain and loss, normal tax, capital assets, earned income credit, short and long term capital gains, and so forth. Most naturally, there came to be a clamor for an easier way of making out tax forms. The passage of H. R. 4646 will provide this relief.

It was my hope and desire that the House would so amend H. R. 4646 so as to not increase the amount of taxes now paid by the lower-income-earning groups. However, according to the rule adopted, only committee amendments and changes were permitted. According to the present terms of H. R. 4646, a married person with one child, earning $1,800 a year, will have to pay six-tenths of 1 percent more taxes than at present. A person in the same category, earning $10,000 a year, will pay only one-tenth of 1 percent increase under H. R. 4646 over what he pays under existing legislation. However, further changes, if any, now will be considered by the Senate.

With the increased cost of living, taxes on low incomes should not be increased.

A few days ago I received a letter from R. N. Nelson, a prominent attorney at Breckenridge, Minn., suggesting that farmers be given until at least February 15 to file their income estimates for the previous year.

The pending bill requires that this must be done by January 15. This is somewhat of an improvement over the existing law, which stipulates that estimates must be in by December 15. However, since most farmers close their fiscal year December 31, this means that all the farmers will be crowding into the offices of auditors, attorneys, and tax experts to have their returns made out during those 15 days unless the time is extended. I hope that this proposal for time extension is adopted in the Senate.

The first two pages of the committee report—No. 1365—on H. R. 4646 effectively outlines the intent and purpose of this tax-simplification measure and presents a brief summary of the changes in existing law.

It is herein reprinted:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4646) to provide for simplification of the individual income tax, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill is confined to the simplification of the individual income tax. In the preparation of this legislation your committee had in mind the following objectives:

1. To relieve the great majority of taxpayers from the necessity of computing their income tax.
2. To reduce the number of tax computations.
3. To simplify the return form.
4. To decrease the number of persons required to file declarations of estimated tax.
5. To eliminate some of the difficulties and uncertainties in the making of estimates required for declarations.

The bill accomplishes these objectives without substantially changing the number of taxpayers or the revenue yield under existing law.

SUMMARY OF CHANGES IN EXISTING LAW

To accomplish these objectives, the bill makes several important changes in existing law.

First, for the surtax, there is a uniform exemption of $500 per person. Thus the taxpayer is allowed $500, the taxpayer's spouse is allowed $500, and there is a $500 allowance for each dependent.

Second, the Victory tax is repealed. The present normal and surtax are combined into a single surtax. A new normal tax of 3 percent is imposed on each person whose net income exceeds $500.

Third, a new simplified tax table, designated supplement T, is provided in the bill. This table may be used by taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes of less than $5,000, regardless of the source of their income. In general, adjusted gross income is gross income less business deductions. The table is so constructed as to allow the taxpayer a standard deduction of approximately 10 percent of his gross income. The use of this table is optional with the taxpayer.

Fourth, taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes of $5,000 or more are permitted at their option to claim, in lieu of their actual deductions, a standard deduction of $500.

Fifth, the present withholding system is modified, effective with respect to wages paid on or after January 1, 1945, so as to withhold, in the case of a taxpayer whose income is derived solely from wages, approximately the full tax liability on wages up to at least $5,000.

Sixth, in this bill taxpayers filing declarations are given an opportunity to amend their declarations on or before January 15 next following the close of the taxable year, for those on a calendar-year basis. Taxpayers may file, on or before January 15, their final return in lieu of the final declaration of estimated tax. Under present law, the final amended declaration must be filed on or before December 15.

Seventh, the bill makes two important changes with reference to farmers. A farmer is defined under the bill as an individual who derives more than two-thirds of his gross income from farming. Under existing law, an individual is not classified as a farmer unless he derives 80 percent or more of his gross income from farming. The other important change is that, under the bill, a farmer may make a final return on or before January 15 next following the close of the calendar year in lieu of making any declaration of estimated tax. If he is unable to make a complete return by January 15, he can make a declaration on an estimated tax on or before January 15 and file a final return on or before March 15. Under present law, a farmer is required to file a declaration of estimated tax on or before December 15 of the current year.

Eighth, the number of individuals required to file declarations of estimated tax is considerably decreased by the bill.

Under this bill those whose income not subject to withholding does not exceed $100 are required to file declarations only if their gross income exceeds $5,000, plus $500 for the spouse, and $500 for each dependent. Under present law, a declaration is required for those whose "other" income does not exceed $100 if their gross income from wages is over $2,700, if single, or $3,500 if married.

Ninth, the existing law has been amended with respect to deductions for charitable contributions so as to allow up to 15 percent of the adjusted-gross income (generally, gross income less business deductions) in lieu of the present law limit of 15 percent of net income. This has the effect of increasing the allowance for charitable contributions, and will enable the taxpayer to compute his charitable deduction without having to determine his net income.

Tenth, under the bill medical expenses are deductible only to the extent that they exceed 5 percent of adjusted-gross income in lieu of the present law provision of 5 percent of net income computed without regard to this deduction. This will result in a slight reduction in the medical expense allowance but is believed justified in the interest of simplification.

Eleventh, the bill introduces a new concept, adjusted gross income. It is defined to mean gross income less business deductions, deductions attributable to rents and royalties, and losses treated as losses from the exchange or sale of property. In the case of an employee, adjusted-gross income consists of gross wages or salary less expenses of travel or lodging in connection with employment while away from home, and any reimbursed expenses in connection with his employment. It will be seen, therefore, that in general adjusted-gross income means gross income less business deductions.

Taxpayers who desire a copy of the measure after it becomes law may write to their Congressman for it. Others wanting more detailed information may desire a copy of the committee report on the bill, and these also are available on request. For the information of constituents in the Ninth District of Minnesota, my address is 1620 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Are We Selling Our Liberties for a Mess of Pottage?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article which I wrote for the May issue of Liberty, a magazine of religious freedom, published in Washington:

ARE WE SELLING OUR LIBERTIES FOR A MESS OF POTTAGE?

Our forefathers who hewed this country out of a wilderness knew what they wanted in the way of individual liberty, community freedom, and central government.

They knew that they wanted—and each wanted—a maximum of personal liberty combined with dignity, all possible community freedom consistent with a recognition of the liberty and dignity of others, and a rigorously restrained and limited central government.

In their formative years the States, or Colonies, had existed under the exact opposite of these ideals. It was because of their existence for nearly 200 years under government antithetical to these ideals that the colonists had come to cherish and hope for the proclamation of their own individual liberties secured to them by their own government, designed for this purpose, and this purpose only.

The people of the United States declared their independence in 1773 and later established their Constitution for the very definite purpose of getting less government.

It was a natural result of living under a despotic government which had been guilty, in the words of the Declaration, of "a long train of abuses and usurpations."

It was inevitable that the men who were building a new order in a new continent should feel and should declare that their individual and inalienable rights of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" existed before and above governments and that the function of government was primarily to protect their rights and not to curb, curtail, or restrict any of them.

These men maintained—with words and, when the time came, with force—that government was and should be their creation; that they and their inalienable rights came first; and that government, being their creature, could not be greater than its creator.

They wanted to eliminate a government which had built up a "history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these States."

The Colonists wanted no tyrannical central government over them and over their community governments. It was clear to them what evils must flow from a despotic over-all government, even though that government might aim to be benevolently paternal.

The evils of such a government, pressing relentlessly on their individual and joint affairs, the founding fathers set forth simply and clearly in their declaration of our independence. And later, when they established their own rigidly limited—as they thought—central government, they set forth the evils again, and to guard themselves and their posterity they wrote into our Constitution "no" after "no."

The two documents which are our heritage, the Declaration and the Constitution, were a defiance to a kingly despot and a pledge to make real that defiance and the results flowing from it.

Reading them now, many will read into them, not only a recital of past governmental wrongs but in some instances a warning to posterity in order that posterity might be on its guard to prevent a repetition of the evils which they were casting aside.

All over the world forces are loose which seem to be determined to bring into new birth the evils of despotic central government against which the Colonists rebelled and which they sought to banish forever from the United States at least.

In some countries these evils have already overcome the individual, scotched his rights, and ground him into a supine mass upon which tyrants tramp. In others, forsaking the ideals of individual freedom and seeking always to get from government more than a government of freemen can give, peoples have caused their governments to topple at the first push.

In our own country forces are building up which are inimical to our individual liberties and destructive of the form of government best suited to the preservation of such liberties.

Despite the warnings of the founding fathers, despite the pitiful examples of other peoples, we are falling more and more into habits of thought and habits of action which, if we persist in them, will suck from the Declaration of Independence all its vigor, and from the Constitution all its safeguards. When we shall have dined on this expensive bill of fare we shall have a mess of pottage.

Instead of realizing that our strength is in ourselves as individuals, instead of realizing that the strength of our Government comes from the same identical source, we as individuals and as groups are seeking to draw from the Government, in ever greater degree, that which it cannot give us.

Our Federal Government cannot give to us a single thing unless it takes that thing from some of us. Not one of us can be given a special privilege by government unless government takes some right from another.

And once it is established that government has the power and authority to take away a right from one of its citizens—even to confer privilege upon another citizen—then democracy, as born in the Declaration and the Constitution, ceases to exist.

This tendency of individuals and of groups to seek special favors from the central government is not new. But it has increased to the danger point. This is the logical result of yielding to the first pressure, for it goes in an everwidening circle. Each new group must be given increasing favors in order to offset the last favor given to the other group. And in the end there simply are not enough favors to go round.

This vicious yielding to groups produces a rot, not only in government, but in the groups and in the people themselves.

Under the operation of the system the individual gives up slowly and unthinkingly, perhaps, his guaranteed rights, his individual liberty, and dignity. He ceases to be a free man in a free country. He becomes the creature of his government—his government which he has created. It is a seemingly impossible, but nevertheless actual, condition.

Our freemen, our Americans, have in large part lost the faculty of thinking and acting as freemen and as Americans. They think of themselves as members of the pressure group to which each one thinks it most advantageous to belong. And each group tries to feed on the government—in effect, on all of us.

We have reached the point where many positions of trust in our Federal Government are not filled by free Americans, but are allotted to the various pressure groups. So many positions on this board are prescribed to be filled by industry. So many positions on that board are prescribed to be filled by labor. So many on the next go to farmers. So many positions on the next agency are to be filled by women. So many on the next board must be social workers. Everyone has to get his place and his emoluments except the free American man. We do not qualify for positions of national scope on that basis any more.

All over the country right now pressure groups are further insisting that representation of America at the peace table—when it comes—shall be not on the basis of representing America but on the basis of representing business, labor, the women, the various churches, the various races. At any moment we can expect the red-haired men to demand a special representative on the various boards and on the peace mission.

Of course, in order to meet, or to anticipate, these pressure demands, we have multiplied thousands upon thousands of Federal officeholders. We have sent them into every village and every hamlet to mingle in every conceivable kind of affair.

And this has been done by the descendants and heirs of those who, in drawing their indictment against the King of Britain, entered as one of the principal counts that "He has erected a multitude of new offices and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance."

There are other counts in that indictment that might well be given thought in our present time—and all my expressions in this article are based not upon our country at war but upon tendencies which developed long before the war.

There was, for instance, the charge that the King had subverted the judiciary; that "He has made judges dependent on his will alone." That count the founding fathers thought justified rebellion, yet in our day and age there is a dangerous tendency to make our judiciary subservient to the same type of pressure already outlined.

And there was the count in the Declaration that the King had forfeited his right to rule over the Colonies "for taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering fundamentally the forms of our governments."

The forms of our State governments, which existed before the Federal Government, and which the Constitution was to protect, have already been altered fundamentally and the change is continuing. The same bribery which has been effective in inducing individuals to yield their liberties has been practiced against the States, and the States have taken the 30 pieces of silver. They will end, unless the course is changed, by destroying themselves.

Our liberties cannot be taken from us.

But we can give them up. Many have already yielded.

When we speak of liberties, of course, religious liberty is included. Religious liberty is threatened the same as civil liberty. The same false principles of government that lead to loss of civil liberty open the way to the loss of religious rights. A people who sacrifice their right to protest, who learn to yield in minor matters, are not likely to give strong resistance to major aggression. We will do well today to heed James Madison's words: "It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties." We would do well also to recall what Benjamin Franklin said when he emerged from the Constitutional Convention and was asked what kind of government he had given America. He replied, "A republic if you keep it."

It is time—if it is not already too late—for Americans to reread our Declaration of Independence and our Constitution and once more, to their preservation and to their adherence, "mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

Democracy on the March

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I desire to include here a book review written by Mr. Leon Jourolmon, member of the Railroad and Public Utilities Commission of Tennessee. Commissioner Jourolmon has reviewed in a very excellent manner the book T. V. A.—Democracy on the March, by Chairman David Lilienthal, of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The review follows:

BOOK REVIEW

T. V. A.—DEMOCRACY ON THE MARCH

(By David E. Lilienthal. Harper. New York. Pp. 248. $2.50)

The coming of David E. Lilienthal to the Tennessee Valley in 1933 is a landmark in the development of a region of the United States which too long has been neglected. Lilienthal was a young man whose experience singularly qualified him to erect an institution dedicated to bringing about a notable progression among an entire people. But beyond this he was a man with an underlying philosophy based upon a profound moral, if not religious, purpose; the meaning of this purpose is to be found in the unified development of regional material resources as a part of "a Great Plan: The Unity of Nature and Mankind." In the sincerity of his devotion to this moral purpose David E. Lilienthal has become known to the four and one-half million people who live in the Tennessee Valley region. The great advance that 11 years of his administration of the Tennessee Valley Authority have wrought in the economic fortunes of these people is his best monument—even more so than the 21 dams which constitute the Tennessee River water control system.

His book, which came from the press during the past week, is an account of how this basic moral philosophy has been translated into reality for the benefit of the Tennessee Valley region and its people. The account is an humble one and told in an objective way, nor is there any reference anywhere in it to his own part in bringing about the accomplishments of the Tennessee Valley Authority. Throughout, the dominant emphasis is upon the advance of the people themselves who through their democratic institutions have been moving forward step by step. Yet those who know and understand the story of the T. V. A. and its accomplishments can read between almost all the lines the part that Lilienthal's philosophy and guidance have had in the realization of the T. V. A.'s purpose.

This book is the most well-rounded account of the Tennessee Valley Authority that has yet been published. It should be required reading for everyone whose economic well-being is associated with the Tennessee Valley. It does not place an overemphasis on any of the many features of the Authority's program. To many, the public power program represents all of the T. V. A., yet in this volume this is compressed into seven pages. Nonetheless, it is clear that a large part of the advance that T. V. A. has brought about is attributable to the spectacular reduction of rates for electricity announced in September 1933, and in the tremendous increase in the generation of electric energy which has multiplied the industrial productivity of the people of the region many times.

But beyond this the book is an account of how these advances have affected the lives of individual people, laborers on the construction projects, farmers who constitute the great majority of the citizenship of the region, and businessmen and industrialists to whom richer opportunities have been opened up as a result of T. V. A.'s development of the resources of the valley. The book is devoted to democracy at the community level and the story is told of how farmers have assisted and cooperated to secure a more comfortable living for themselves, their families, and their communities, through improvement of their soil, through education and demonstrations, and through utilizing the many appliances that an abundant supply of electricity makes available.

The ever present under-surface struggle to keep T. V. A. free of politics is the subject of a most absorbing chapter. Those who originally opposed T. V. A. did so declaring that it would be permeated with political influence. In their disappointment at the failure of their prophesies, some of these now welcome every effort of political leaders to change the T. V. A. administrative system and make it subservient to those with political pretensions. The success of the T. V. A. is largely dependent upon its nonpolitical character and those who would still like to see it fail clearly realize that if they can inject politics into its management the future progress of the Authority will be jeopardized.

That the T. V. A. principle and philosophy is successful is attested by the fact that in many remote parts of the world plans are going forward for applying the lessons learned in the Tennessee Valley to the reconstruction and rebuilding of the post-war world. In India, South America, China, Africa, Scandinavia it is proposed to develop other river valleys in order to bring about the multiple purpose river development which T. V. A. has brought about. Thus all around the world the T. V. A. has come to be thought of as a "symbol of man's capacity to create and to build not only for war and death but for peace and life."

T. V. A. is still in its youth, engaged in a continuing process to improve the physical environment of men. America's most eminent living historian, Charles A. Beard, looks upon Lilienthal as one who by virtue of his public services "has won a place for himself among the first citizens of the Republic." Such is the verdict of a historian, and the verdict of history which awaits the coming of future generations may well affirm this judgment.

Embargo Against Cane Spirits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, I have an amazing confession to reveal to the House today.

It is a blunt confession, of course, by the War Production Board, only after prodding and being backed into a corner that they frankly do not know what it is all about in connection with the embargo against cane spirits from Cuba and other South American countries.

Last week I directed the attention of this body to the double talk and run-around and obvious evasion of Mr. John Boyer, head of the Alcohol and Solvents Branch of the Chemical Division in connection with this problem.

Today I offer the documentary proof. It is an amazing confession and typifies more than ever the confusion with which this war is being conducted on the home front.

Where we go from here only God knows, and I am persuaded that even He is confused by the actions of such individuals in responsible positions in Washington.

After 6 weeks of futile effort to get a sensible and definite reply to my efforts to have some technique of policy adopted by the War Production Board, I tossed in the sponge and called the attention of the House to the chaotic conditions existing in the War Production Board, and called attention to the efforts of some people to drive this country into the evils of prohibition.

I refused to further discuss the matter verbally with this Mr. Boyer or anybody else in the War Production Board because I became aware that they intended to play on words and give the industry the run-around. I determined that all future contact with these individuals would be in writing because I at least wanted an even break on interpretation of their double talk. Frankly, I did not expect results as quickly.

Here is the irrefutable evidence of the double dealing, double talk, run-around game being played by the War Production Board in connection with the embargo on cane spirits.

On May 3, 1944, I addressed a letter to Mr. Boyer in which I asked this simple question which I am sure could have been understood by any teen-age child:

Can a liquor dealer in the United States import cane spirits gins from the Argentine?

And to this simple question here is the reply which I received on May 4, 1944:

In answer to your second question as to beverage cane spirits from the Argentine. I may say that the War Production Board has not announced quotas for importation of such spirits aged or new for the calendar year of 1944 under its order M-374.

I believe the various interested agencies of the Government did not establish this quota because there are no advices that there is cane production or stocks of beverage spirits in the Argentine. Should that fact be later demonstrated to our satisfaction consideration could be given here with these interested agencies.

A splendid example of double talk and evasion.

Mr. Speaker, I am a simple man. My education is that of the ordinary American. I have graduated from a high school. I have 4 years at a university. I have 23 years experience in the newspaper business as a reporter. I have almost 4 years experience as a Member of this Congress. I do not hold a Phi Beta Kappa key but my associates, I humbly believe, respect my intellect as that of the average educated American.

Mr. Speaker, I believe you will agree with me that it takes more than the average educated American to understand Mr. Boyer's answer to my simple question. I confess I couldn't draw any deduction from his reply and if a deduction was to be drawn any conclusion which I would have arrived at could have been disputed.

I have a burning and fervent desire to keep the records straight at all times, especially when I know and realize that I am being given the brush off with some fancy talk.

With all humility and still in quest of understandable information I immediately wrote Mr. Boyer again and this time I said:

With further reference to my letter to you of May 3 and your reply of May 4, I do not understand your answer to my second question. All I want to know is simply this: If cane spirits are available in the Argentine can they be imported to the United States? I think this question can easily be answered yes or no, without a lot of if's and and's.

Now, that is plain enough, is it not? Of course it is plain enough and simple enough and Mr. Boyer realized that he was caught in his trap of evasion because the reply is a bald and blunt confession that he does not know the answer although the War Production Board is supposed to announce "the technique of policy" some time between now and the time Gabriel blows his horn.

Here is the letter which I received today in reply to that simple question of whether or not cane spirits could be imported from the Argentine:

MY DEAR MR. HÉBERT: I have your letter of the 5th in which you ask for further explanation of our position on a prospective importation of beverage cane spirits from the Argentine. I regret that it is not possible for me to assert that we would or would not authorize such an importation if we were to receive an application therefor because our action would only follow consultation with several interested agencies of the Government.

As you know, all persons desiring to import are required to secure authorizations from us under War Production Board Order M-374. Since this order was issued as an outcome of the agreements reached between representatives of the United States and Cuban Governments and since we were not a party to those negotiations, we have reasonably agreed to discuss any authorizations for quotas for countries not listed in our announcement of April 30 with these interested agencies which include both the State Department and the Foreign Economic Administration.

The War Production Board does not know whether or not the spirits can be imported, but I direct your attention to the fact that the War Production Board and Mr. Boyer does know that it has the power to stop the importation of cane spirits almost overnight and without warning to the liquor industry, at least to a small segment of the liquor industry.

Notice also that the War Production Board now attempts to squirm out of its unenviable position in connection with this problem by shunting the burden to the State Department and the Foreign Economic Administration.

So here we are in the position of the War Production Board saying that all applications for import must be filed with it; promising an announcement for more than 6 weeks without an announcement forthcoming; continuing a policy of evasion and double talk when asked for information; finally pinned down to a "yes" or "no" answer and confessing that it does not know the answer at all.

Why did not Mr. Boyer tell me in the beginning that he did not know the answers? Why did not he tell me 6 weeks ago that the War Production Board was not the only agency involved? Why did he make promises of a decision when he did not have such powers; why did not he answer my first query relative to the Argentine proposition in the language that he replied to the second query; why did he compel me to pin him down and drive him into a corner before he admitted that he did not know the answer?

Is not this all conclusive proof, Mr. Speaker, of the practices with which we are confronted today? Is not this a confession, Mr. Speaker, that the American public is being given the run-around? What more proof could anybody ask than of these damning admissions of a man in high authority such as Mr. Boyer?

And American business, Mr. Speaker, is asked to have confidence in such administrative officials. And American business, Mr. Speaker, must place its future life in the hands of such incompetence, and I say incompetence with charity, because if such administrators are competent then they are deliberately misleading and confusing American business, which is a greater crime than incompetence.

But this is not all, Mr. Speaker.

I am waiting for another reply from Mr. Boyer in answer to a perplexing question this time.

While our little liquor dealers are left holding the empty sack because of the procrastination and obvious deliberate indecisiveness of Mr. Boyer and his associates in the War Production Board, the big fellow gets along all right.

I have been reliably informed that last week in the city of New Orleans there was witnessed the sorry spectacle of the arrival of the French steamer Duc De Doumale direct from Martinique, with 4,500 half puncheons of 55 gallons each, consigned to the Schenley Import Co. of New York, which steamer, I am creditably informed, departed from Fort-de-France, on or about April 20, or about a full month after the imposition of this embargo, March 15.

I am in a quandary to know how this could happen and why it is permissible for the importers of this particular lot to be in possession of approximately 100,000 cases of prime rum ready for distribution when the embargo is lifted—if it comes before judgment day—to the discrimination of every other law-abiding factor in the trade whose liquor will still be outside of this country and will, therefore, be without merchandise for distribution.

I wonder what Mr. Boyer's reply will be to that question. I will wager it will be a "lulu."

Mr. Speaker, why continue any longer?

It is time there be some action taken to prevent this sort of individuals from playing chess with American industry for their own amusement—or for other purposes and intentions which may not have come to light as yet.

I, for one, will fight and fight and fight until every little liquor dealer gets his just dues and every time I come into possession of such amazing confessions and facts which I have just presented I will present it to this House in order that all may be enlightened in the devious means and actions which are slowly bringing American small business to its knees.

There will be a day of reckoning, Mr. Speaker, and I hope and pray that day is not very far distant. It will not be distant if others join in this fight and not only demand justice for the little fellow but see to it that he gets it.

More Food Waste

REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that great waste in food continues. In an article in the New York Times this morning the War Food Administration calls attention to the fact that more than 700,000 pounds of Cheddar cheese are going to waste; also that some 500,000 pounds of off-grade butter from set-aside stocks, which have been accumulating for a year, are being liquidated in that they are being processed and converted into Carter spread and butter oil for lend-lease shipment to Russia. It is about time this waste of food is stopped.

[From the New York Times of May 9, 1944]

UNITED STATES OFFERS BIG LOT OF SPOILED CHEESE—PROCESSORS ASKED TO BID ON 700,000 POUNDS OF CHEDDAR STORED ON WEST COAST

The War Food Administration is offering to the highest bidder 700,000 pounds of off-grade cheddar cheese in storage in California and Oregon, it was learned yesterday. Most of the cheese is said to have been in storage for more than 6 months and is part of the hoard piled up by the Federal Government under set-aside orders.

Attachés of W. F. A. explained that the cheese was all off in one way or another, although it was still good for processing.

On some of the heads the protective paraffin covering is cracked, presumably as a result of handling. Descriptions of the product explain that it is off flavor, by which W. F. A. means it is bitter, and that some had a fruity smell. It also is described as crumby.

The cheese is offered only to authorized assemblers, and their bids must be in Washington by next Monday.

To date W. F. A. has sold more than 500,000 pounds of off-grade butter from the set-aside stocks it began accumulating last year. Of its stores of butter, which at one time were estimated at 235,000,000 pounds, the Federal Government carried over 82,000,000 pounds this spring. Of that amount, nearly 40,000,000 was earmarked for conversion into Carter spread and butter oil for lend-lease shipments to Russia.

H. R. 4357 Provides Bureaucratic Control of Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, we will begin consideration of H. R. 4357, better known as the soldiers' aid bill, Thursday. This legislation as reported to the House definitely provides for bureaucratic control of education. This must be avoided.

Under permission to extend my remarks I include an important statement adopted by representatives of some fifty national organizations concerned with education who met in Washington Friday, May 5, at the call of the American Council of Education. Among those participating in writing this statement were A. J. Brumbaugh, representing the North Central Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools; O. C. Carmichael, chairman of the American Council of Education; J. H. Saunders, National Educational Association; John J. Seidel, assistant superintendent of vocational education, Maryland State Department of Education; and Edward V. Stanford, National Catholic Educational Association.

The statement, which should be considered by every Member of Congress while H. R. 4357 is being debated, follows:

Representatives of 50 national organizations concerned with education on all levels, both public and private, met today in Washington at the call of the American Council on Education. The pending legislation in Congress providing for the education of returning veterans was considered at length. The following statement was adopted unanimously:

1. The conference wishes to affirm its deep conviction in the wisdom of the traditional policy which reserves control of education to the States and localities, prudently left there by the Constitution of the United States.

2. We are in agreement with the general purposes of the Clark omnibus bill recently passed by the Senate and the Rankin omnibus bill now before the House of Representatives. But the educational provisions of these bills violate this essential and fundamental principle of our form of government by setting up Federal bureaucratic control in education.

3. We believe that the educational provisions of the Clark and Rankin bills present the most serious threat to the existing State and local control of education that has yet appeared in this country.

4. We hold that if this menace to State and local control of education is to be defeated, immediate action is needed on the part of all who oppose this invasion of States' rights by Federal agencies. To be effective, such action must be taken before May 10, on which date it is reported that the House of Representatives will vote on this legislation.

5. The Barden bill, H. R. 3846, now before the House of Representatives, provides for State advisory committees, State selection of institutions, administration through State educational agencies, State counseling services for returning veterans, and the use of existing educational agencies and institutions. These provisions assure that existing facilities will be used under the direction of the several States, thereby providing greater educational benefits and services to returning veterans than would be possible under Federal bureaucratic control. We, therefore, urge that the Barden bill should be adopted. As an alternative we urge that the Rankin (H. R. 4357) and Clark (S. 1767) bills be amended by striking out title II, chapter IV, Education for Veterans, and substituting therefor the provisions of the Barden bill.

Service Activities of the D. A. V.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER G. ANDREWS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, long before Pearl Harbor the Disabled American Veterans decided that its best contribution to the Nation's national defense and all-out war effort would be for it to extend the expert advice and counsel of its service officers, national and local, to those Americans who may have become disabled by reason of war service in our armed forces.

No veteran organization has any more extensive and effective Nation-wide service staff to take care of this essential national defense job than that maintained by the D. A. V.

FORMATION OF D. A. V.

Formed in 1920, and chartered by Congress in 1932, to render service to, for, and by America's disabled war veterans, the Disabled American Veterans has been generally recognized as the official spokesman for America's disabled defenders.

According to its congressional charter of incorporation—Public Law 186, approved June 17, 1932, as amended by Public Law No. 668, approved July 15, 1942—active membership in the D, A. V. can be obtained only by those Americans whose bodies bear the scars of wounds or injuries, or the blight of ailments or disabilities, incurred during or by reason of active war service in the armed forces of the United States, or of some country allied with it, during time of war.

More and more wounded and disabled veterans of World War No. 2 are becoming active members of the D. A. V.

Having been wounded while serving with our armed forces during World War No. 1, I am personally proud to be a life member of this select outfit.

During the more than 24 years of its service activities, the D. A. V. has sponsored and supported much liberalizing legislation on behalf of disabled veterans and their dependents. Liberalized application of such laws, too numerous and too technical here to set forth, has, each year, been brought about by numerous conferences with officials of the Veterans' Administration.

D. A. V. NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS

Located at 1423 East McMillan Avenue, Cincinnati 6, Ohio, the national headquarters of the D. A. V. takes care of all administrative matters and records, and publishes the Disabled American Veterans' Semimonthly newspaper, containing accurate, up-to-date information as to all existing and pending legislation, Presidential Executive orders, court decisions, Attorney General's opinions, Comptroller General's opinions, Veterans' Administration regulations, service letters, Administrator's decisions, and other instructions, as well as much other information of interest and of value to disabled veterans and their dependents.

The present national commander of the D. A. V. is James L. Monnahan, Esq., of St. Paul, Minn., who as a national service officer and department adjutant during the preceding 15 years, has had a broad background of experience which qualifies him to lead an organization composed exclusively of disabled war veterans.

Its national adjutant, Vivian D. Corbly, has been secretary-manager of the organization and editor of its newspaper since 1925. Capt. Cicero F. Hogan is his able assistant.

The largest bank in Cincinnati—the Fifth Third Union Trust Co.—has for many years been the depository for the funds of both the D. A. V., and of its incorporated trusteeship, the Disabled American Veterans Service Foundation. Officials handling funds have always been adequately bonded by the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland.

NATIONAL SERVICE SET-UP

The national service bureau of the Disabled American Veterans has had offices in the Munsey Building in Washington, D. C., during the last 24 years.

It is headed by my good friend Millard W. Rice, as National Service Director, who is now the dean among the national legislative representatives of the several recognized veteran organizations, with energetic, affable, Thomas J. Kehoe as assistant national service director, the Washington office of the D. A. V. is now staffed by 13 service experts. The activities of the nationally paid national service officers of the D. A. V., located in most of the regional offices of the Veterans' Administration and of its some 900 volunteer State and chapter service officers, also come under the supervision of the National Service Director. All of these unselfish, self-sacrificing service officers are themselves disabled veterans. Every one of them personally knows of the difficulties and handicaps which have baffled thousands of disabled men to secure suitable gainful employment.

These D. A. V. service officers know all about the technical complications that disabled veterans must overcome factually to prove the service connections of their disabilities to the satisfaction of rating agencies of the United States Veterans' Administration, under the limitations and restrictions of existing law, as legalistically interpreted and as administratively applied.

Understanding such vexatious problems by personal experience, these D. A. V. service officers are naturally more sympathetic and therefore generally more effective in helping disabled claimants to comply with technical requirements to prove legal entitlement to benefits which they have earned.

D. A. V. SERVICE ACCOMPLISHMENTS

The D. A. V. has freely rendered technical help to thousands of disabled veterans each year in obtaining compensation for service-incurred disabilities, medical treatment, hospitalization, insurance benefits, vocational training, civil-service appointments, private employment, and pensions for dependents.

During the past 15 years, for which records are obtainable, the paid national service officers of the D. A. V. have extended service as indicated by the following brief résumé: Claims handled, 852,006; hospitalizations and examinations obtained, 141,373; and total monetary benefits, $60,311,266.14.

Additional compensation payments thus obtained for more than 150,000 disabled veterans and their dependents, who might not otherwise have been able to procure such needed benefits, have converted such beneficiaries from local liabilities into community assets.

It is, of course, not practicable, in a brief statistical résumé, to indicate the many different types of service extended by service officers. Many liberalizing precedents have been established by the decisions obtained, which subsequently have proved of value to hundreds or thousands of disabled veterans having similar claims, the results of which cannot be computed for service reports.

DIFFICULTIES OF PROVING SERVICE ORIGIN

Most citizens agree with the D. A. V. that the Federal Government should bear the burden of providing for the Nation's defenders, but only when it has been established that the veteran's disabilities were incurred in or aggravated by his military service.

To prove service connection of a disability, however, is not an easy thing to do, except where official records show its inception in service. An equitable claim cannot necessarily be legally established. A disabled veteran may be conscientiously convinced that his disability was caused by his service without being able technically to prove that fact.

Many different factors may make it extremely difficult, and in many cases impossible, for a veteran factually to prove that his disabilities were caused by his war service, even though actually service incurred or aggravated.

The fight for justice for such disappointed, disillusioned, disabled veterans must nevertheless be carried on not only for them, but because of their wives and growing children.

AN INVESTMENT IN PATRIOTISM

It is definitely in the interest of all Americans that the fight for justice must be made for those who have sacrificed their youth and a part of their bodies, or their health, in our country's most hazardous occupation, its military and naval services during time of war.

The faith must be kept with those who have made such sacrifices in the past, as well as with those who are now baring their young breasts to the enemy, so that other young men, who in the future may be called upon to make similar sacrifices, will have the assurance, on the basis of past performance, that, if they too should also be so unfortunate, they will not be permitted to become mere forgotten heroes.

The determination of the D. A. V. to see to it that America's disabled veterans are adequately provided for should be supported as a public investment in the future patriotism of our youth, and is practical patriotism which brings huge humanitarian and financial dividends to every community, to ever State, and to our country.

HOW D. A. V. SERVICE IS FINANCED

The D. A. V. has been able to maintain its extensive service program primarily out of funds contributed by disabled veterans themselves, by their payment of membership dues in the D. A. V., through its some 40 State departments and 900 chapters.

A national per capita tax of $2, plus a national service fee of $1, is paid each year to the national headquarters by every local chapter for each of its members.

Local D. A. V. chapters finance their own service and relief activities out of their portion of the annual membership dues, and by annual Forget-Me-Not Day drives, dances, and other propects.

Nationally, the D. A. V. has recently been endeavoring, with considerable but not enough success, to raise needed service funds through the sale of Ident-O-Tags—miniature automobile license plates—to be attached to one's key ring. The value of this key insurance is indicated by the fact that about 1,200 sets of lost key rings are returned each week to their owners.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS' SERVICE FOUNDATION

To make possible a much-needed expansion of its rehabilitation activities, the D. A. V. is hopeful that understanding fellow Americans will help to build up a needed trust fund of up to $10,000,000 by generous donations to its incorporated trusteeship, the Disabled American Veterans' Service Foundation, 546 Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.

This D. A. V. Service Foundation has seven trustees, five of whom each serve for 5-year terms, one expiring each year and replaced by another as confirmed by the national convention of the D. A. V., and the other two of whom automatically consist of the national commander and national adjutant of the D. A. V. These trustees serve without remuneration.

Donations received by the D. A. V. Service Foundation may be placed into separate State trust-fund accounts according to State of origin, for allocation to the D. A. V., when needed, for the expense of maintaining one or more full-time national service officers in each such State.

WHY D. A. V. NEEDS OUTSIDE HELP

Many eligible disabled veterans do not become paid-up members of the D. A. V., and thus help to maintain its Nation-wide service set-up on behalf of less fortunate disabled veterans, for varied reasons; some because they know very little about the D. A. V., some because of indifference, others because of selfishness, some because of negligence, and many others because they cannot afford it. If they all understood the implications involved, every service-disabled veteran would decide that he should belong to the D. A. V.

The American public is, I am confident, desirous of fulfilling its obligation that those who return from hazardous military employment in the armed forces of the United States, handicapped by some physical or mental scars incurred by reason of such active service, shall be adequately provided for by a grateful Nation.

The D. A. V. is helping to protect and to promote the best interests of disabled veterans, and of the general public, by maintaining and further expanding its national service bureau in Washington, D. C., and its Nation-wide set-up of national service officers. To do the job properly, however, the D. A. V. needs to have at least three or four times as many full-time national service officers as it now has.

Such a service program deserves the solid support of all service-disabled veterans and of all Americans.

COMMENDATIONS OF D. A. V.

Among many statements commending the D. A. V. and its rehabilitation services, the following are a few examples:

The purpose of your Nation-wide rehabilitation program * * * to extend needed assistance to members of our armed forces who become disabled, as well as to disabled veterans of the World War and their dependents, is, indeed, a worthy one and merits the full support of our citizens. (Franklin D. Roosevelt, President.)

Please express for me to the Disabled American Veterans my continued appreciation of their services to the country. (Herbert Hoover, former President.)

It is, therefore, particularly gratifying to me to learn of the plans of the Disabled American Veterans to expand its already extensive service program so as to make available to the handicapped servicemen of World War No. 2, who are coming out of the present conflict in ever-increasing number, the valuable advice and assistance it has long rendered their fathers of World War No. 1. These new veterans and their dependents also will need a helping hand, and I hope that the organization will meet with complete success in its campaign to provide now for the extension to them of its worthy activities. (Gen. John J. Pershing.)

During the last 24 years national service officers of the Disabled American Veterans have rendered valuable assistance to disabled veterans and their dependents and, incidentally, have facilitated the work of the Veterans' Administration and its contacts for such service claimants. Your national service officers, being themselves disabled veterans, can be most helpful in instructing and impressing claimants as to the necessary legal requirements and limitations under the laws enacted by the Congress. (Gen. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.)

In spite of its small number, I feel that the Disabled American Veterans has, in the years since I have been in Congress, been the most effective organization for the benefit of the ex-servicemen. (Senator Bronson Cutting, deceased.)

The Disabled American Veterans are a heritage of proven patriotism. Let's serve God by serving humanity. (Congressman WRIGHT PATMAN.)

The Military Order of the World War passed a resolution endorsing the Disabled American Veterans * * * for the purpose of assisting disabled veterans in the preparation and presentation of their claims * * * a most important work. (Col. George E. Ijams, past commander in chief Military Order of the World War.)

I know of no organization that I can more heartily commend and support than the D. A. V., whose purpose is the rescue and helping of disabled veterans. Let us hope all loyal Americans will recognize the D. A. V.'s humanitarian objective and program as their opportunity to demonstrate loyalty and patriotism. The people of the United States must not and will not fail those who did not fail them. (Gen. Robert Lee Bullard.)

Be assured that we of the American Federaton of Labor, who have long relied upon the principle that unity develops strength, look with favor upon the valuable service-giving activities of the Disabled American Veterans' organization. (William Green, president of American Federation of Labor.)

Labor's heart goes out to the disabled veterans, many of whom come from its own ranks, and we are eager to do everything we can to help these handicapped veterans and their dependents to secure the fair and generous treatment to which they are entitled. (Philip Murray, president, Congress of Industrial Organizations.)

It affords me real pleasure to heartily endorse the Disabled American Veterans * * * to assist individual deserving veterans in their local needs and in the technical prosecution of their equitable claims for compensation resulting from war-incurred disabilities. (James E. Van Zandt, past commander in chief Veterans of Foreign Wars.)

Helping disabled veterans to help themselves and getting the help of the Nation for those who need help, a big dividend-paying investment in real Americanism, is the self-appointed task of the Disabled American Veterans. (Representative ED. V. IZAC, of California.)

To see to it that worthy disabled veterans, of all of America's wars and their dependents, are enabled technically to establish their equitable claims for various types of benefits provided by existing legislation, the D. A. V. maintains the largest staff of nationally paid National service officers, one or more in nearly every regional office of the Veterans' Administration, of any veteran organization. (Hon. THOMAS E. MARTIN, of Iowa.)

The D. A. V. is striving to see to it that justice is extended to the Nation's disabled war defenders of the past, present, and future. (Hon. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER, of Indiana.)

Americans who help to provide security for America's disabled defenders thereby help to provide security for America. (Senator HOMER T. BONE.)

This comprehensive program of the D. A. V. is well integrated, looking to the welfare of our country, our communities, and our comrades. (Representative JAMES H. FAY, of New York.)

This Changing World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS S. GORDON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Constantine Brown, entitled, "This Changing World," that appeared in the Washington Evening Star of May 6, 1944:

THIS CHANGING WORLD

(By Constantine Brown)

The question of the future of Poland is likely to become an important issue in America's domestic affairs, not because of the several million voters of Polish decent in this country but because Poland is a "test case" for the future reorganization of the world.

The people of the United States entered this war for several reasons, one being the desire to preserve the rights of the smaller nations which were trampled under the boots of Hitler's troops.

Great Britain declared war on Germany because Hitler would not listen to reason and invaded Poland with the definite intention of subjugating that country of 35,000,000 persons. But while the British Government for centuries has played power politics because the interests and security of the empire required, at no time in our history has power politics been envisaged either by the American people or their Government.

The European diplomatic puzzle brought Russia into the anti-Hitler camp in 1941. The Soviet follows a twofold policy—to defeat Hitler, thereby eliminating a permanent menace to Russian security, and to expand her territory to her 1914 boundaries. The latter consideration requires the suppression of the sovereignty of the so-called border states, Finland, the Baltic republic and Poland.

It is immaterial whether this is performed in a modern streamlined manner by incorporating them as partners of the U. S. S. R. or by organizing governments subservient to Moscow or, as in the case of the Baltic republics, by direct annexation through a spurious plebiscite. The important fact, as seen from this country, is that the border states in some cases will be allowed to choose their governments from the inside while Russian forces are in full occupation of their territory.

There are strong rumors, supported by some facts, that the Washington and London governments at the Moscow and Tehran conferences accepted the Soviet view regarding its influence on the border territories. If this were not so, Prime Minister Churchill, the cocreator of the Atlantic Charter, would not have expressed himself so openly last February 22 endorsing Russia's territorial claims on Poland.

After the Moscow Conference a new organization, called the European Advisory Committee, was organized, composed of the Ambassadors of the United States and Russia and a representative of the Foreign Office, Sir William Strang. This organization, we were led to believe, would handle all matters which had been left in abeyance at the conference of Secretary of State Hull, Foreign Secretary Eden and Foreign Commissar Molotov. It then would make recommendations to the respective governments. But there is no evidence that the Polish question has been submitted to the committee.

A large number of Members of Congress have taken advantage of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Polish Constitution to declare on the floor of the Senate and House that the people of the United States do not indorse any move depriving Poland of her sovereignty.

Last Wednesday 26 Senators and 82 Members of the House, representing a cross-section of Congress, from New Deal adherents to opponents of the administration, expressed clearly the view of their constituents who do not want to see power politics played at the expense of the smaller nations. Representatives of all parties, from Maine to California and from Florida to Oregon, had something to say about the necessity of maintaining Poland's integrity. The speeches were not preelection addresses. American voters of Polish descent are strong in only six States and the Members of Congress spoke under the guise of paying tribute to Poland, but in fact issued a warning to all concerned about how the American people feel.

The specialists on North American affairs in Moscow may take the hint that if there is going to be post-war cooperation among the present opponents of Hitler, it must be on an equitable basis in which the wishes of the American people should receive due attention.

An Expression on Socialized Medicine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, there recently took place in the city of Plymouth, Wayne County, Mich., within the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent, a public debate on a question of public interest. The question debated was Should Congress Adopt Socialized Medicine? A time and place were agreed upon for the debate. Public notices were sent out under an organization known as the Plymouth Public Forum.

This forum was granted a charter by the State of Michigan giving it the sole right to use the name above indicated for 30 years. It is a body organized and planned to provide a neutral platform for the frank presentation of all sides of vital public affairs. It is a nonsectarian, nonpartisan and nonprofit organization.

At the conclusion of the recent debate on the subject, Should Congress Adopt Socialized Medicine? a secret vote was taken with the following result: Five ballots were cast for socialized medicine and 34 were against socialized medicine.

The forum has created, and I predict will create, general public interest in issues affecting the people.

Notices of the meeting informed the people that the result of the debate and the ballot would be sent to their Representative in Congress. I present the result not only to the House of Representatives, but to the country.

I am attaching hereto a notice of the debate:

You are the judge.

It is time to vote on the pending new super security act which will cost about $200 per family per year.

Hear it debated: Should Congress Adopt Socialized Medicine? by a C. I. O. speaker, a doctor, and a lawyer. Hear it, discuss it, then vote. Ballots will be sent to Representative GEORGE DONDERO.

The fifth public forum, Friday May 5, 8 p. m., Starkweather School Auditorium.

Rhode Island Bends Every Effort To Help Its Citizens in the Armed Forces to Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AIME J. FORAND

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, in fairness to the boys and girls in the armed service who because of their absence from home might be deprived of a voice in the selection of those who will be elected to run our Government beginning next January, the State of Rhode Island has taken every possible step. During the session of the general assembly, which closed a few days ago, legislation was enacted that will provide not only for recognition of the Federal war ballot but also for a complete State and municipal ballot to be furnished our people in uniform.

Under leave previously granted to me I include as a part of my remarks a digest of the legislation prepared by the chairman of the Rhode Island State Board of Election, the Honorable Albert J. Lamarre:

The legislative enactments to make possible an all-out servicemen's vote are contained in two acts, Chapters 1470 and 1472 of the Public Laws, 1944, copies of which are enclosed. The first act details the procedure whereby servicemen may vote irrespective of their being on current voting lists, thus waiving our registration requirements. Briefly, this is what chapter 1470 provides:

1. It applies to all members of the armed forces of the United States or of the merchant marine in active service and to any person absent from the State in the performance of services intimately connected with military operations. This last means persons serving with the American Red Cross, the Society of Friends, the Women's Auxiliary Service Pilots, and the United Service Organizations.

2. Naturally it requires that any such voter must be a citizen of the United States and prior to entering such service has lived in Rhode Island for 2 years and in his own town or city for at least 6 months. This right to vote shall exist during the tenure of service and for a period of 2 years thereafter.

3. Should any such voter happen to be within the State on election day he may vote in person at his proper voting place and should he have received a war ballot and still have it, he must surrender it, or if he has not received one or has lost or destroyed the same, he must make oath before his board of canvassers or town clerk to that effect, then he may vote in person.

4. Should he, having received not only a State and local war ballot but also a Federal war ballot, and return all of them, the State and local war ballot shall be counted and the Federal ballot declared void.

5. In order that war ballots may be sent to all Rhode Islanders in the services above referred to, the Secretary of State shall:

A. Honor applications for the same as made by personal form application by the voter.

B. Honor requests signed by any person other than the voter if the same contains the Rhode Island residence and home address of the voter and the address to which the ballots are to be sent.

C. Honor all post-card applications which may be received by a prospective voter as a result of the Federal War Ballot Commission's coverage of all servicemen and other persons permitted to vote war ballots.

6. Two sets of ballots are to be printed by the Secretary of State. One, a so-called State and Federal office ballot, and another for local, city, and town candidates. These ballots will follow the old form of paper ballot, except that in the case of Providence, which is split as to the congressional districts, the names of both party nominees for each party shall be printed on the face of the ballot, "with one square at the right of both names and a vote therefor shall be counted only as a vote for the candidate of the district wherein the voter resides and has his home." Of course, if the voter votes in the circle above the party column, this same condition holds true.

In the case of Providence with its 5 senatorial and 25 representative districts, and Pawtucket with its 2 senatorial and 10 representative districts, there shall be printed on the ballot "a statement to the effect that a vote to such office shall be counted for the appropriate candidate of the party in whose column the space for the office appears"; and on the reverse side of the ballot there shall be printed "the names and addresses of the candidates for Senator and Representative for each such senatorial and representative district." This same principle applies to other cities and towns having more than 1 representative district, and also for local tickets where ward or voting district candidates cannot be voted for as a city or town-wide proposition. Also, the ballot must contain a space for any referendum question authorized to be submitted to the voters. Split tickets are to be effected just as in the old-time paper ballot method.

7. Any voter qualified to receive these war ballots is required to vote them secretly, at any time after receiving the same on or before election day, November 7, 1944, and after voting he shall place the ballots in a so-called inner envelope, which must be securely sealed, and shall fill in and subscribe to an oath printed upon said inner envelope. On the outside of this envelope there will be printed the following:

"Official Rhode Island war ballots.
"Name of voter----------
"Rhode Island home address----------
"Street and number (if any) or rural route ----------
"City or town----------"

A form of oath is also contained on this envelope and must be attested to before any commissioned or noncommissioned officer not below the rank of sergeant or petty officer or any other person authorized to administer this oath. This inner envelope must then be placed in an outer envelope which is provided to the voter and the same must then be returned to the board of elections on or before December 4, 1944.

8. As a safeguard against persons voting upon the names of service men and women who either are real-estate voters or registered before they entered the services, or at any time they were home on furlough, the Secretary of State after he has sent out the ballots shall furnish to the local boards of canvassers and town clerks a certified list of the names and addresses of all persons to whom ballots have been sent. It is the duty of said boards of canvassers and town councils to strike off of any voting list the names of all persons appearing on the voting lists and contained on the certified list from the secretary of state, and against each such name thus stricken the letters W B must be printed, stamped, or written. In this way it is illegal for any person to vote at the election on any name thus designated.

As a further safeguard against improper voting, if any serviceman presents himself on election day and surrenders his ballot or takes oath that it is either lost or destroyed, and if he is permitted to vote under the circumstances his board of canvassers or town clerk shall certify the names of such persons to the board of elections so that should a ballot appear after December 4 containing the name of such person, it shall not be counted.

9. Authority is given the board of elections to open the outer envelope of all ballots received before and up to December 5 so that each inner envelope shall be stamped with the proper representative and ward or voting district of the person thus voting. The reason for this is to facilitate the counting of the State ballots as well as to make it possible that when the inner envelopes are opened the local ballots may be properly stamped as to town or city and ward or voting district because these latter must be placed in packages and sealed and delivered to local boards of canvassers or town councils for local counting.

10. There are the usual penalties for violation of the act, and then in addition it provides that the Governor be authorized to certify to the United States War Ballot Commission that the use of the official Federal war ballot is permitted so that if any serviceman does not receive any of the State ballots he may properly use a Federal war ballot.

11. Chapter 1472 was enacted for the purpose of advancing the dates of both State and local caucuses and State conventions in order that war ballots may be printed and distributed at least by August 15 or September 1. This chapter provides for the usual procedure of local parties requesting dates for caucuses, posting notices of the same, and in the case of contests it is arranged that State caucuses shall be held between June 12 and 17 and local caucuses between June 16 and June 21. After these caucuses are held time is permitted for the holding of such conventions as may be necessary so that the final nominations for State offices shall be filed not later than 5 o'clock p. m., July 10, and local nominations filed with local boards of canvassers and town clerks not later than July 12 and subsequently filed with the Secretary of State not later than July 17.

The Soldiers' G. I. Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, as a veteran of World War No. 1, I believe I can discuss veterans' affairs with some understanding. It was my experience to serve in the Army 2 years, 20 months of which was spent overseas with the One Hundred and Fiftieth Field Artillery.

Since World War No. 1, I have been active in veterans' affairs. The American Legion of West Virginia has honored me by election to the highest offices at its command.

As I, through necessity, will be absent from the House the present week, I will make a brief reference to the soldiers' G. I. bill.

I heartily approve of the measure in principle.

Aside from the obligation for the heroic services rendered by our service men and women, it is just good, common business sense to rehabilitate, both physically and financially, our returning men and women from our armed forces. Their prompt absorption into our economic structure on a self-sustaining basis is essential to our national security. This legislation affords a means by which they will become self sustaining and contribute to the national production and general welfare.

I hope I shall return in time to support the soldier's bill of rights.

As Fighters or Prisoners—Nazis Are Still Nazis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 8, 1944

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me, I insert an editorial appearing in the Philadelphia Record entitled "As Fighters or Prisoners—Nazis are Still Nazis." The editorial is as follows:

AS FIGHTERS OR PRISONERS—NAZIS ARE STILL NAZIS

Goebbels has done his work well.

Put Nazis behind barbed wire and they still think they are supermen. Place before them evidence of Hitler's failure in Russia, and they are unconvinced. Show them the proof of inevitable defeat, and they still dream of world conquest.

Even when they see proof of Goebbels' lies; when they observe with their own eyes that New York's skyscrapers are not in ruins, as he told them; that New York has not even been bombed, as he said it was; that America is not starving; that motorcars are still running—

Facts to the contrary, Nazis are still Nazis.

This is the grim lesson of the German prison camps in the United States. It is the warning that if Americans or Britishers or any other peoples let the soft sentimentalists in their midst run things after this war as after the last.

These men behind barbed wire in Jersey, Alabama, and other States will be on hand for World War No. 3 with their sons and daughters waiting for a third attempt at world domination.

A Fort Dix chaplain warned the other day that German prisoners of war are too dangerous to merit sympathy. He knew. He had worked among them at Fort Dix.

Recent stories of those prisoners at Dix mentioned that they have the same kind of food, drink, and barracks as United States soldiers. They have athletic events, their own orchestra, stage shows, etc.—but only once have they shown the faintest sign of appreciation for anything—when a military funeral, Nazi style, was given a prisoner who died.

Writing in the New York Times, F. G. Alletson Cook reported on more than a thousand German prisoners in a West Virginia camp. He inspected their comfortable living quarters and well-filled kitchens. They get butter, not margarine. But they are stiff, sullen, determined—and confident Germany eventually will conquer.

A similar account of Nazis in an Alabama prison camp was given by Peter Kihss in the New York Herald Tribune. Nearly 3,000 men there are living in comparative luxury, in excellent health—but still active Nazis—using the Nazi salute, sneering in demeanor, and sure of eventual victory.

In a camp near Colorado Springs only two German prisoners out of thousands returned United States officers' salute properly—all the rest used the Nazi salute. At Fort Custer, Mich., a great celebration was held for Hitler's recent birthday—even though such Nazi demonstrations are not authorized by the Geneva Convention.

Yes, there are a few non-Nazis among them. Some have been subjected to persecution, a number have been killed, including one found hanged at the Papago Park camp near Phoenix, Ariz.

But the overwhelming majority of these prisoners warns us—must warn us—that the greatest fallacy peddled to Americans today is that we need only beat the German Army and toss Hitler and a few top Nazis in jail—and civilization thenceforth will be safe.

We have, as the RECORD has stated so often, a mighty educational job. Many of these Nazis may be past mental delousing. Those who are will have to be policed. And education for the rest—for all Germany—will have to be kept in strict control for enough generations to civilize the master race.

Next time Dorothy Thompson cries: "Listen Hans!" and tells us we should have no ill-will toward the German people—

Let us look at the Nazis in our prison camps, der ubermenschen, who still have the lust of conquest in their minds and the lust of killing in their hearts.

Good Job, Well Done

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, we in Pennsylvania are all proud of the recent special session of the State legislature which enacted into law the best soldier-vote bill in the United States. No partisanship was shown, but a display of patriotism and statesmanship that is heartening compared with the sad performance with the soldier vote bill in our own Congress. I congratulate Governor Edward Martin, a retired United States Army general, who proved himself not only a real soldier but a generous friend of the G. I. Joe everywhere. I also congratulate members of the Pennsylvania State Legislature for their outstanding performance. I am happy to include as part of my remarks an article which appeared in the May 8 issue of the Pittsburgh Press, which is a deserving tribute to all of them.

GOOD JOB, WELL DONE

By their forbearance, their readiness to cooperate, and their patriotism in passing quickly a simple, workable, military ballot law, the general assembly and Governor Martin deserve the gratitude of every Pennsylvanian and every son and daughter in service.

Their performance was in such splendid contrast to the precedents of other legislative sessions in recent years, and to the spectacle of the current Congress in facing the same problem, that it is a refreshing and heartening example for everyone on the home front.

Factional and partisan differences were outlawed; even debate on the five ballot bills was found unnecessary. Nothing counted but prompt and effective action on the matter of insuring a vote for every Pennsylvanian in the service and in service-related war activities.

Thanks, Messrs Representatives and Senators.

Thanks, Mr. Governor.

Thanks, Mr. Democratic State Chairman and Mr. Republican Chairman.

You make us proud to be Pennsylvanians.

A Report on the Political Aspects of the London Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. W. FULBRIGHT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio speech made by me on May 6, 1944:

First, I should like to thank Ed Murrow for arranging and the Columbia Broadcasting System for giving the time for this broadcast. C. B. S. is always generous in its efforts to keep the American people advised of matters of real importance to them. Incidentally, I saw Ed Murrow in London last week and like everyone else over there, he is on the anxious seat waiting for the invasion. The rising tempo of the bombing raids and the preparations for the invasion, are naturally the center of everyone's attention.

I spent a day and a night with our boys at a Flying Fortress base engaged in bombing Germany. Words cannot describe the grim determination of these young airmen. With a selfless concentration on their job, they live, tense and restrained, in a world apart from ordinary mortals. To see them return from a raid makes one ashamed of ever having even mentioned the petty inconveniences which too often we call sacrifices.

It would be a fine thing for our sense of values if everyone could see our boys in action. We can rest assured that they will do their job. I only hope that we at home do as well. All the boys I talked with, many from Arkansas, are anxious to finish the job and they expect us to see that their sons do not have it all to do again. The nearer the approach of invasion and victory, the more urgent becomes the question of whether or not we are going to throw away the fruits of the efforts of these boys, as we did in 1919.

The only substantial benefit, other than a defensive one, that we can hope to obtain from our great expenditures of life and wealth is some assurance of peace in the world. During the First World War, very little was done, before the end of hostilities, toward preparing for the peace. We are all familiar with the sorry spectacle of the peace conference and its failure. Not until the war was over did President Wilson present the League of Nations as a plan for the future. Regardless of the merits of the League as a plan, the fact is that it was not accepted here. The approach to this problem today is different and more promising. Compared to the last war, we have made considerable progress up to now.

Already, the House of Representatives has expressed its view that this Nation should participate in an international organization with power to establish and maintain a just and lasting peace. The Senate has confirmed this policy, and the Executive has participated with our principal military allies in three great conferences at Moscow, Cairo, and Tehran. Furthermore, the United and Associated Nations, 44 of them, have already undertaken collective action in the field of physical relief and rehabilitation, and in the field of agriculture, begun by the food conference at Hot Springs. Now under consideration by these nations, is collective action in the field of education. Discussions concerning aviation, economics, and political relations are also taking place. In this way we are seeking to build an international structure, piece by piece, on sound foundations which, if agreement can be reached in particular controversial instances, will support a workable machinery for the maintenance of peace.

The delegation of which I was a member, sent by our Secretary of State Cordell Hull to confer with the representatives of 17 nations in London, has just reported to the State Department. Considerable progress was made at the conferences toward the creation of a United Nations organization for educational reconstruction. The most urgent function of this proposed organization will be to assist in the revival of education in the liberated countries during the period immediately after the cessation of hostilities.

Assistance in the provision of trained personnel, material aids such as books or materials for printing books, pencils, and tablets, visual aids, scientific apparatus, and library material is contemplated. For the several countries able to pay, this organization will simply coordinate the procurement and transportation of supplies. For those three or four countries without funds, financial assistance from other members is contemplated. While definite amounts have not yet been determined, it is estimated that the amount of money involved in the emergenc period will be a small fraction of that authorized for physical relief under the United Nations relief and rehabilitation program. No commitments have or will be made until the appropriate congressional committees have been fully informec and indicated their approval of the proposals.

The necessity for this assistance is based upon the proposition that the unrestricted education of the people of the world, and the free and unhampered interchange between them of ideas and knowledge is essential to the preservation of security and peace. Our Fascist enemies, recognizing the fundamental importance of enlightened citizens to a society of freemen, with calculated thoroughness, have destroyed the educational resources of great parts of Europe and Asia. The murder of teachers, scientists, professional men and intellectual leaders; the burning of books, and the theft of scientific apparatus has held a high priority with the Fascists. They correctly recognized the fact that to impose permanently their new order on the world, persons capable of leadership together with the means of acquiring knowledge and understanding should be destroyed in the conquered countries. Knowledge of such things as freedom of religion, of the press, of speech, of what we call in a broad sense, the dignity of the individual human being, is dangerous to a Fascist regime. Technical skills and the habit of obedience are the only civic virtues in Germany and Japan. On the contrary, to a democratic system of government by the people nothing is more fundamental and important than a high level of enlightenment and understanding. Thomas Jefferson acknowledged this by his great and effective efforts to establish the University of Virginia. We have only to look about us within our own 48 States to see the coincidence of high standards of education and enlightenment and a prosperous, progressive, and free people.

It may be asked by some that since there is room for improvement in our domestic education, why should we concern ourselves with improving the lot of others? This would be a valid point of view if we could isolate ourselves from the disturbances in the world caused to a great degree by ignorance, poverty, and bad government. It is my belief that since we have at last recognized that we cannot live apart from the world, it is to our own enlightened self-interest to assist in creating conditions which will promote the establishment of a stable order based upon the collective action of the nations. In view of the enormous cost of fighting a modern war every 20 years, it is plain common sense to spend at least a small fraction of that amount in an effort to prevent the recurrence of total war. This is not charity; it is sound conservative business to spend $1 now with a chance of preventing the expenditure of a thousand 20 years from now.

It seems to me rather futile to expend our efforts and money to feed the hungry peoples of Europe and Asia and then do nothing to encourage them in reestablishing free and decent communities. If educational opportunity is denied them, they may well become Fascists in their ignorance and desperation. Many of the young ones will know nothing of any other kind of society. To give them educational opportunity does not mean that we seek to impose our own doctrines directly upon these peoples. It merely means that we have faith in the basic rightness of our Christian democratic civilization, and that if people are permitted to seek the truth through education and the free and unrestricted interchange of ideas, they naturally will develop a society compatible with our own. We do not seek to create identical societies; we do seek enlightenment sufficient to enable diverse peoples to use reason rather than force as the arbiter of their differences.

These efforts by the United Nations in specific fields are logical steps toward the creation of a political organization with power to maintain peace. Aside from the particular merits of each organization, they will give us experience in cooperative action and create mutual confidence and respect among the participants. It is the custom or practice of solving problems by consultation and agreement rather than by war that is all-important.

We have declared it to be our policy, henceforth, to participate with other nations in an effort to create a more stable and peaceful world. The time has arrived to participate in concrete and specific undertakings. Elaborate blueprints of complicated political institutions are not likely to solve our problems.

On the other hand, man has, by the trial and error method, with many failures and disappointments, achieved in some parts of the world, notably in these United States, a fair degree of freedom and justice. By creating this educational organization in cooperation with the other United Nations, we shall acquire experience and shall have taken another step along the long, hard road toward a more peaceful world.

In view of the recent public declarations of our great Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, of Governors Bricker and Dewey, recognizing the world interests of this Nation and the inevitability of our involvement in all major wars, it seems to me that we are now united in our determination to take the leadership in creating the machinery for peace. However, and this is of vital importance, the unanimity on foreign policy which now prevails among our important leaders, is not in the nature of things political likely to continue for long. The time is right now and it is extremely urgent that we take advantage of this opportunity to set up military and political machinery, sufficiently strong to control the lawless 10 percent of humanity which, from time to time, insists upon trying to dominate its fellowmen by force. No one can deny that existing institutions of government are insufficient for our purposes.

Some new machinery with adequate powers must be created now if our fine phrases and noble sentiments are to have substance and meaning for our children.

Abundant America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., of May 4, 1944:

ABUNDANT AMERICA

It seems almost like old times, like a little bit of normalcy, to have most of our meats restored to their prerationed status. No development could better typify the amazing abundance that is America.

As a fully employed nation, where consumer demands are greater than ever before in our history, we are feeding ourselves, and we are helping to feed our allies, and we are feeding the millions in our armed forces at home and overseas. By rights, we should expect to have to ration ourselves indefinitely, particularly because we are on the eve of the fiercest and most decisive events in the war. But at this moment, despite the immense drain on our resources, despite the fact that the requirements of our military forces are at a peak, we are able not merely to continue the feeding without let-up but to let meat—perhaps the most important of all food items—be sold on a virtually unrestricted market.

As explained by Price Administrator Chester Bowles, this development is attributable to a drop in lease-lend requests, a reduction in Army and Navy purchases, crowded storage facilities, and similar factors. Basically, however, although some die-hard critics of rationing may claim that the step could have been taken long ago, it can be credited first of all to the natural bountifulness of our land, and, after that, to the magnificent job done by the Nation's primary producers, by the processors, by the distributors, and by those men—in Government and out—who have been responsible for the over-all management of our food program.

In short, the fact that nearly all our meats are now point-free is a great tribute to anyone who has had anything to do with advancing our wartime food production, from the most obscure pig raiser on up. As for the rationing process itself, if it has seemed at times excessively rigid, it has most certainly played its part well in keeping the country sufficiently and equitably fed. Three or 4 months hence it may have to be applied again to meats, but its past performance has been so creditable that no fair-minded citizen will object if that proves necessary.

The new order of things may, of course, create considerable marketing confusion at first, since it seems only natural that the sudden change will lead to a buying demand greater than supplies on hand in the stores. Moreover, the fact that consumers will now have to make their red points last 4 weeks instead of the usual 2, for butter, choice beef cuts, cheese, etc., may work out as a hardship of sorts in some cases. But all such difficulties ought to yield to solution in reasonable time. Meanwhile, it is instructive to recall that not many months ago more than a few gloomy commentators were predicting that this year the gaunt face of famine would be seen everywhere in our land. America is like that, it is always confounding the Cassandras.

The Montgomery Ward Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER E. MERROW
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include two editorials, one from the Rochester Courier, Rochester, N. H., May 4, 1944, and one from the Carroll County Independent, Center Ossipee, N. H., May 5, 1944, on the Montgomery Ward case.

[From the Rochester (N. H.) Courier of May 4, 1944]

THE MONTGOMERY WARD CASE

From such information as is available, the Federal seizure of the Montgomery Ward & Co. Chicago store and the eviction from his office by the military of Sewell L. Avery, president of the concern, is an incident which demands the most searching inquiry by the Congress and the courts, and if proven unlawful, the prompt and proper curb on those responsible, including the President and the Attorney General of the United States.

The President, under his wartime powers, has the authority to seize and operate any private concern necessary to the successful prosecution of the war and which may fail to comply with wartime demands. Nothing, however, has yet been advanced which proves beyond peradventure that the Chicago store of the great mail-order house was, in fact, engaged in the production or distribution of goods necessary to the war effort. We have only the opinion given by Attorney General Biddle, who on at least one previous occasion has stretched the intent of the law to cover a Roosevelt directive.

Understand, the order was not directed against the entire company, which has somewhere around 75,000 employees throughout the country, but, at the Chicago store alone, which employs about 9,000 persons. The reason for the order: The refusal of the Chicago store to sign a new contract with the C. I. O.

A year ago, after the usual dispute between the C. I. O. and an independent union for the bargaining agency of the company, the President ordered Ward's to sign with the C. I. O. Under protest, the company signed a contract for 1 year. When it expired, the C. I. O. demanded a new contract and Ward's demanded a new vote, claiming that several hundred employees had quit the union. There is nothing to indicate the truth or falsity of the claim, but an honestly conducted election would have done so. Instead, along comes Attorney General Biddle with a tailor-made opinion which classes the mail-order house as a war plant within the meaning of the emergency measure. If Biddle's opinion is sustained, then Filene's of Boston is a war plant, Feineman's of Rochester is a war plant, ex-Mayor Boucher's clothing store in Somersworth is a war plant, and the Rochester Courier is a war plant and we may be tossed out on our rumps as was the 69-year-old president of the Montgomery Ward Co., for merely expressing this opinion.

We hold no brief for Montgomery Ward. They are a huge concern with all the feeling of independence that size and influence arouse. Their record for cooperation with the rights of their employees to collective bargaining may not have been good. But that is not the point. The courts were provided to prove that. The point is, that the President of the United States, acting under debatable authority of an unconfirmed legal opinion, seized a concern engaged in the retail sale of merchandise, which by common interpretation could not seriously hinder or advance the progress of this war.

Under our form of government, the judicial branch gives final interpretation of laws passed by the legislature and administered by the Executive. Considered in its most favorable light, the President's action is a page directly out of Mein Kampf and in complete contradiction of the ideals for which we are supposedly fighting on a dozen different world battle fronts.

Regarding the President's past record, it would be simple not to expect that his ill-considered action was taken with an eye to the coming election and its influence on organized labor and labor's considerable war chest. We doubt, however, if the sober-minded elements of labor will regard it with any less degree of alarm than does any other group.

If the Republicans wanted a campaign issue, they have one now. If there has ever been a time in the past 3 years of war when we were faced with the stark necessity of reaffirming our belief in government of the people, by the people, and for the people, or throwing down our arms and accepting Hitler's theories without a further fight, the time is now. If we had never had a reason for denying Franklin D. Roosevelt a life job in the White House, this high-handed action has provided one as has nothing else in his 12 years as Chief Executive.

Congress will be less than dilatory if it does not demand a complete and thorough investigation of this incident, and it will excite contempt if it does not support Ward's in forcing the matter into the courts for a show-down on whether or not we are still a sovereign people, or have unconsciously become the puppets of a power-hungry autocrat.

[From the Carroll County Independent, Center Ossipee, N. H., May 5, 1944]

ARE THERE NO LIMITATIONS?

It is all very hard for a small-town editor to evaluate this business of the Government seizing Montgomery Ward.

Boiling all reports down to simplest terms, it seems that the C. I. O. had a contract with Montgomery. The contract ran out.

Montgomery Ward demanded an election to see whether their employees wanted to sign up again with the C. I. O. or some other union as their bargaining agent. The Government said to sign with the C. I. O. and then hold the election. The company refused to do this. The plant was seized by the Army and the president set out onto the street by the soldiers.

It is understood that a broad interpretation of the law enabling the Government to seize struck plants was used in this case. Obviously the Government should have the right to seize a strike-closed plant producing war material, no matter whether or not the management is causing the dispute.

But this new interpretation of the law is that Montgomery was aiding indirectly in the war effort, and thus came under the regulation.

If this is so, then almost any law can be stretched in wartime to cover any situation that the Government wants to interfere in. A country store selling overalls and boots to loggers, gloves to shipyard workers, and gasoline to lumber trucks is certainly aiding the war effort as directly, or as indirectly, as Montgomery Ward.

It is impossible to sit back up here in the hills of New Hampshire and say definitely that the intent of Congress was far overdrawn in this interpretation of the War Powers Act. But it is reasonably safe to guess that this is the case.

If such broad interpretations continue, then it is fair to ask, just how long will we continue to live under our present form of a truly democratic government? Of necessity, the Government must have broad and sweeping powers in wartime, but there must be some definite limitation upon even those broad powers.

If there be no such limitation, then no man, no business, small or big, can make any definite plans for the future. Obviously, if a single official, or group of officials can place at will most elastic interpretation of the law, then we will have a government not of law, but of official whim and desire.

Simply because some injustice may have been done in the Montgomery Ward case is no reason for hair tearing and wild declarations that the country has gone to pot. Injustice has been done in this country, by Government, capital, and labor, and will be done again.

But, if a very thorough investigation is not made into this matter and an attempt made to hold officials to strict accountability for their interpretations of the law, both now and in the future, then there should be cause for concern.

The Adoption of the Constitution of Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me in the House of Representatives April 30, 1942:

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I was interested in what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DEWEY] had to say about his personal experiences in Poland. I am reminded of experiences I had in that country back in the winter of 1919–20. I was there twice on business connected with the then Polish Government, and I had an opportunity to learn for myself the intelligence and the determination with which the Poles attacked the problem of the economic rehabilitation of that war-destroyed country.

In order that you may know the conditions which existed there, I need only to remind you that Poland all down the centuries has constituted one of the great battlegrounds of all Europe. Armies have fought back and forth across that country since time began almost. This was especially true of the World War. The Germans and the Russians fought back and forth and back and forth across Poland time after time. Whenever one army was driven from the country, naturally it took with them everything that could be of any possible use to the retreating forces. All that could not be moved but could be used by the successful forces was destroyed. Consequently, one of the most beautiful farming countries I have ever seen was completely denuded of farm stock of every kind, of food, of everything which enabled a farmer to exist. As a result, when riding from Paris to Warsaw and passing through what I believe was one of the most beautiful agricultural sections I have ever seen, I noticed with amazement that hour after hour as I rode through that wonderful country I did not see the first sign of life, except those gathered at the railroad stations hoping to secure transportation to some city, where the bare necessities of life could be had.

When I reached Warsaw I discovered, very much to my amazement, that bread lines were everywhere. One could not walk a half dozen blocks in any direction from the center of that beautiful city without finding bread lines with long lines of half-starved men, women, and children waiting for their daily rations.

I was amazed then, as I still am when I look back to those days, to note that the people in the bread lines were not completely devoid of hope regardless of how desperate their situation was. It is true that they had no money; they had no work; they had no food other than that they were waiting for, but they were not hopeless. Why? Because Poland had been recreated. Poland was again a land of the free. Her people could again hold up their heads and look to the future unafraid. This feeling completely possessed the people of that country, and as a result there is no example in history where any people so completely destroyed economically as were they, who showed the same determination and the same intelligence and who earned the same success, made the same progress toward economic rehabilitation as was made by Poland following that period.

We, in Michigan, know something of the Polish race. They are a deeply patriotic people. We are privileged to have within our borders hundreds and hundreds of thousands of citizens of Polish extraction. In Bay City, my home town, during the days leading up to our active participation in World War No. 1, we had a demonstration of the quality of Polish patriotism. In my county between 20 and 25 percent of the citizens are of Polish extraction. When the third draft came, Bay County's quota for that draft was only 9 men. The reason was that we had had many hundreds of volunteers prior to that time. Whenever a man volunteered from a county, that county was given credit for that enlistment when the succeeding quotas were called for.

The amazing thing to me, and to everyone who knows of it, I believe, is that while the citizens of Polish extraction constituted only 20 or 25 percent of the total population of the county, that 20 or 25 percent had furnished 75 percent of those who had volunteered previous to that time. That is a record which will stand as a lasting tribute to the patriotism of the American citizens of Polish extraction.

Mr. Speaker, knowing the Poles as I do, knowing their determination to live as a free nation, I prophesy that those hundreds of thousands of Poles who are now fighting in the ranks of those opposed to the Axis Powers will form a nucleus around which Poland will again rise and take her proper place in the great family of nations.

Problems of the Physically Handicapped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 9, 1944

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a speech I made last January at a meeting of the American Federation of Physically Handicapped.

I believe it will be interesting to those who may read this speech to know that the Rules Committee of the House has held some hearings recently on House Resolution 230, which is discussed in the address.

Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen, it is a pleasure to be with you this evening. I am interested in the problems of the physically handicapped and welcome this opportunity to discuss with you the situation of the handicapped today and their prospects for the future.

As for today, the war has offered the handicapped an unusual opportunity. It would seem that the humanitarian appeal should be sufficient to create an interest strong enough to unite full public support for aid. But we have not had interest in the employment of the handicapped until the need to produce war material to the limit of our capacity has encouraged industry and Government to discard many prejudices, laws, and regulations which have hindered the handicapped in finding places in the working peacetime world. The handicapped have been employed in all manner of work during this war, and by all reports have rendered a splendid account of themselves.

The handicapped, given this opportunity and showing in their valuable contribution to the war effort that they are fine workers, they are able to produce, they are loyal, and they are devoted, have made a place for themselves in industry and in commerce which, I believe, they will not lose altogether in the return to peace.

No accurate figures on the employment of handicapped persons since Pearl Harbor are available, but it is thought that about 400,000 have been put to work during this period of our greatest effort to produce the weapons for victory.

The Civil Service Commission recently announced that the Government had employed about 17,000 handicapped during the war years. In view of the large number of people who have come into the Government during this time, it is not clear that full opportunity has been granted to the handicapped to perform work for which they are fitted. I hope that we shall learn to make better use of our resources than this indicates.

Since coming to Congress, I have been unable to find any evidence that the problems of our handicapped people are being met by an adequate program, although I think that I have worked about as diligently as anyone in the Congress to discover what agencies are available to render service and aid to the handicapped.

I am told that there are approximately two and a half million handicapped persons in this country now who were not handicapped on December 7, 1941. They have been added to the twenty-five million who were in this country at the time. About one-fifth of us are handicapped. In peacetime we had about 800,000 persons added to the rolls of the handicapped each year.

During peacetime we had about 30,000 persons receiving aid under the Federal-State rehabilitation laws. Every year over 700,000 people becoming handicapped were left carelessly and wastefully and inhumanly outside the aid of these laws. No nation can waste its human lives in such a prodigal manner. I understand that two and a half million people have registered for rehabilitation, and that the Federal Rehabilitation Service has handled about 80,000 cases in the past year and a half. They have not the machinery for doing the job needed by those who have registered. They have certainly not the machinery for searching out the timid and uninformed who are in need and who have not registered.

We must provide for treating those who are seeking aid, and we must provide for the education of those who do not know that they may be helped.

When one sets about trying to find aid for handicapped people his task is a difficult one. If he is diligent, he may discover that many efforts have been made to solve some small phase of the problems of the handicapped, and that his search must lead him to many agencies before he finds the agency which will perform that service which is needed—he may find as many as 17 Federal agencies or, some say, as many as 80. What can the poor handicapped person do? What can the uninformed handicapped person do? He is bound to be confused and he is sure to be bewildered. I am.

There must be one agency from which handicapped persons may learn accurately and simply what help they may receive and what opportunities exist for their rehabilitation and employment.

We might coordinate the multitude of activities in this field in something like a bureau for the welfare of the physically handicapped. We in Congress need to know what is being done and what needs to be done. The general public and the handicapped need the efficiency of such an administration of rehabilitation. We cannot plan a world in which the second bill of rights is extended only to able-bodied citizens. The right to a useful and remunerative job in the industries or shops or farms or mines of the Nation does not belong to the able-bodied man more than to the handicapped man, and certainly the right to adequate medical care and the opportunity to achieve and enjoy good health, which our President spoke of the other day, should belong, first of all, to those most in need of it—our handicapped citizens. The right to adequate protection from the economic fears of old age, sickness, accident, and unemployment, and all the other rights for which we now are paying with every hard-fought battle and every extended energy in the war against fascism, belongs alike to the sick and the well, to the able and to the handicapped. It is time to make a beginning to insure that this shall be an actuality.

It was with these things in mind that I introduced House Resolution 230, which I believe is a sensible approach to the problem. I think the purpose of the resolution is clear. It is: "Resolved, that the Committee on Labor, acting as a whole, or by subcommitee or subcommittees appointed by the chairman of said committee, is authorized and directed (1) to conduct thorough studies and investigation of the extent and character of aid now given by the Federal, State, and local governments and private agencies to the physically handicapped, (2) to study and investigate the diffusion within the United States of such aid to the physically handicapped, (3) employment opportunities for the physically handicapped, and all other questions in relation thereto which would aid the Congress in any necessary remedial legislation, etc."

We cannot begin until we know where we are in solving the problems of our handicapped and their relation to our society. I believe that the Congress is the only organization equipped with sufficient power and facilities to gather from the many Government and private agencies all the facts about aid now possible for the handicapped. We need to know what has been learned by industry about the employment of handicapped persons during this war-production period. We need to learn from those social agencies which have worked on the problem just what sort of aid and how much is required effectively to relieve the physical, social, and economic misery of the handicapped.

I believe that only Congress can gather the information needed and develop from it a sound and progressive program which will effectively bring back the blessings of life to the greatest posible number of those now cut off from some of those blessings because they are handicapped, and because a world torn by wars and depressions and harried by changes has not taken the necessary action to insure their welfare.

The resolution provides for a complete and thorough study of all the problems relating to the handicapped and their needs. It provides for the study of the various types of handicapped—the blind, the deaf, the hard of hearing, the cardiacs, and amputees, the victims of tuberculosis and injury and disease and defects—their talents and abilities.

Before the United Nations has won the victory, we shall with sorrow add the names of thousands of young men injured in battle to the roll of the handicapped. We shall add thousands more men and women injured in our industrial plants. It is imperative that we begin the long task of making a place in our world for our less fortunate brothers and sisters. It is only a little less sacred obligation to our civilian handicapped.

I believe that we shall find we can extend the help of modern science and medicine, and the encouragement of human compassion and concern, to our handicapped, and that we shall find that we, ourselves, have profited by the addition to our national life of a group of people who bring us gifts of great value. We need the inspiration of the courage of our handicapped. We need the great works they can perform. We need to restore to production this group of people who are otherwise left at the mercy of a busy and preoccupied public. We need the miracle of healing and restoring to life and rehabilitation that is possible if we are willing to provide the agencies. So much has been learned, and so much more will be learned. Let us set about the work of making this knowledge available to those who are in need of it. I cannot foretell the miracles of science which will come out of the work our physicians will do during this war in caring for the wounded and dying. But I do believe it likely that they shall learn more about curing ills than they have ever known before. It is our job to see that the blessings of this knowledge shall reach all those who are in need of them.

Many stand in need of assistance now, and many more shall be added to the number before the war ends. The passage of House Resolution 230 will enable us to work for the first time toward a real method of insuring to the physically handicapped of this country the place in our national life which individually we all sincerely desire to see open to each one of the handicapped.

You will get exactly what you fight for, and nothing else. If there is to be a real move forward in a Federal program for the handicapped, then it is axiomatic that the handicapped, themselves, as chief prospective beneficiaries of such a program, must unite, and press it forward to achievement. You cannot do this by mere wishful thinking. You must organize, you must carry on a perpetual campaign of education, both of the public and your own people. You must see that Congress is continually reminded of your needs.

When we have discovered just what need exists, and just what is being done to meet the need, I believe that the people of this country will be surprised and appalled to know just how much work remains to be done before the minimum welfare of the physically handicapped is insured. We shall have to educate ourselves before we shall be able to educate those of limited ability to perform the work they are destined to do.

We shall have to enlarge our present conception of what is possible in rehabilitation, once we become really experienced in rehabilitation. So much lies before us to do and to accomplish. I hope that we may soon make a real beginning by securing the passage of House Resolution 230.

I believe that we shall win our victory and that we shall enter upon a new era of man's humanity to man. What we propose to begin when this legislation is enacted may, I hope, prove to be fruitful in human happiness and in human life.

St. Lawrence River Power and Seaway Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address entitled "St. Lawrence River Power and Seaway Development," delivered by the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], at Watertown, N. Y., on Friday evening, May 5, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

You people gathered here tonight are inaugurating a campaign for a constructive development which will be an important factor in determining the position which America will hold in the post-war world and which may also determine the extent of the security, prosperity, and happiness which the people of this Nation will possess in the future.

For many, many years it has been the hope of the people living in the Great Lakes industrial and agricultural empire that some day they might have free access to the seas and their rightful place in the commerce of the world.

For many years I, too, living in the neighboring State of Vermont from which State a great deal of this great northern New York country was settled and developed, have looked forward almost as eagerly as you have to the time when the great St. Lawrence River might be developed to serve the needs of our country and the needs of our neighboring country—Canada.

During all these years I little dreamed that the time would ever come when it would fall to my lot to introduce into the Congress of the United States a bill providing for this St. Lawrence River development. That day did come, however, and on September 28, 1943, I introduced S. 1385, a bill to provide for the improvement of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin.

Briefly, the bill approves the agreement entered into by the United States and Canadian Governments on March 19, 1941. This agreement provides for the construction of such works as will furnish a 27-foot waterway all the way from the head of Lake Superior to the sea. This waterway will accommodate all but the very largest ships of our Navy and merchant marine.

Since the agreement was signed, considerable work, including the reconstruction of the locks at Sault Ste. Marie, has been completed as a war necessity.

The principal work remaining is the development of the International Rapids section between New York State and Ontario.

The total cost of all new work will be approximately $421,000,000—of which the United States will pay $277,000,000 and Canada $144,000,000. The difference between the cost to the two countries is due to the fact that in 1926 a gentlemen's agreement was entered into by the United States and Canada providing that if one country expended money to improve the waterway, the other would spend an equal amount. Canada has spent, mostly for improving the Welland Canal, some $140,000,000, which we have thus far failed to match.

Of the $277,000,000 to be paid by the United States, $93,375,000 will be repaid by the State of New York over a 50-year period to cover that part of the cost allocated strictly to power development. The contribution from the self-liquidating power project in New York will thus reduce the net liability to the Federal Treasury under the terms of the bill to less than $190,000,000.

There is no question of State's rights involved since the right of New York State and Ontario Province to the power is clearly recognized. Under the terms of the bill New York would agree to permit the sale of St. Lawrence power to public and coperative distributors in other States.

The agreement also provides "for the preservation and enhancement of the scenic beauty of the Niagara Falls and River and for the most beneficial use of the waters of that river."

I understand that such beneficial works would be constructed at Niagara which would permit the additional use of 5,000 cubic feet of water per second by each country without impairing in any way the beauty of the falls. Such works would be of inestimable value to the cities of Niagara Falls, Buffalo, and surrounding territory.

Introducing this bill was not an idle political gesture on my part. I intend to do all within my power as a Member of the Senate to see that it becomes law. To enact this bill into law and to bring about the development of the greatest natural resource in all North America will require the concerted effort of American labor, American agriculture, and American industry and commerce. To secure the cooperation and earnest support of all these groups, it is necessary that they be informed as to what the St. Lawrence seaway and power development is and what the effect will be upon their lives and industries.

Ever since certain private interests 20 years ago failed to secure for themselves the right to acquire the mighty power resources of the St. Lawrence there has been conducted a campaign which reached from one end of this Nation to the other to prevent forever the development of this great river unless such development could be made by private interests for private profit.

The opponents of the St. Lawrence seaway have resorted to all the tricks in the trade. They have told the coal miners that the development of power on the St. Lawrence would ruin the coal industry. This is utterly at variance with the facts, as has been amply proven in the case of the Tennessee Valley Authority, where the use of coal increased 1,000 percent following the development of the water resources of that region.

It is true that the use of coal nationally has fallen off greatly in the last two decades, but in those areas where public power has been developed the use of coal has actually increased. Will an increase of industry in any State reduce the amount of coal consumed? This claim is so ridiculous that it would not be worthy of attention if it were not for the fact that through propaganda methods thousands of coal miners have been led to believe that coal mining really would be injured by the development of the St. Lawrence and a great northeast industrial empire.

Opponents of the seaway have also sold other regions of the country, notably the Atlantic and Gulf coast ports, the idea that an increase in industry and agriculture resulting from St. Lawrence power and access to the sea would reduce the amount of business done by those ports.

The United States Department of Commerce has ably exploded those false assertions but the highly organized and financed group of self-seeking interests have done their work well. Many people in these sections actually believe that New York and New England can only increase their industry and commerce by taking it away from others. They cannot see that a great Nation-wide increase in peacetime production and prosperity would result in greater gains for all. We must make them see this.

It is true that a few people might have to readjust themselves, but a world wherein no changes are made would soon be a stagnant world.

It is probably true that if Buffalo steel could be shipped direct by the seaway to other markets that steel mills in Maryland and elsewhere would face new competition. Yet, the expansion of business created by the seaway development would undoubtedly mean more business for all.

The purposes for developing the St. Lawrence are, first, to provide an easier and direct access for the flow of goods to and from the Great Lakes Basin to the markets of the world.

Secondly, to harness the greatest undeveloped water power in North America.

The third reason for authorizing this development at an early date is the extremely important part which it would play in providing employment for a large number of persons during the post-war reconversion period and permanent employment for an even greater number in the years ahead.

The economic life of a nation depends upon the adequacy of its transportation. This will be truer than ever at the end of this war.

Production problems have largely been solved, but we have made far greater strides in the production of goods than we have in putting those goods into the hands of the people who would use them. Fully half of the wholesale cost of many foods is represented by transportation charges alone, thus contributing to a system of national scarcity and underconsumption. So long as a system of scarcity prevails in our country, we will have unemployment and undernourished, underclothed, and underprivileged people.

The greatest step which can be taken toward making this land of ours a land of plenty is the establishment of a coordinated transportation system which will include airways, highways, railways, and waterways. The greatest unfinished link in this system is the bottleneck which landlocks the Great Lakes Basin with its 45,000,000 population.

Once let the seaway be completed, and the products of farm and factory produced throughout our Great Lakes States and Midwest areas may be loaded on ships at any of the many ports of the Great Lakes for direct shipment to all parts of the world. By the same token, much of the goods and raw material imported into the Great Lakes region would be brought direct to the harbors of our inland cities instead of being unloaded at coastal ports and transported by other means overland at a considerable increase in delay and cost.

Shippers on the Great Lakes need have no fear that foreign boats would take their commerce from them because foreign shipping is not permitted to engage in coastwise traffic in the United States.

Among the important products which would be shipped in bulk from lake ports through the St. Lawrence would be automobiles, grains, soybeans, dairy products, machinery, iron and steel, wood pulp and newsprint, and packing-house products. Among the articles of import we would find coffee, citrus fruits, bananas, rubber, tin, sulfur, vegetable oils, burlap and jute, cottonseed, and lumber.

Can anyone visualize what this free access for shipping would do for our inland empire and still have the effrontery to say that it is not a good thing for America?

Opponents of the seaway have gone so far as to say that we should not develop it because it would benefit Canada. My answer to that is—thank God that it does. A strong Canada is a better neighbor and a better customer. A weak Canada would be a poor neighbor and a poor customer.

The economic welfare of the two nations is closely bound together and in general what helps Canada helps us and what helps us helps Canada. As nations we should grow stronger together for the day may sometime come when we will need that strength and unity far more than we do now.

Opponents of the St. Lawrence-power project have stoutly based their opposition on the grounds that plenty of power was available and there was no need for the development of the 2,250,000-horsepower which would be generated at the Massena Dam.

As recently as 1941 witnesses before a House committee testified that there was enough surplus power available in northern New York to meet all emergencies. How terribly wrong they were.

The war had not been in progress long before steam power generated on the Atlantic Coast was being transmitted hundreds of miles to make up a deficiency in the St. Lawrence Valley and the Secretary of Commerce was arranging for a hundred million dollars to be made available for the development of the aluminum plant and power project at the Shipshaw north of the city of Quebec. Now, we hear the critics saying again "Well, there will be surplus of power after this war, therefore, let's not develop power at Massena because it will not be needed and only contribute further to the surplus."

Let us see what happened after the First World War. In 1915 the total production of electricity in America amounted to 16,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours. In 1916, when we were preparing for war, the production jumped to 21,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours. In 1918 this had increased to 33,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

The war ended that year. Did the use and production of electric power decrease? It most certainly did not. In 1919 it increased still further to nearly 39,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours. In 1920 it went up to 43,000,000,000. It dropped slightly in 1921 and then shot up to 47,000,000,000 in 1922. From then on production increased steadily until in 1929 it had reached the enormous total of 95,925,000,000 kilowatt-hours. There was a slight drop during the great depression years when our industrial plants were idle and then production climbed upward again. By 1940 it had reached the total of 144,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours and in 1943—the latest figures available show that the United States produced a grand total of 220,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity or nearly 10 time the amount which was used during the First World War.

There isn't the slightest doubt but that this power will be neded and used at the close of this war provided it is made available to the American people at reasonable rates.

We are becoming more and more dependent on electricity with each passing year and there is no indication that the saturation point is yet in sight. Every farm, every home, every industry in America will use more and more as time goes on.

We are entering the age of non-ferrous-metal production and use. The production of aluminum is now measured in billions of pounds. It requires 10 kilowatt-hours of electricity to produce a pound of aluminum.

Magnesium has entered permanently into the field of commercial metal production and will be used more and more where the lightness of the metal used is important. We have plenty of material with which to manufacture magnesium here in this northeast section if cheap electric power is available in quantity.

The electric torch will be used upon public works, shipbuilding and construction projects to an extent not dreamed of before the war. The tremendous chemical industry with its scientific advances necessitated by war will continue as the peacetime servant of the people.

Farmers today are using low-cost nitrate fertilizer as a result of new discoveries which can only be utilized if electric power is plentiful and cheap. The farmers of America will never willingly go back to the days of high priced nitrogen. If perchance they are forced to do so, then they will be unable to compete with the rest of the world in the production of crops.

Since the war began, thousands upon thousands of farms in our north country have been equipped with electric milking machines and water coolers. Barns have been wired for lighting. Only through this increased use of electricity has the American farmer been able to produce the enormous crops which have been demanded of him. During this past year, in spite of the scarcity of material, the emergency has been so great that the War Production Board has authorized the extension of electricity to 78,000 farms on the rural electrification systems alone. How many more farms have been connected by the private utilities I cannot say, but the number must be very great.

There are still millions of rural homes and farms in America that are not served by electric light and power. We cannot consider our rural life in America very near perfect so long as this condition prevails. Many countries of Europe are far ahead of us in this respect. The countries of South America and other parts of the world are rapidly catching up. We must not be content until every farm home in America is equipped for electricity.

As I look into the future, I see millions of rural homes where farm families live richer and happier lives because of new electrical appliances. I see electric hay dryers making the farmer independent of weather conditions. I see on every farm and in every village home and even in the apartment houses of the cities quick-freezing facilities and storage which will tremendously cut the cost of living.

Farmers will be living on fruit and vegetables and meats of their own production the year around. Town and city people will be buying food in quantity in surplus seasons at low prices and storing it to use in seasons of low supply and high prices. They will use a great amount of electrical energy in doing this.

There will be no surplus of power for long after this war. There may be a year or a year and a half when consumption of electric power will drop. Then history will repeat itself and consumption will become greater than ever before. We will need not only all that is being produced now, but a great deal more than must be secured from new sources.

The Massena Dam will have an annual average output amounting to 13,200,000,000 kilowatt-hours. In terms of annual output of electricity, it will be the largest project of its kind in the world and over three times as great as the great Dneiper Dam in Russia. It is estimated that St. Lawrence power can be delivered wtihin a 200-mile radius for not much over 2½ mills per kilowatt-hour This means that it could be sold at a price substantially below that which now generally prevails. It would mean that Northeastern United States could offer to industry equal inducement with the Southern and Western portions of our country where cheap power now prevails and thus maintain a balance in our national economy.

It would indeed mean that most of the companies distributing electricity would have to lower their rates, but they would sell a great deal more. Experience in a great many sections has proven that when electric rates are lowered, sales increase to such an extent that the profits of the companies usualy increase rather than decrease.

There has been some attempt to spread fear among the stockholders of utility companies that development of the St. Lawrence power would jeopardize their investment. The best answer to this is the statement of Leo T. Crowley, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, testifying before a House committee on July 3, 1941 Mr. Crowley said:

"It has been contended that the opening of this seaway would harm the railroads and public utilities of the northeast section of the country. If this were true in any appreciable degree, the security obligations of these businesses would suffer. Since the banks insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation hold about $350,000,000 of railroad security obligations and $625,000,000 of public utility security obligations, I could not support this legislation if I thought that the railroads and public utilities would, on the whole, be affected adversely. Fortunately the evidence indicates that the great advantages of opening up the Great Lakes to ocean traffic will not bring corresponding harm to the railways, and that the energy developed in the St. Lawrence will not hurt the utilities, but will rather fit into the long-term growth of our need for power.

"There is, therefore, little possibility that the investment character of railroad and public utility security obligations will be harmed by the legislation under consideration. Indeed, it may well be that their investment quality will be enhanced. * * *

"It is entirely reasonable to conclude that the eastern roads will be gainers rather than losers on balance."

Then Mr. Crowley goes on to say:

"What I have said relative to the effects of the St. Lawrence project on the railroads applies equally well to the public utilities. The power development will not hurt them and may indirectly benefit them. I have already pointed out that according to predefense estimates some 2,500,000 more horsepower of energy will have to be made available to the people of New York State in the next 10 years. Inasmuch as the American share of St. Lawrence power, about 1,100,000 horsepower, would provide less than half of this increase in anticipated demand, it is obvious that the hydroelectric development at the International Rapids constitutes no competitive threat whatever to existing public utilities."

These remarks which I have quoted are not taken from the speech of any Socialist orator, but from the statement made by one of America's hardest-headed businessmen and who is responsible for the protection of billions of dollars worth of bank deposits, a large percentage of which are invested in railroad and public-utility holdings.

A few days ago I received a telegram advising me that the St. Lawrence development was indefensible because it would require so many men to construct it and that we needed the men for other purposes.

This is in line with the testimony given by opponents of the seaway at the hearings before the House committee 3 years ago. It was maintained by opponents at that time that the seaway should not be constructed because it would require the labor of so many men.

War Department engineers estimated that the project construction work would require the labor of 10,000 men over a 4-year period. Opponents claimed emphatically that the 10,000 men required to do the actual work of construction was only a starter. They pointed out the thousands of men who would be required in transportation, in home construction, in the manufacture of materials, in the dredging of harbors and other work naturally accompanying the work of constructing the dam.

In fact, they insisted that construction of the St. Lawrence seaway would require the labors of 100,000, 80 percent of them skilled or semiskilled, over a 4-year period. They objected to this great development, they said, because we could not spare the manpower.

Now we are asking that this great undertaking be made a post-war project. Any project that will furnish employment for 100,000 men over a 4-year period is going to play a mighty important part in handling the load of unemployment which inevitably follows war. Giving work to 100,000 men means support for a half-million people. It means more than that. It means business for railroads; business for the coal mines; business for the merchants of every town in up-State New York. It means business for the stores and manufacturers of Rochester, Buffalo, Syracuse, Utica, and every other city. It means lightening the fear of returning soldiers that they will have to join the ranks of the unemployed. The opponents of the seaway have themselves made one of the most potent arguments in favor of its construction.

I have had enough of W. P. A. and relief rolls. I have had enough of "make work" projects and their humiliating environment. There is enough work in America that ought to be done to give every returning serviceman an honest job. If the St. Lawrence seaway development will use the services of 100,000 skilled and semiskilled workmen over a 4-year period, it will stand out as one of the most important public works that can be undertaken.

It will be one of the most important for more than the reason that 100,000 men may be employed because of its construction. It will be more important because when its navigation and power facilities are completed it will contribute to the employment and prosperity of every town and city in this great north country and contribute permanently to the battle against unemployment.

Some opponents of the St. Lawrence development take the position that providing benefits for most of the people can only be done by depriving others of what they consider rightly theirs. They ignore the fact that this is a growing nation.

The very fact that the electrical output of the United States has increased from 14,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours in 1914 to 220,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours in 1943 should convince anyone that our economic life is not static.

It is estimated by the Department of Commerce that the "average tons of freight originating in the decade of 1950 will probably be between 242,000,000 and 374,000,000 greater than the average of 1930–39. The 10,000,000 tons of additional American traffic which may use the St. Lawrence at maximum utilization would be but a fraction of the expected increase in railroad activity."

This estimate of the increase in freight tonnage was made in 1940. Since that time we have engaged in the greatest war in history. American servicemen, American ships, American corporations, American Government representatives are distributed over every part of this globe today.

The tremendous increase in shipping and in air transportation is opening a new era in world commerce. International commerce will be the world's greatest industry after the war. Production of American farms and factories will find its way to every country on the globe and the raw materials and goods from those countries will be received by us in return. The imagination cannot comprehend the extent of the increase in world commerce which is coming. We must be ready for it.

Much of the commerce of other lands will originate on inland waterways, or be loaded directly on ocean-going vessels. Five-sixths of the earth's area is covered with water. For the most part, the world's commerce will be water-borne, although most of the passenger traffic and enormous quantities of perishable goods will be transported by air.

It will be a highly competitive world, too. If we are to maintain the standard of living which Americans enjoy now, we must meet that competition.

Transportation and power will be vital factors in meeting it. Transportation must be both cheap and adequate. Manpower must be complemented with electric power if the high wage level of American industry is to continue.

The St. Lawrence seaway will contribute materially to both these factors. It will be almost indispensable. We have every right to demand that authorization for its construction be granted by Congress now.

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorials having to do with the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway. They appeared in the Caledonian-Record, of St. Johnsbury, Vt., on May 5 and 6 of this year.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Johnsbury (Vt.) Caledonian-Record of May 5, 1944]

AIKEN AND THE SEAWAY

Pending in the Congress and referred to a subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee is the bill of Vermont's junior Senator, GEORGE D. AIKEN, for the construction of dams and power works in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River and for the completion of a deep waterway whereby grain and other products of the Plains States could be shipped directly to all parts of the world.

Alleged by its backers to be the last great national resource left on the North American continent and comparable in importance with the Panama Canal, the St. Lawrence seaway project merits the consideration and study of all Vermonters.

From a political standpoint the project is also of significance. In lending his active support in promotion of the vast undertaking for harnessing the waters of the St. Lawrence, Senator AIKEN has been charged with inconsistency. How, it is argued, can he support the St. Lawrence and at the same time oppose the Dummerston project in the West River Valley of Vermont? Do not both involve the use of navigable streams for the purpose of constructing hydroelectric plants under public ownership?

Senator AIKEN expresses the belief that his attitude is consistent, logical, and that his action in introducing a bill to harness the waters of the St. Lawrence is in the best interests of the people of Vermont.

Before an analysis of the views of the junior Senator is presented, it is necessary to acquaint our readers with the highlights of the St. Lawrence seaway project—an undertaking national in scope and of economic import to the heaviest populated areas of this country.

In March of 1941 at Ottawa, the United States Government and the government of Canada signed a pact known as the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Agreement. This agreement included two projects. The first objective called for the construction of a dam across the St. Lawrence River, probably at Massena, N. Y.—a dam which would develop 1,100,000 horsepower of electricity within the boundaries of the United States.

As a part of the project is the authorization for a deep-water canal and locks to by-pass the dam. Once constructed, it would be possible for ocean-going ships to dock at Buffalo, Chicago, Cleveland, Duluth or any other Great Lakes port.

Under normal conditions, about 3½ years would be required to build the dam. Total cost of the project to the United States has been estimated at $256,170,000. Senator AIKEN'S bill (S. 1385) calls for congressional approval of the agreement made by the two governments in 1941 and for immediate construction of works allocated to the United States. It further provides for the negotiation of an agreement with the power authority of the State of New York to result in a transfer to this authority of the power facilities at the proposed dam upon payment of the sum of $93,375,000 over a period of years.

The Aiken bill specifically includes provisions assuring a "widespread equitable distribution of the power to public agencies in other States, including municipalities, public-power districts and rural electric cooperatives with economic transmission distances. * * *"

With this as a background, we are in a position to consider in tomorrow's issue the particular effect of this vast internal improvement upon the Government's plans for the development of the resources of the Connecticut River and Senator AIKEN'S reasons for advocating the St. Lawrence project while opposing the ravaging of farms and village properties by the construction of a Government power project in the West River Valley of Vermont.

[From the St. Johnsbury (Vt.) Caledonian-Record of May 6, 1944]

AIKEN AND THE SEAWAY

In yesterday's issue we outlined the most important details of the bill introduced into the Congress by Vermont's Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN for the approval of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence agreement and for the immediate construction of power facilities of the St. Lawrence seaway project.

Is the Senator inconsistent in lending his support to this vast public-ownership project while opposing the construction of a Government power dam in the West River Valley of Vermont?

Senator AIKEN denies any allegation of inconsistency. On the contrary, he vigorously asserts that only through the development of St. Lawrence River power will there be decreased pressure to construct dams and flood the valleys of eastern Vermont.

The Senator bases his thesis on the need of more and lower-priced power, and in this he is supported by sources which assert that in the next decade the whole eastern industrial area is going to require a great deal more power than is now available or in sight through lesser developments. Apart from present and prospective demand originating in defense activity, it is said that New York State alone will require an additional 2,500,000 horsepower of electrical energy. In consequence, more and more pressure is brought to bear to construct power dams across the Connecticut River in Vermont.

In the opinion of the Vermont Senator, some of these dams can be built without serious damage to the development of the State. In other instances the damages to Vermont's future prosperity would outweigh the benefits received. In the latter category he places the proposed dam at Dummerston in the West River Valley. Senator AIKEN points out that hundreds of families have moved into this valley in recent years; that the development was proceeding at an accelerated pace at the outbreak of the war and will be resumed when the war ends. If the valley is flooded, the area cannot be used for future residential, agricultural, or industrial development.

Without minimizing the need of flood-control dams constructed at intervals on an entirely different basis, the Senator contends that one sure way to relieve the pressure for power dams in the Connecticut Valley and to provide cheap power needed if the Northeast is to hold its own with areas of the South and West is by development of the vast St. Lawrence power project. It is believed that St. Lawrence power could be delivered within a radius to include the cities of Burlington and St. Albans for about 2 mills per kilowatt and within a radius to include all of Vermont except a few towns in the southeastern part of the State for not more than 2½ mills per kilowatt. It is to be doubted that electricity developed from waterpower available in Vermont could be distributed at such a low cost.

Nor does Senator AIKEN slight the importance to Vermont farmers of a navigation project on the St. Lawrence River. With a gross reduction in unloading and reloading costs on bulk cargoes destined to all parts of the world, it is estimated that the average saving on the cost of grain to Vermont farmers would equal $2 per ton—amounting to a total saving of nearly a million dollars a year.

The Senator believes that the St. Lawrence development would stimulate industrial and agricultural enterprise in all the Northeastern States and bring about a population increase in the area.

Pointing to the non-partisan character of sponsorship, for the St. Lawrence project, Senator AIKEN calls attention to the fact that the project cannot properly be referred to as President Roosevelt's "baby." The development was first urged by Calvin Coolidge in his annual message to the Congress in 1923. The chairman of the St. Lawrence Commission in the Coolidge administration was none other than Herbert Hoover who continued to work for the project after he became President.

Aiken's sponsorship of the Senate bill indicates his intense interest in the St. Lawrence development. He is represented as being convinced that the only hope of preventing a further exodus of industry from the Northeast after the war is through completion of the project. He believes that St. Lawrence power would enable this section of the country to compete on even terms with other parts of the United States now having advantages in power costs and that unless this source of power now running unharnessed to the sea is utilized, the pressure to construct power dams and flood Vermont valleys will steadily increase.

We believe that the views presented by Vermont's able and conscientious legislator are logical and not subject to the charge of inconsistency. We believe that irrespective of the outcome of the pending legislation for development of the resources of the St. Lawrence River and in the face of known opposition, GEORGE AIKEN will pursue a course constantly characterized by an integrity of purpose and primary regard for the best interests of the people of Vermont.

Return to the Farms of Servicemen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, many plans have been formed with respect to the opportunities to be afforded servicemen when the war shall have ended, and naturally the Senate would be much interested in what was in the hearts and minds of the servicemen themselves with respect to after-war plans. The Greater North Dakota Association has made a comprehensive survey to ascertain the wishes of men from North Dakota who are in the service, and I ask unanimous consent that the release on this survey, under the head "Servicemen want to buy North Dakota farms," be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SERVICEMEN WANT TO BUY NORTH DAKOTA FARMS

According to next of kin, 88 percent of the men who went to war from rural North Dakota want to return to a farm in this State.

This statement is backed by figures of a State-wide survey which has extended through 42 of the 53 counties, with answers tabulated from 6,285 North Dakota farm boys now fighting on the seven seas, several continents, and in the stratosphere.

The survey, conducted by the Greater North Dakota Association, is attracting attention of post-war planning organizations in several other States, where, it is indicated, the North Dakota plan will be inaugurated.

Perhaps this finding is not so surprising when it is considered that 5,039 servicemen, or more than 80 percent of those reported upon, were engaged in farming when called to the colors. Yes; and 1,575 of these boys were operating on their own before the war uprooted them from the soil.

Today, mothers, fathers, brothers have reported in reply to questionnaires that 5,523 indicate a desire to return to farms in their home communities. It is significant that this is 88 percent of the total number reporting.

Parents may be prejudiced, and heartsick wishes may have fathered, or mothered the opinion, but certainly figures gathered by township reporters in 779 townships do indicate a real love of the State which in 1943 was first in production of wheat in the Nation, produced a half billion in new wealth, and bought most War bonds per capita.

A number of the younger men want to complete school or attend college. Some 17 percent have no plans formulated.

However, the fact that the average savings of the men, the resources they have in cash, real estate, and War bonds, was $1,050 for each of the 6,235. As in more peaceful pursuits, some have not laid up a dollar, while savings run to $10,000 for certain individuals.

The survey was made at the request of a State-wide farmland fact-finding conference held in Fargo, February 11.

At this meeting a committee was named consisting of B. E. Groom, G. N. D. A. secretary; Rt. Rev. William T. Mulloy; Bradley C. Marks, president of the National A. O. U. W.; Roy Johnson, Casselton farmer, and Harry Schnell, Fargo real estate and insurance broker. This committee asked G. N. D. A. to use its State organization to conduct a survey to determine if North Dakota farm boys now in the service desired to farm in this State after victory.

GRASS ROOT REPORT

G. N. D. A. called upon each of its 53 county directors to work with the county auditor and chairman of the board of county commissioners in appointing a reporter for each rural township, to call on near relatives of men in the service to secure answers to a questionnaire.

The answers from two-thirds of the total number of townships in the State reported on 6,285 servicemen, of whom 1,300 were married.

REALLY WANT FARMS

Rather remarkable is the fact that 3,393, or 61 percent, want to buy farms, while 2,130, or 39 percent, desire to farm but feel they would like to start as renters. And 945, or 17 percent, own stock and farm equipment. The report shows that 675 men now own farm homes.

While 4,874 servicemen are indicated as desiring to practice mixed farming, 609 prefer power farming, not a surprising situation for men familiar with mass production methods in North Dakota, which fitted them especially for modern mechanized war. Only 40 were listed as preferring dairy farming, but few will have dairy herds at hand when they take off their uniforms. The fact that but 40 plan to engage in dairy farming should not be misconstrued as a lack of interest in dairying, for 4,874 returning servicemen plan to do mixed farming, in which dairying has ever been an important factor. But it will take time for either a buyer or renter to build a dairy herd and grow into the business.
